He noted that Kazakhstan also has extensive political and economic ties with Russia and China, even as it rates as a "strategic partner" of the United States.

The country's vast oil and gas reserves and its image as a model Muslim ally in the U.S.-led war on terror have boosted Kazakhstan's standing with the Bush administration, which has generally softened its public criticisms of the country's democratic shortcomings.

"I have watched very carefully the development of this important country from one that was in the Soviet space to one that is now a free nation," Mr. Bush told the Kazakh leader yesterday in the Oval Office, "and I appreciate your leadership."

A joint statement by the two leaders did not mention the U.S. stand on the OSCE chairmanship.

In an apparent reference to the government's closing last spring of two U.S. advocacy groups promoting democratic parties and institutions in Kazakhstan, the statement said Kazakh officials supported such groups and "will take the necessary steps to facilitate their legal functioning."3

Mr. Nazarbayev received a relatively warm welcome in Washington, a reflection of his country's political progress and an economy producing strong growth and expanding opportunities for foreign investors.

Just before the visit, Mr. Nazarbayev's government signed an accord to transport Kazakh oil through the new pipeline across Armenia, Georgia and Turkey, a route that bypasses Russia and has been strongly supported by the U.S. government.

During his visit, Mr. Nazarbayev also met with the heads of major U.S. corporations considering new investment in the country, including ExxonMobil, ConocoPhillips, and Halliburton.

Mr. Nazarbayev said General Electric had just signed a major deal to locate a factory in Kazakhstan.

The OSCE and Western civil rights groups have criticized restrictions on last year's presidential campaign, which gave the president a new seven-year term with 91 percent of the vote.

The country also has been shaken by the violent deaths of two opposition leaders in late 2005 and early 2006.

Analysts said Mr. Nazarbayev is genuinely popular despite the government's tight oversight of the press and political dissent, in large part because of rising prosperity.

DOJ_NMG_0071921

But the recent violence suggests that the delicate balance of competing factions within the country's ruling elite, with Mr. Nazarbayev as the ultimate arbiter, is under growing stress, according to Daniel Kimmage, Central Asia analyst for Radio Free Europe-Radio Liberty.

Mr. Nazarbayev in the interview acknowledged his country's democracy is "not perfect," but said his government has made a conscious decision to make economic development the first priority after independence.

As for getting 90 percent of the vote, he switched briefly to English to joke, "I am sorry."

"I wish it could have been less so you all would believe in it," he said, "but do you expect me to go to people and say, 'Don't vote for me. Vote for that guy.?'"

Jagshemash, Premier Bush (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Borat Sagdiyev, the Kazakh television reporter with the bushy mustache and cheap gray suit, showed up at the White House this week with an invitation for the man he calls the "mighty U.S. warlord."

He wanted to invite "Premier George Walker Bush," along with "other American dignitaries" like Mel Gibson and O.J. Simpson, to a screening of his new documentary about his anti-Semitic, misogynistic, scatological trek across America, followed by a cocktail party/summit meeting, no doubt featuring Kazakh-mopolitans made with fermented horse urine.

"We'll make discussion of cooperation between the two countries at Hooters," Borat told a befuddled White House guard.

Borat, of course, is Sacha Baron Cohen, the successor to Peter Sellers, a wildly original and brainy Cambridge grad and observant Jew from a distinguished British family. His HBO characters, the rapper Ali G, the fashion reporter Bruno, and Borat, collide with reality, exposing prejudice and puncturing pomposity.

The real Kazakhstan dictator was honored by President Bush at a state dinner this week. Nursultan Nazarbayev may have a corrupt and authoritarian regime where political opponents have been known to die very, very suddenly, but, hey, he's got oil and he's an ally in the war on terror. Respec', as Ali G would say.

So Mr. Cohen popped up as well, loping around D.C. to promote his new movie, "Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan." The satirist held a news conference in front of the Kazakh Embassy — as real officials inside fumed — to proclaim that any protestations that Kazakhstan treats women equally or tolerates all religions are "disgusting fabrications" by "evil nitwits" in rival Uzbekistan.

Mr. Cohen is a genius at turning reality into farce, taking lowbrow humor to high places, but he has met his match in W.

With the publication of parts of the classified intelligence report showing that the Bush administration has expanded the terrorist threat, as well as the books "State of Denial" by Bob Woodward, "Hubris" by Michael Isikoff and David Corn, and "Fiasco" by Thomas Ricks, all detailing the bumbling and infighting of Bush officials on Iraq, it's a tossup as to where we can find the most ludicrous, offensive and juvenile behavior — in the new Borat movie or the Bush White House. Let's compare and contrast:

At a Southern society dinner, an etiquette coach teaches Borat how to excuse himself to go to the bathroom. But when he returns to the table with a toilet doggie bag, no one laughs.

W. and Karl Rove "shared an array of fart jokes," Mr. Woodward writes. A White House aide put a toy that made a flatulence sound under Karl's chair for the senior staff meeting on July 7. When they learned of the terror attacks in London, the prank was postponed. But several weeks later, "the device was placed under Rove's chair and activated during the senior staff meeting. Everyone laughed."

Borat likes to wrestle guys naked. Karl liked to show W. his battery-powered "Redneck Horn," blasting obscenities and insults like "Hey, hogneck, who taught you how to drive?" in a Southern drawl.

Family values in Borat's comic portrait of Kazakhstan are reflected by his sister, an incestuous hooker, the town rapist, a cow in the bedroom, and the annual Pamplona-like "Running of the Jew."

Mr. Woodward writes about Bush family values, or the "Running of the WASP." Even though Poppy Bush found his old G.O.P. nemesis Donald Rumsfeld "arrogant, self-important, too sure of himself and Machiavellian," the author notes, W. chose Rummy as defense chief, feeling "it was a chance to prove his father wrong."

Borat had a fantasy life in which he would bag — literally — Pamela Anderson and yoke her happily ever after to a plow on his farm. Dick Cheney had a fantasy life in which he would bag Saddam's W.M.D. by occupying Iraq. In July 2003, Vice and Scooter Libby pored over fragments of intelligence intercepts, trying to figure out where on earth those elusive W.M.D. were. Mr. Woodward notes that Cheney staffers even called the chief weapon hunter with satellite coordinates for possible hidden caches.

Borat thinks Pamela is silly to object to animal torture, just as Vice thinks the press is silly to object to prisoner torture.

After much chaos, Borat gives up on Pamela and marries a prostitute. After much chaos, and even though Laura wants Rummy out, W. sticks with him at Vice's insistence.

No doubt. For lowbrow antics and silly stunts, W. is the clear winner. Respec'.

Rice Hopes To Rescue Gaza Border Pact (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood And Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

Deal she brokered last year to ease Palestinian crossings has gone nowhere. She'll tackle the finger pointing in a visit next week.

JERUSALEM — American officials declared a big breakthrough last year when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice brokered an agreement between the Israelis and Palestinians to ease the flow of people and goods in and out of the Gaza Strip.

But with Rice poised to return here next week, the pact lies in tatters amid ongoing violence and mutual finger pointing between Israel and its neighbors.

Forged in November after intensive, wee-hours diplomacy by Rice, the accord sought to improve freedom of movement as a way to jump-start the battered Palestinian economy and give Palestinians more control over the Gaza border crossings in the wake of Israel's pullout from the territory several months earlier.

Besides laying out the terms of more open access through the main crossings at Karni, between Gaza and Israel, and Rafah, between Gaza and Egypt, the agreement called for bus convoys between Gaza and the West Bank and foresaw eventual development of a seaport in Gaza and reconstruction of its damaged airport.

But few provisions were carried out, and the main Gaza crossings have remained constricted or shut, leaving Palestinian farmers unable to export crops and deepening a sense of confinement felt by many of the territory's 1.3 million residents. The United Nations said in a recent report that the flow through Karni was lower than when the accord was crafted.

"The crossings agreement has joined the great pile of sand in which the Mitchell, Tenet, Zinni and the road map plans have been buried," Israeli journalist Aluf Benn wrote in July in the daily newspaper Haaretz, referring to earlier U.S. initiatives.

Israel and the Palestinians blame each other for the collapse.

The Palestinians say Israel stalled in implementing the agreement; the Israelis attribute their continuing hesitancy to security concerns, including renewed rocket fire from Gaza and the June capture of an Israeli soldier that resulted in an Israeli military incursion.

During her swing through the Middle East, which begins Monday in Saudi Arabia and includes a stop in Cairo, Rice hopes to rescue the crossing agreement as a part of her mission to find ways of renewing the peace process. She is to meet with leaders of moderate Arab states, Palestinians and Israelis to discuss the aftermath of the war in Lebanon, Palestinian-Israeli issues, Iran and Iraq.

Israeli and Palestinian officials say they want to salvage the border agreement, though Israel appears to favor a less sweeping version. In addition, European Union officials are considering whether to renew the assignment of monitors who have been posted at the Rafah crossing.

Freedom of movement is one of the most problematic day-to-day issues for Palestinians. The crossings deal was seen as a way for both sides to win: The Palestinians could develop the Gaza economy through increased trade, and Israel would gain security and further international support for its Gaza pullout the previous summer.

Under the agreement, the Karni crossing, which serves as the main cargo portal between Gaza and Israel, and Rafah were to operate "continuously."

The Rafah crossing was to be turned over to the Palestinians, with Israel keeping track of who entered from Egypt by way of live video and data feeds.

In addition, the two sides were given a month to work out arrangements for bus convoys to carry Palestinians between the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which have been largely isolated from each other because of Israeli travel restrictions.

The Palestinian side would be responsible for guarding crossings from militant attack, and was to cooperate with Israeli and U.S. officials on security issues.

The Palestinians were also to crack down on the smuggling of weapons and explosives at Rafah, a chaotic border town where tunnels have been built for sneaking arms and contraband into Gaza.

But the deal began to unravel almost as soon as Rice left town. Discussions over the bus convoys quickly ran aground. When a suicide bomber killed five Israelis in Netanya, Israel said it was not ready to move forward.

Facing repeated rocket fire by Gaza-based militants, Israel kept the Karni crossing closed during much of the winter, the harvest season for export crops such as carnations, cherry tomatoes and strawberries. Unable to get their products out of Gaza, Palestinian farmers left them to rot or sold them at a loss in Gaza. Losses were estimated at $30 million.

Since then, Karni has been open only irregularly. An average of 30 to 40 truckloads a month make their way out of Gaza through the crossing — well short of the accord's goal of 400.

Some farmers have become so discouraged they skipped the planting season a few weeks ago, said Saad Khatib, trade policy advisor for Paltrade, a private-sector group that promotes Palestinian trade overseas.

Palestinians say the crossings agreement has failed because Israel didn't want to cede control of Gaza's borders in the first place. "There's no will on the Israeli side to improve this process," Khatib said.

Rafah was largely open until militants burrowed under the border into Israel and captured Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit on June 25. His fate remains unknown. In response, Israel launched a broad military incursion, its first in Gaza since the pullout, and has kept the crossing mostly closed since.

Israeli officials defend the closures on security grounds, whereas Palestinians charge that they are punitive. Israel, in turn, accuses the Palestinians of undermining the border agreement by failing to take steps to improve security around the crossings.

Salvoes of Kassam rockets into southern Israel have continued on and off — evidence, the Israelis say, of the inability of Palestinian authorities to assert control over the border. However, Palestinian police were able to thwart a militant attack on Karni in April.

Complicating matters, the victory of militant group Hamas in January's parliamentary elections also brought an end to most of Israel's dealings with the Palestinian government, though the crossings fall under the jurisdiction of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who is a member of the Fatah movement. Unlike Hamas, Fatah does not call for Israel's destruction.

"From Israel's national security perspective, it's not in our interest to see Gaza as a failed state," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

"The agreement was part of something bigger. The agreement failed because something bigger failed…. The crossings can't be seen in isolation."

American security coordinator Lt. Gen. Keith Dayton has proposed a plan for improving security at Karni through construction of more facilities, training of Palestinian security forces and possibly deployment of international observers.

But experts on the Middle East caution that Rice's new mission is unlikely to achieve lasting success without a broad new agreement on security and other issues.

"You could arrange to have Rafah opened by next Monday. But the question is, will it stay open?" said Aaron David Miller, a public policy scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center in Washington. "If this is one of the top objectives of her trip … it may turn out to be a difficult trip."

Turkey Trying To Bridge The Gap With The West (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

Given deteriorating relations with the West and increasing ambivalence at home over alliances with the U.S. and Europe, Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, will have plenty to talk about during trips to Washington and London and a visit from the German chancellor this coming week.

Straddling a strategic divide between East and West, the mostly Muslim country of 70 million people remains committed to its partnership with the U.S. and to its quest to join the European Union. But both of these traditional pillars of Turkey's foreign policy are coming under pressure as rising numbers of Turks believe they stand more to lose than to gain from getting closer to the West.

This perception alone, whether it is right or wrong, should cause alarm in Washington and across Europe, because many policy makers believe that Turkey's vibrant economy and relatively stable democracy -- both rare in the Middle East -- make it essential to keep the country fully within the West's strategic orbit.

Ankara's relations with Washington have recovered somewhat since Turkey banned the U.S. from using its territory as one stage for the 2003 invasion of Iraq. But plenty of bad blood remains, once again mostly because of Iraq. The Turks are outraged by what they see as U.S. inability to restrain Kurdish separatists who attack Turkish soldiers and use Northern Iraq as a haven.

In Turkey, where military service is compulsory and where every family has a relative in uniform, every soldier's death has immense resonance and further stokes anti-U.S. anger. "The U.S. hasn't done anything to help us," says a senior Turkish official. A recent poll showed that only one in five Turks feels warmly toward the U.S. Washington has started taking the issue seriously enough to appoint a special envoy to help address the separatist problem, and Turkey has welcomed the move. Privately, Turkish officials say they need to see concrete results. "Over the last three years, the U.S.-Turkish relationship has deteriorated markedly," writes Richard Haas, president of the Council on Foreign Relations.

A similar deterioration has marked Turkey's relations with the EU. Turkey is negotiating to join it, but against a rising tide of public opinion both in Europe and at home. Many Europeans, exhausted after admitting scores of Eastern European states to the union, view Turkey's membership with skepticism, saying the country is too big, too poor and too culturally different to enter the EU. The Turks, who never lacked national pride, view Europe as inherently biased against admitting their mostly Muslim country into their mostly Christian club.

This past week's EU decision to accept Bulgaria and Romania, despite the two countries' serious domestic problems, only confirmed Turkey's view that it is being held to a tougher standard. As Turkey's EU talks get more difficult and touch on sensitive issues -- such as the deadlock over the divided island of Cyprus and European criticism of Turkey's human-rights record -- more Turks are beginning to question the wisdom of joining.

The silver lining for the U.S. and Europe is that Turkey is so deeply integrated into the Western economic and political structures that a complete rupture is extremely unlikely. But if the Turks continue to perceive that the West isn't meeting their concerns, they will be more likely to elect leaders whose support for Western policies cannot be taken for granted.

U.N.-Israel Encounter Highlights Discord (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

An encounter between a U.N. tank patrol and an Israeli army unit near the border underlines the uncertainty in south Lebanon, with Israel reluctant to pull out the last of its troops and Hezbollah warning of impatience with Israeli truce "violations."

French peacekeepers on Thursday blocked the path of an Israeli armored personnel carrier and two Humvees that crossed into Lebanon, said an Associated Press photographer who saw it. Although the hour-long incident was resolved amicably, it marked the first such known encounter.

The peacekeeping force has said it expects Israeli troops to leave Lebanon under the U.N. cease-fire resolution by Saturday. Israeli military officials said Thursday that the pullout would most likely come after the Jewish holy day of Yom Kippur on Monday.

Israeli officials have been reluctant to withdraw the last of their troops, now thought to number several thousand after peaking around 30,000 at the end of the 34-day war with Hezbollah. They cited disagreements over the deployment of Lebanese and U.N. forces in southern Lebanon, which has long been a stronghold of the Shiite Muslim militants of Hezbollah.

But Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora on Friday stressed the need for Israel to withdraw completely in a telephone call to Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice, Lebanon's state-run news agency reported.

The U.N. resolution calls for 15,000 peacekeepers to work with an equal number of Lebanese soldiers to prevent another outbreak of fighting. It mandates a full Israeli pullout and requires the south be kept weapons-free except for arms approved by the Lebanese government.

Israel wants Hezbollah guerrillas disarmed, but neither the U.N. force nor the Lebanese military is eager to take on the task. The Iranian- and Syrian-backed Hezbollah says it will not disarm until a strong central government capable of defending Lebanon is in place.

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah has said guerrillas have shown patience with what he called Israeli cease-fire violations. But last week, he warned: "Be sure that we will not be patient for long if the (Lebanese) government abandons its role of protecting the land and the people."

Incidents on the ground could heighten tensions, as Thursday's encounter showed.

Israeli troops still stationed on a hilltop on the edge of the border village of Marwaheen had set up checkpoints in recent days on a stretch of road below their base and running parallel to the border fence, residents said.

On Thursday, French peacekeepers also were near the village.

Peter Dejong, an AP photographer, said four French Leclerc tanks painted white were on patrol in the area when an Israeli armored personnel carrier and two Humvees drove into Lebanon through a border gate.

The last French Leclerc tank in the patrol stopped, backed up about 150 yards and blocked the path, a narrow strip of tarmac extending from the gate.

The French and the Israelis then spent several minutes speaking to their commanders by mobile phones and two-way military radios.

Later, the two sides engaged in an animated conversation. Finally, the Israelis drove back to Israel in the troop carrier and the two Humvees.

Malak Sheetowy, a 19-year-old resident of Marwaheen, and her neighbor Marlene Ghanam gave a similar account Friday, saying the faceoff lasted about 60 minutes.

Israel's army confirmed that its troops came close to the French peacekeepers but said there was no confrontation. Israeli troops have been in the Marwaheen area since the cease-fire took effect Aug. 14 and will stay until the zone is transferred to peacekeepers, the army said.

Alexander Ivanko, spokesman for the U.N. peacekeeping force, said French peacekeepers "observed an Israeli violation of the Blue Line" — the U.N.-demarcated line between Lebanon and Israel.

Ivanko said the encounter was peaceful and there was no tension. "I checked with the French colonel and he told me it was amiable. ... They exchanged a couple of words and everyone went his way."

In Jerusalem, Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said he didn't know about the incident, but said that "Israel is honoring all its obligations" under the U.N. resolution and will continue to move toward its full implementation, including the withdrawal of Israeli troops.

Marwaheen, a Sunni village that survives on tobacco and olive crops, made headlines when vehicles carrying residents fleeing this summer's war came under missile fire that killed 12.

There are two U.N. bases in the village, one of which is 150 yards from a hilltop held by Israeli troops. An Israeli tank and an armored personnel carrier could be seen at the hilltop post.

Marwaheen's roughly 200 residents — about half the prewar population — were visited Friday by U.N. officials accompanied by bodyguards and interpreters to seek information on Thursday's incident.

Adnan Ghanim, a member of the village council, said he suspected the Israelis were trying to expand their hold on the area. "They wanted to move back into the village," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0071926

Tobacco farmer Moussa Obeid had similar concerns.

"It is not clear yet what these U.N. troops will do to protect us from the Israelis," he said, pointing to the Israeli position. "This is occupation. Look how close they are to us."

Tens Of Thousands Of Hamas Members Rally (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Tens of thousands of Hamas supporters marched in the Gaza Strip on Friday to show their backing for the militant group, even as its efforts to form a national unity government appeared stalled.

Hamas, which won Palestinian parliamentary elections in January, has dropped in popularity in recent months as international sanctions against the Palestinian government and an Israeli military offensive in Gaza have worsened already intense poverty.

Thousands of people marched through the town of Jebaliya in northern Gaza, wearing green Hamas baseball hats and waving green Hamas flags. One banner carried by the marchers read: "Yes to our government, no to all the mercenaries trying to sabotage it."

"The aim of this demonstration is to send a message to the world and to those in our society that the Palestinian people are standing with their elected government. They are rejecting the unjust and unfair siege and all attempts to carry out an internal coup against this government," Hamas lawmaker Mushir al-Masri told reporters.

After Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority, Western governments and Israel cut off financial ties with the government, demanding the militant group recognize Israel, renounce violence and respect previous agreements signed with Israel.

The cutoff in foreign aid has prevented the Palestinian Authority from paying full salaries to its 165,000 employees for six months. Many civil servants responded by going on strike and calling for the resignation of the Hamas government.

The Palestinians' situation further deteriorated after Hamas-linked militants attacked an Israeli army post June 25, capturing a soldier, and Israel responded with a wide-scale offensive in Gaza.

In an effort to end the economic embargo on the government, Hamas officials have tried to form a coalition with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah Party. However, efforts to form the national unity government have stalled because of Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel.

Al-Masri said Hamas remained committed to forming the coalition. "We are going to move ahead with the president, because there is no choice," he said.

Also on Friday, Israeli soldiers killed two Palestinian teenage brothers in the northern Gaza Strip, the army and Palestinian security officials said. The attack occurred in a field near the town of Beit Hanoun, which is often used as a staging base for rocket attacks on Israel.

Palestinian hospital officials said Anwar Hamdan, 16, and Hamam Hamdan, 14, were riding bicycles to inspect rocket launchers in the field when they were killed.

The army said the two were targeted because they had come to the field to collect launchers used to fire rockets in the past week. In recent months, Palestinian militant groups have sent children to collect the rocket launchers, believing they would be less likely to be attacked.

Late Friday night, an Israeli airstrike destroyed the home of a local Hamas leader in southern Gaza, officials said. There were no reports of casualties. The owner of the home, a senior member of Hamas' military wing in the area, received a call from the army about 15 minutes ahead of the blast telling him to evacuate the building, Hamas officials said. Rescue crews rushed to the area to search for wounded.

The army confirmed the airstrike, saying it had targeted a weapons storage facility. It said it warned people to stay away from the structure ahead of the attack to avoid civilian casualties.

The army has carried out a number of similar airstrikes since launching an offensive in Gaza in late June after Hamas-linked militants tunneled into Israel and captured an Israeli soldier.

Things Go Better With Rights (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0071927

By Zahi Khouri

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

In 1995, I moved from a comfortable life in America to Ramallah, Palestine, to invest in the most American of businesses there. I was instrumental in bringing Coca-Cola to the Middle East in the early 1980s; after the Oslo Peace Accords were signed I decided to launch the Coke franchise in the West Bank and Gaza.

Over the last decade, the business has grown. Today, Coca-Cola employs hundreds of Palestinians and sells 10 million cases of Coke a year.

As a Palestinian American, this was more than a moneymaking venture. Each gleaming bottle, with that red Coca-Cola swirl in both Arabic and English, would be a miniature ambassador from America. And each potential investor who saw that Coke was successful might decide to invest as well. It seemed the perfect strategy: to promote American interests while helping to build an economy that could serve as the foundation of a viable, independent Palestinian state.

Following the peace accords, scores of other Palestinian Americans moved to the West Bank and Gaza. Professors came to teach at universities. Doctors came to help modernize the healthcare system and treat patients. Artists came to exhibit and perform. Other business professionals came to invest, modernize the economy and create jobs. Each, in their way, wanted to help build an independent Palestine. Each served as the real ambassadors of America, so different from the American-made Apache helicopters and F-16 fighter jets Israel uses to rain destruction on the Palestinian economy, cities and villages.

But Israel has decided that we Americans are not welcome. Many, like me, have lived in the West Bank for more than a decade. Unlike American Jews -- or Jews from anywhere -- who can receive instant citizenship upon arrival, we are unable to obtain residency. Instead, we Christian and Muslim Palestinians must rely on our American passports, renewing our tourist visas every three months. A hassle, yes, but the only way to stay in Palestine, often in the homes our families have inhabited for generations.

Since Hamas assumed government authority after democratic elections this year, Israel has begun to deny Palestinian Americans the right to enter. We are left to wonder why.

This new policy could be another turn of the screw to pressure Hamas. It could be manufactured as a painless concession for future negotiations. It could be one more tactic in Israel's drive -- which began in 1948 with the expulsion of more than 700,000 Palestinians -- to empty as much land of as many Palestinians as possible.

We do not know the reason for denying entry to Palestinian Americans. But we do know the result. In addition to breaking families apart -- for example one spouse with children in the West Bank, and the other unable to return from visits to the U.S. -- it is discouraging investors. It is driving out the very people the U.S. State Department, the World Bank and other international organizations encouraged to return. We are the ones building businesses, creating jobs and inspiring hope for a better future.

Using the pretext of security, Israeli policies of home demolitions, land confiscation, restrictions on movement and construction of the separation wall have choked the Palestinian economy. According to the U.N., more than 540 checkpoints and other structures impede movement throughout the West Bank, and crossings into Gaza are rarely open. Gaza represents 30% of the Palestinian economy. Yet we cannot ship goods from the West Bank to Gaza. And Gaza cannot import raw materials for processing, even though it possesses a talented labor force. Israel has also been refusing to turn over nearly $55 million a month (now totaling roughly $400 million) in Palestinian tax revenue. With the cutoff of international aid, this has led to a humanitarian catastrophe. Since March, Palestinian Authority employees -- about one-quarter of the labor force -- have not received their salaries.

Israel will not gain security by creating Mogadishu next to Silicon Valley. Only an open and thriving Palestinian economy can lay the foundation for a sustainable peace.

Our humanitarian crisis is not the result of a natural catastrophe. There was no tsunami, earthquake or drought. We helped to build nations. We have the natural resources and human capital to build a thriving, stable Palestinian economy as well. We do not need international handouts. We need the free movement of people and goods. We need unrestricted gateways between the occupied Palestinian territory and the rest of the world.

American policy makers have tremendous influence with Israel. They should use it to insist on freedom of movement of people and goods, and to maintain access for Palestinian Americans and Palestinians with other foreign passports to continue to play a role in economic development. A vibrant Palestinian economy serves the interests of all -- Palestinians, Israelis and Americans.

Out Of The Mouths Of Aides (NYT)

It has taken five and a half years, but at least some of President Bush's aides have begun to acknowledge the patently obvious: There needs to be a serious effort to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Without one, the United States has no chance of salvaging its battered reputation in the Islamic world. No chance of rallying moderate Arab leaders to fight extremists or contain Iran. And no chance of ensuring Israel's lasting security. We just hope that Mr. Bush will now make the long neglected peace effort a central priority for the remaining years of his presidency.

With Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice traveling to the region next week, Mr. Bush should give her an explicit mandate to press Israel, and not just the Palestinians, for real compromises. He should also give her the authority to talk to adversaries, and not just friends, about how to support the effort.

For years, Mr. Bush's advisers have woven an entire mythology about how Middle East peace required tanks on the road to Baghdad, rather than diplomats on planes to Jerusalem, Ramallah and Damascus.

So it was surprising to hear one of Ms. Rice's closest aides, Philip Zelikow, the State Department counselor, tell a think-tank audience that some sense of progress on the Arab-Israeli dispute is "just a sine qua non" for getting moderate Arabs and the Europeans to cooperate on Iran and the region's many other dangerous problems. "We can rail against that belief. We can find it completely justifiable. But it's fact," Mr. Zelikow said.

We fear that Mr. Bush and his secretary of state haven't yet caught up to that. As Ms. Rice prepared to leave, other aides said that the most she would do would be to rally support for the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, and to solic it ideas on how to revive peace talks.

Ms. Rice should use this trip to commit herself to negotiating a comprehensive cease-fire. She can start by telling the Israelis they need to immediately end targeted killings and halt all settlement construction. Ms. Rice needs to make clear to the Palestinians that while words are important, she is less concerned with rhetoric than the ability and willingness of any Pale stinian government to halt, rather than abet, all attacks on Israel.

Washington is already encouraging Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, to meet with Mr. Abbas, for more symbolic support. Ms. Rice should instead tell all sides that President Bush's goal is a full resumption of peace negotiations — and that he will commit the full resources of his presidency to the effort.

Ms. Rice should be willing to go to Damascus — or send a top aide — to tell President Bashar al-Assad that relations can improve if he restrains his clients Hamas and Hezbollah. The Europeans — who have been desperate for the United States to engage — should make the same trip to warn of real punishments should he refuse.

The lesson of this summer's disastrous wars in Lebanon and Gaza is that the time for listening tours and tactical steps is far past. We hope that Mr. Zelikow's bosses start paying attention.

Woman Accused Of Supporting Terror Group (AP)

By Daisy Nguyen, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

A naturalized U.S. citizen from Iran who was found in Iraq was indicted Friday on charges of providing support to a terrorist organization that seeks to overthrow the Iranian regime, federal prosecutors said.

Zeinab Taleb-Jedi, 51, then a resident of Herndon, Va., went to Iraq in 1999 to attend a training camp run by the Mujahedin-e Khalq, or MEK, the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles said in a statement.

MEK, also known as the People's Mujahedin of Iran, and its affiliates were deemed foreign terrorist organizations by the U.S. State Department in 1997. The designations bar anyone in the United States from providing material support.

The group was founded in Iran in the 1960s and moved to Iraq in the early 1980s to base its activities against Iran's government. The group had sided with Iraq in its 1980-88 war against Iran.

The State Department says the MEK groups were funded by Saddam Hussein, supported the seizure of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran in 1979 and are responsible for the deaths of Americans in the 1970s.

Taleb-Jedi was discovered by coalition forces at a camp called Ashraf Base about 40 miles northwest of Baghdad, the U.S. attorney's office statement said. It was unclear when.

U.S. forces took control of the camp and sent many members back to Iran on condition that they leave MEK, said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the attorney's office.

"An investigation reveals that she played an active role at the camp," Mrozek said.

Taleb-Jedi was indicted by a federal grand jury in New York City on one count of providing material support to a foreign terrorist organization. She faces up to 15 years in federal prison if convicted.

She was being prosecuted in New York because her plane landed at John F. Kennedy International Airport on March 31 upon her return from Iraq. The case was handled by Los Angeles-based prosecutors who have been involved in MEK-related investigations since the 1990s.

She was assigned a public defender in New York and released on bond.

Taleb-Jedi immigrated to the United States from Iran in 1978 and became a U.S. citizen in 1996, the government said. Her aliases include Nayer Taleb-Jedi or Nire Taleb-Jedi, according to the two-page indictment.

The attorney's office did not release any information on the woman's occupation.

Some members of Congress in recent years have advocated the group's removal from the terrorism list because of its stance against the Iranian regime and because it doesn't pose a direct threat to the U.S.

Venezuela And Nigeria, Both OPEC Members, Say They Will Cut Their Oil Production (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

Some members of OPEC are getting really nervous about oil at $60 a barrel.

Two of the oil cartel's 11 members, Nigeria and Venezuela, said yesterday that they would make voluntary cuts in their production in response to oil prices that have fallen nearly 20 percent from their peak two months ago.

The modest move, which amounts to less than 200,000 barrels a day, comes after days of mixed signals from some OPEC officials who have been increasingly concerned about the rapid drop in prices.

Nigeria's oil minister, Edmund Daukoru, who is the OPEC president this year, recently said the price of oil was "very low." Both countries, traditional price hawks within the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, said their cut was part of an informal deal agreed to at OPEC's last meeting this month to pare output if prices declined.

Yesterday's announcement was initially shrugged off by oil traders who say there was still plenty of oil supplies on the market. But the confusion around OPEC's position helped push up the price of crude oil on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Oil futures for November delivery pared initial losses and closed at $62.90 a barrel, up 14 cents.

Since they last met in Vienna, OPEC representatives have become anxious as they watch crude oil futures decline rapidly from a midsummer high of $77.03 a barrel.

Mr. Daukoru has been in contact with other OPEC ministers to discuss falling oil prices, which briefly dropped below $60 a barrel in intraday trading for the first time in six months on Monday. But OPEC denied there had been a shift in policy.

One delegate from a Persian Gulf country, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not entitled to talk about his country's policy publicly, had a calmer view.

"We are not currently concerned," he said. "The prices are currently manageable and fair. We're not overly alarmed by the prices. It's the market working."

Demand for crude oil typically declines after Labor Day, and it is not unusual for oil prices to drop once the summer driving season is over. Consumption tends to pick up again with the first winter cold.

"We are not going to push extra oil in the market or force it down our customers' throats; we just respond to demand," the delegate said.

Still, despite assurances from Saudi Arabia and others that they would keep markets amply supplied with oil, the contradictory statements from senior OPEC representatives have raised doubts about the oil cartel's strategy.

Whether Nigeria and Venezuela actually reduce their output or not, the mixed messages have at least succeeded in one way: oil traders have been persuaded that OPEC will step in to defend prices, and, therefore, the recent price decline has slowed.

OPEC's acting secretary general, Mohammed Barkindo, who is also a senior Nigerian official, told the energy publication Platts that he had met with Saudi Arabia's oil minister this week in Riyadh and that Saudi Arabia was already cutting its production as part of the informal agreement. Saudi Arabia has not commented on any change in policy.

It will take a much larger drop in prices for OPEC to step in formally with a cartelwide production cut. Saudi Arabia, OPEC's largest and most influential member, is apparently comfortable seeing crude oil fall to around $55 a barrel. Further declines, however, might provoke action by OPEC.

"While apparently fanciful, reports of an imminent output cut reflect two hard facts: stocks are building faster than expected and several producers have an incredibly low pain threshold when it comes to price drops," Antoine Halff, an energy analyst with Fimat, wrote in a note yesterday. "However, more price declines will likely be needed before OPEC producers decide on any coordinated move."

Venezuela, which pumps about 2.5 million barrels a day, said it would cut its daily output by 50,000 barrels, starting tomorrow. Nigeria said it would trim its exports by 5 percent at the same date, amounting to a reduction of about 120,000 barrels a day. Nigeria produces about 3.8 million barrels a day. It is notable that these two countries are taking the self-appointed role of managing the market since neither is currently meeting its OPEC production quota.

Nigeria's production, for example, is hundreds of thousands of barrels short of its peak because of social unrest in the Niger Delta, while Venezuela has experienced lower output for some time.

"They are trying to influence the psychology of the market," said Larry Goldstein, an oil analyst and the president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation in New York. "Although they are reacting to the reduction in demand, they are trying to convince the market that they are actually anticipating it by making cuts ahead of the market. But they are simply reacting to it, which is how markets should operate."

Venezuela And Nigeria Cut Oil Output (FT)

By Carola Hoyos In London

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

Venezuela and Nigeria, both members of the Opec oil cartel, on Friday announced that they would reduce their oil production by as much as 200,000 barrels a day to shore up prices.

Several other key members of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries were said to be furious about the unilateral decision.

Nevertheless, data due to be released in the next few weeks are expected to show those other members, which include Saudi Arabia, Iran, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates, are also reducing output but keeping quiet about the measure.

Saudi Arabia and Kuwait are both allies of the US, the world's biggest oil consumer, and do not want to be seen trying to boost prices that are still relatively high at $60 a barrel.

Nonetheless, they are concerned about the speed with which prices have slipped from $75 over recent weeks and want to ensure that their oil, which trades slightly below the price of international benchmark crudes, does not fall below the $50 mark.

To that end, and because refineries are demanding less oil because of scheduled maintenance closures, Saudi Arabia is seen as having already cut production by 200,000 barrels a day, with another 200,000 being cut by Kuwait, Iran and the UAE.

Nigeria is cutting 120,000-150,000 barrels a day, while Venezuela is expected to cut 50,000 b/d. The total cuts would reduce Opec production to 27m b/d, a 600,000 b/d fall in two months. But oil prices did not rise significantly on the news.

Nigeria is already producing fewer barrels than its Opec quota allows because of militant attacks on oil facilities in the Delta region.

Neil McMahon, analyst at Sanford Bernstein, said: “I can’t see it [the move by Nigeria and Venezuela] stabilising the price for long because Opec could turn on the tap again at any moment.” He noted that spare oil capacity had doubled in just a year and is now at 3m b/d.

He said the price fall had been prompted by a slowdown in demand. The US Department of Energy this week showed US demand in July had fallen by 1.3 per cent from a year earlier.

Bolton Rips U.N. Deputy Over Comments (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

The U.S. ambassador to the U.N. on Friday accused the No. 2 U.N. official of discrediting the United Nations by criticizing American and British diplomacy over Darfur, his latest attack on the deputy.

The ambassador John Bolton demanded Deputy U.N. Secretary-General Mark Malloch Brown apologize over comments that appeared in Friday's editions of the Independent newspaper in London. He criticized President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair for threatening Sudan over its refusal to allow U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur.

"The Sudanese know we don't have troops to go in against a hostile Khartoum government; if Sudan opposes us there's no peace to keep anyway; you're in there to fight a war," Malloch Brown said. "It's just not a credible threat."

Malloch Brown said those threats allowed Sudan to portray itself as "the victims of the next crusade after Iraq and Afghanistan," and said the U.S. and Britain "need to get beyond this posturing and grandstanding."

Bolton said Malloch Brown's remarks could undermine the U.N. Security Council's demand that the U.N. take over from an underfunded African Union force that has been unable to stop the violence in Darfur. Sudan has so far refused to give the U.N. control of the mission.

"Let me say these remarks bring discredit to the United Nations and are a stain on its reputation," Bolton told reporters at the U.N. "It's a terrible signal to the government in Khartoum and should never have been uttered," he added later.

"We are proud that we have called the attention of the international community to the tragedy in Darfur. We are proud of our efforts to bring relief to that tragedy. And to have Mr. Malloch Brown attack those efforts, as I say, brings great discredit to this institution," he said.

Few U.N. officials seem to spark Bolton's ire more than Malloch Brown. In June, the American ambassador said Malloch Brown, a Briton, made a "very, very grave mistake" for a speech in which he argued that the U.S. employs stealth diplomacy at the U.N. — relying on it, yet refusing to defend it before critics at home.

And in an interview with USA Today earlier this year, Malloch Brown himself said Bolton was "a real force here, but in a way that provokes a lot of reaction and opposition from others."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Friday that the United States was proud to have kept the pressure on Sudan.

"Rather than focusing on what the U.S. or the U.K. or others might be doing, he might apply himself to the task at hand rather than giving speeches," McCormack said of Malloch Brown.

Extremist Islam May Be Rising In Morocco (AP)

By John Thorne, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Little would seem to connect a soldier, a shopkeeper, airline pilots' wives and a woman known for helping people in need. But all have been named as suspects in a purported Islamic terrorist plot, suggesting extremism may be leaping Morocco's class divides.

In all, Moroccan authorities arrested 56 people last month for allegedly being part of a network that was planning attacks on military and tourist sites in hopes of bringing down the government of this North African monarchy.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States and suicide bombings two years later that killed 33 people in Casablanca, this country's economic capital, Moroccans have grown accustomed to police crackdowns on Islamic militants.

Thousands have been detained, drawing frequent accusations of abuse and forced confessions at the hands of police.

What's new in the latest case is the wide range of people accused. Middle-class women and security force members allegedly formed the core of a group that authorities say called itself Ansar al-Mehdi, or Supporters of the Mehdi — a divine figure in Islamic tradition who will establish justice on Earth before Judgment Day.

Previously, Islamic extremism was most evident in Morocco's urban slums like Sidi Moumen, the cinderblock jungle in Casablanca where many of the 2003 suicide bombers lived. If the charges are true, the new case would suggest Muslim militancy is spreading into the middle class.

Penetration of the army would be a particular blow because the Western-equipped force has traditionally stood as a pillar of state power. After the sweep, King Mohammed VI fired the head of military intelligence and the head of Morocco's general security forces.

Morocco ended compulsory military service this month, but officials said it had nothing to do with the Ansar al-Mehdi revelations.

Officials have released little information about the Mehdi suspects and their alleged targets, divulging just a few names. The Justice Ministry says judges are preparing for public hearings originally planned for mid-September but now delayed until late October.

Two of the four female suspects are wives of Royal Air Maroc pilots, and Interior Minister Chakib Benmoussa alleged they were recruited by alleged Ansar al-Mehdi chief Hassan Khattab to carry out suicide attacks in Morocco.

Khattab spent two years in jail for involvement in the May 2003 suicide bombings.

Another woman in custody, Fatima Zahra Rehioui, 51, is described by authorities as a central figure in the alleged plot. In a rare news conference in August, Benmoussa said Rehioui was a confidant of Khattab and knowingly gave him $17,280 for terrorist activities.

Rehioui's lawyer tells a different story, describing her as someone who helps people. Attorney Khalid Idrissi said Khattab asked Rehioui for the money so he could see a doctor about a heart condition and she gave the money freely, with no questions asked.

"She's known as a very charitable woman who helps poor families in her area, especially during Ramadan and at other religious festivals," Idrissi said.

Moroccan authorities say that Badr Bouziki, a 27-year-old shopkeeper, also was deeply involved with Ansar al-Mehdi and that he helped test explosives in forests near Sale, just outside the Moroccan capital, Rabat.

"I know that he's not guilty," said one of Bouziki's relatives. He asked not to be further identified, saying he feared possible government reprisal.

The relative said that Bouziki is not particularly religious and that his arrest at a bus station while visiting relatives in north-central Morocco came as "a complete surprise."

When he visited Bouziki in jail, the relative said, the suspect complained of torture and showed signs of beatings.

Mohamed Khalouki, 27, whose family lives in an outlying village of Sale, is one of five soldiers arrested in the terror sweep.

"We know the truth: He has nothing to do with Ansar al-Mehdi," said Khalouki's sister, who also said she feared being quoted by name.

Growing up amid dusty fields, stands of pine trees and patches of rubbish, Khalouki sought purpose in military service, choosing to enroll at a military school at age 12, his family said.

Drawn early to music, he became a drummer in the army band, traveling to Europe for concerts and shifting his ambitions to a musical career. Denied permission to quit the army, he deserted in 2005 and was captured this year, serving three months in jail, the family said.

"On the day he was supposed to get out, I went to pick him up, but he wasn't there," a brother said. Khalouki had been transferred into police custody for alleged involvement with four fellow band members in Ansar al-Mehdi.

Teacher In Hiding After Attack On Islam Stirs Threats (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

DOJ_NMG_0071933

PARIS, Sept. 29 — A French high school philosophy teacher and author who carried out a scathing attack against the Prophet Muhammad and Islam in a newspaper commentary says he has gone into hiding under police protection after receiving a series of death threats, including one disseminated on an online radical Islamist forum.

The teacher, Robert Redeker, 52, wrote in the center-right daily Le Figaro 10 days ago that Muhammad was "a merciless warlord, a looter, a mass-murderer of Jews and a polygamist," and called the Koran "a book of incredible violence."

The Redeker case is the latest manifestation in Europe of a mounting ideological battle that pits those who believe Islam and the Prophet Muhammad can be criticized in the name of free speech against those in the Muslim community who believe no criticism can be tolerated.

A recent speech by Pope Benedict XVI that seemed to link Islam and violence caused such an uproar in the Muslim world that the pope issued a rare expression of regret.

The pope expressed regret for the reaction to his remarks after Muslims demonstrated against him around the world. Just this week, a Berlin opera house decided to cancel performances of the Mozart opera "Idomeneo" because of security fears over a scene showing the severed head of the Prophet Muhammad. The decision prompted an outpouring of protest about what was seen as the surrender of artistic freedom.

In his commentary, Mr. Redeker compared Islam unfavorably to Christianity and Judaism, although he admitted that the history of the Catholic Church was "full of dark pages," and he criticized the hostile reaction to the pope's remarks.

"Jesus is a master of love; Muhammad is a master of hatred," Mr. Redeker wrote, adding, "Whereas Judaism and Christianity are religions whose rites forsake violence and remove its legitimacy, Islam is a religion that, in its very sacred text, as much as in some of its everyday rites, exalts violence and hatred. Hatred and violence dwell in the very book that educates any Muslim, the Koran."

Immediately afterward, Mr. Redeker, who teaches in a public high school near Toulouse and is the author of several books on philosophy, began to receive death threats by telephone, e-mail and through the online Islamist Web site known as Al Hesbah, a password-protected forum with ties to Al Qaeda. The forum published photos of him and what it said was his home address, directions to his home and his cellphone number, according to the SITE Institute, which tracks violent Islamist groups.

That day's issue of Le Figaro was banned in Egypt and Tunisia. Mr. Redeker was denounced by a commentator on Al Jazeera television.

"I can't work, I can't come and go and am obliged to hide," Mr. Redeker told Europe 1 radio in a telephone interview from an undisclosed location on Friday. "So in some way, the Islamists have succeeded in punishing me on the territory of the republic as if I were guilty of a crime of opinion."

Mr. Redeker, who has kept in contact with news agencies by cellphone and e-mail, said that his wife and their children had also been threatened with death. He told Europe 1 that his wife was in hiding with him, but he was less clear about his three children, saying that one of them had been forced to move and that another was in a boarding school.

Asked to describe the sort of threats he had received, Mr. Redeker replied, "You will never feel secure on this earth. One billion, three hundred thousand Muslims are ready to kill you."

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin on Friday called the threats "unacceptable," adding: "We are in a democracy. Everyone has the right to express his views freely, while respecting others, of course."

The Interior Ministry has confirmed that Mr. Redeker is under police surveillance, and that counterterrorism experts have begun a preliminary investigation into the threats, which the ministry has described as "dangerous." Mr. Redeker complained in the radio interview that he had to arrange his own logistics and "find a place to sleep at night or live for a day or two."

One of the threats came from a contributor to Al Hesbah, who wrote, "It is impossible that this day pass without the lions of France punishing him."

The contributor called on his Muslim brethren in France to follow the lead of Muhammad Bouyeri, who murdered the Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh after he made a film denouncing the plight of abused Muslim women.

"May God send some lion to cut his head," the contributor said of Mr. Redeker, whom he described as a "pig."

Mr. Redeker's situation echoes that of Ayaan Hirsi Ali, a Somali-born Dutch politician who collaborated with Mr. van Gogh on the film and has been relentless in her criticism of some Islamic practices. The subject of numerous death threats from radical Islamists, she was put under the protection of bodyguards in the Netherlands in 2002, and currently has security protection in Washington, where she recently became a fellow at the conservative American Enterprise Institute.

In the Figaro commentary, Mr. Redeker wrote, “Islam tries to dictate its rules to Europe: opening swimming pools at certain hours exclusively for women, forbidding the caricature of this religion, demanding a special diet for Muslim children in school cafeterias, fighting for wearing the veil in school, accusing free thinkers of Islamophobia.”

Mr. Redeker, who has written against Islam in the past, does not shy from controversy. At the time of the American-led invasion of Iraq, he criticized French pacifists, and he has written extensively about how watching sports competitions is worse than opium. His new book, “Depression and Philosophy,” is about to be published.

At first, Mr. Redeker did not speak out about the threats. In an e-mail message to The New York Times last Tuesday, he said it was not the right time to talk about his plight.

Then, in an interview with the local Toulouse newspaper, La Dépêche du Midi, published Thursday, Mr. Redeker described the death threats, adding, “What is happening to me corresponds fully to what I denounce in my writing: the West is under ideological surveillance by Islam.”

That interview set off a public defense of Mr. Redeker in the name of free speech and condemnations of those who threaten him, which snowballed Friday after his radio interview with Jean-Pierre Elkabbach, the president of Europe 1, who is the host of a popular interview show.

Philippe de Villiers, a far-right politician, wrote President Jacques Chirac a letter on Friday asking that Mr. Redeker be given “shelter — as a symbol — at the Élysée Palace, which is the palace of the republic, rather than let him wander,” according to Agence France-Presse.

Le Figaro, in an unusual front-page open letter on Friday signed by the editor and the publisher, said, “We condemn with the greatest conviction the grave attacks on freedom of thought and freedom of expression which this affair has provoked.”

On Thursday, Education Minister Gilles de Robien was less forceful. He expressed “solidarity” with Mr. Redeker, but cautioned that a “state employee must show prudence and moderation in all circumstances.”

But two large teachers’ unions in separate statements on Friday threw their support behind Mr. Redeker’s right to speak freely, though one of them made clear, “We do not share his convictions.”

Mr. Redeker said that he had no second thoughts about what he wrote. “No regrets,” he said in the radio interview. “I have given a lot of thought in writing this text.”

New Script On North Korea? (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

Groups Hope Stark Prison Play Spurs Pressure on Pyongyang Regime

WASHINGTON -- As international concern about North Korea's nuclear program intensifies, human-rights groups and Christian activists in the U.S. are unveiling a new weapon near here Wednesday in their campaign to dislodge dictator Kim Jong Il: a musical.

"Yoduk Story," a smash hit in its initial run in South Korea earlier this year, tells the story of star-crossed lovers imprisoned in North Korea's most notorious prison camp. Few protagonists in the nearly three-hour drama survive Yoduk's dungeons and torture chambers. The main character, a North Korean singer, is raped, impregnated and eventually commits suicide. The play's unflinching portrayal of Pyongyang's gulags -- including floggings and amputations -- is viewed as a crucial tool by activists in pressuring governments to take a more aggressive approach toward confronting North Korea over religious persecution and human-rights abuses.

"The play is a cultural nuclear bomb against Kim Jong Il," says Suzanne Scholte, president of the conservative Defense Forum Foundation of Virginia, which is helping to stage the drama. It opens a three-night run Oct. 4 at the Strathmore, a theater in suburban Maryland.

The drama behind the play's journey to Washington is as intriguing as the on-stage script. Many of the human-rights, Christian, and Korean-American organizations promoting "Yoduk Story" have also been active in shaping broader U.S. policy toward North Korea in recent years. A coalition of these groups lobbied the White House to enact in 2004 the North Korean Human Rights Act, which binds Washington to process more expeditiously North Korean asylum seekers into the U.S. The bill also established a special presidential envoy to monitor North Korean human rights, currently Jay Lefkowitz, an attorney and former top White House aide to President George W. Bush. Mr. Lefkowitz will be attending the opening-night performance of "Yoduk Story."

The machinery behind the play's U.S. run is in many ways a microcosm of the human-rights and faith-based organizations that are increasingly seeking to drive American foreign policy. Many of the cast's 30 members are boarding at parishes in the Washington area for the East Coast run. And a national network of Korean-American churches, the Korean Church Coalition for North Korean Freedom, is calling on its members to buy a sizable block of the 6,000 seats currently on sale for the play's four-night run in Los Angeles next month.

Many Americans who have participated in the growing coalition of activists interested in North Korea believe human rights and refugees will ultimately be the defining tools in U.S. attempts to combat that country's dictatorship. They are seeking to use radio broadcasts, film and the Internet to turn the current trickle of North Korean refugees into a torrent that could potentially cripple the North Korean regime. "The key is how we can get a critical mass" of refugees, says Michael Horowtiz, a scholar at Washington's conservative Hudson Institute, who helped draft the North Korean Human Rights Act.

The creative force behind "Yoduk Story" is its director and chief financier, 37-year-old Jung Sung San, himself a North Korean defector. Mr. Jung narrowly escaped a 13-year prison term in Yoduk in 1994, after North Korean military police arrested him for listening to South Korean radio broadcasts. He was headed toward Yoduk's expansive prison site 70 miles northeast of Pyongyang, he said in an interview, when his vehicle overturned in a rain storm and he escaped. He eventually resettled in Seoul, after fleeing through China, Russia and Hong Kong.

A student of film in Pyongyang and Russia, Mr. Jung took up jobs writing and editing for television and film after his resettlement in South Korea. But his father's execution in North Korea in 2002 caused a major transformation in his life, he says. He contemplated suicide, after being told his escape was the reason for his father's death. But he eventually embraced Christianity and vowed to work to expose North Korea's system of gulags.

"I decided to let the world know about the prison camps" across North Korea, says Mr. Jung, a sprite man whose straight black hair is tinged with orange streaks. "We have a duty to save these people" who are still there.

The end result was "Yoduk Story," which Mr. Jung says he partially funded by offering up his kidney as collateral for a loan. He also faced stiff opposition from the South Korean government, which has been reluctant to antagonize North Korea as Seoul seeks economic and political engagement in an attempt to moderate Pyongyang's behavior. But the musical often sold out this year, as conservative political groups and Christian activists flocked to the play. It also received the blessing of senior South Korea politicians, such as former South Korean President Kim Young Sam.

From its conception, though, "Yoduk Story" was envisioned as a drama for the American public, Mr. Jung says. President Bush has shown a particular interest in the plight of North Korea's political prisoners, publicly disparaging Kim Jong Il for running a gulag and advising White House staff to read the memoirs of one of Yoduk's few escapees, Kang Chol Hwan. Mr. Bush last year gave a private Oval Office audience to Mr. Kang -- who is a consultant to "Yoduk Story" -- and the play's producers have sent invitations to the president, first lady and a number of cabinet sectaries to attend one of next week's performances.

The White House said it is unlikely Mr. Bush will attend. But an aide said Mr. Lefkowitz is looking forward to attending the event and addressing the cast and crew of "Yoduk Story."

Longer term, Mr. Jung has ambitious plans to bring "Yoduk Story" and other tales about North Korean life to film. Promoters of the play, meanwhile, hope its performance here will lead to even greater pressure on the U.S. government to confront North Korea's concentration camps and to accept those who have suffered into the U.S.

"It's an issue everyone should be concerned about," says Adrian Hong, the founder of Washington-based LiNK, or Liberty in North Korea, which is also supporting "Yoduk Story." "Americans have a place in their hearts for the oppressed."

Thai Military Leaders Say They Retain Power To Remove A Civilian Government (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0071936

By Seth Mydans And Thomas Fuller, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

BANGKOK, Sept. 29 — Thailand's junta said Friday that it would not interfere with the workings of the interim government it has promised to appoint. But it said it reserved the right to fire the government in exceptional circumstances.

Thai newspapers quoted a high-ranking official as saying that the civilian government would be headed by Surayud Chulanont, 62, a respected former general who is close to the palace.

The appointment of the prime minister must be formally approved by King Bhumibol Adulyadej before it is announced, and on Friday the official, Auditor General Jaruvan Maintaka, backed away from her earlier statement. Still, there were hints from other officials that it was true.

General Surayud is known as a nonpolitical soldier who worked to professionalize the force when he was army chief. One of his oft-quoted comments is, "I always think that politics and I don't fit together."

Also on Friday, the junta announced a military shuffle that consolidated its control over the armed forces, sidelining officers loyal to Thaksin Shinawatra, the prime minister who was ousted in a coup on Sept. 19.

At a briefing for foreign reporters, Gen. Winai Phattiyakul, one of the six officers of the junta, said that Mr. Thaksin had been trying to gain personal control of the military by promoting his supporters and that the coup leaders were concerned about a split in the armed forces.

At the briefing, a senior Foreign Ministry official said the junta, calling itself the Council for National Security, would retain what he called "a partnership rather than a hierarchical relationship" with the civilian government.

The junta has "no power to issue any order whatsoever in the running of the government, except in security," said the official, Krit Garnjana-Goonchorn, the permanent secretary of the Foreign Ministry.

Nevertheless, he said, an interim constitution would give the junta the power to fire the civilian government. He cast this as a progressive move, saying the constitutional power would remove the need for any future coups.

"The power is there in reserve," he said. "If things did not work out, the Council for National Security would not have to resort to nonpeaceful means to effect change."

The interim government is to hold office until a new constitution is drawn and a new Parliament is elected, the coup leaders have said. At the briefing, the officials said the drafting of a constitution should take no longer than nine months, somewhat accelerating a timetable that was given earlier.

Although he is a former general, General Surayud has played a civilian role as a member of the Privy Council, the top advisory body to the king.

On Thursday he said he backed the coup, saying the generals had been forced to move because of the impending possibility of bloodshed, referring to an intensifying conflict between supporters and opponents of Mr. Thaksin. "The most important matter is to build unity in the country," he said.

In the military shuffle announced Friday, Mr. Thaksin's supporters and relatives have mostly been removed from commands and transferred to inactive positions or attached to agencies that put them outside the chain of command.

A struggle over promotions appeared to have been one of the sparks for the coup, as Mr. Thaksin tried to put his allies and relatives in positions that would have given him personal control over the military.

Some analysts saw this as a final step in Mr. Thaksin's attempt to secure personal control over the workings of government, having already co-opted the Senate, much of the judiciary and the independent agencies that were intended under a new Constitution as a check on executive power.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has described the coup as "a U-turn" for democracy in Thailand, and the United States has suspended $24 million in military aid under a law that forbids assistance to a country where a democratically elected leader has been deposed in a coup.

But the Foreign Ministry official, Mr. Krit, said this was a minimal response in accordance with United States law and added, "I think they are measuring their response, keeping their eye on what's developing on the ground."

Thai Military May Pick General As Interim PM (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0071937

By Amy Kazmin In Bangkok

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

Thailand's military leaders appear poised to install a retired general and close adviser to the country's revered monarch as interim prime minister, as they seek to fend off international criticism of the coup d'etat that ousted Thaksin Shinawatra as prime minister.

Gen. Surayud Chulanont, former Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces and a member of the privy council of King Bhumibol Adulyadej, was reportedly chosen to head the interim administration, after the generals ruled out other potential candidates, including several with stronger economic backgrounds.

The coup-makers have refused to officially confirm their choice, as protocol requires the king to assent to the candidate before it is publicly announced. But in an apparent slip, Jaruvan Maintaka, who is probing corruption allegations against the now deposed government, said late Thursday that Gen. Surayud would get the job, while other army officials have also dropped broad hints in that direction to Thai reporters.

The coup-makers are expected to name a new premier over the weekend or early next week, as they seek to fulfill their initial promise to transfer power to a civilian government within two weeks.

Gen. Surayud, a known nature-lover who embodies the virtues of humility and respectfulness that Thais traditionally admire in their leaders, won accolades for his leadership of the army, and his efforts to de-politicise the armed forces.

But while the coup-makers insist he has been a civilian since his retirement several years ago, his appointment could heighten the concerns of the international community, already dismayed by the military's seizure of power.

The US on Thursday night suspended $24m in military aid to Thailand, an action required by US law in the aftermath of a coup. But despite international condemnation of the coup – and calls for a quick restoration of democracy, Thailand has so far faced remarkably few repercussions in its relations with the outside world, due to the bloodless coup.

Still, the army has been on an offensive to persuade the outside world that they had no choice but to take control - to prevent a looming violent confrontation between supporters and opponents of the highly divisive Mr Thaksin.

The coup took place a day before Mr Thaksin's critics were due to hold a massive demonstration, despite reports that some government ministers were organising counter-demonstrations with the aim of provoking clashes. The army itself was also reportedly split, raising concerns that factions of the army could end up in conflict.

"If you are driving a train, and you see it may derail or collide with another train and cause damage or loss of life, it make sense if you stop or make a sharp turn to avoid tragedy," Gen. Winai Phattiyakul, the secretary-general of the military's governing council, told foreign journalists on Friday. "That is why we made the decision to have political change."

However, Gen. Winai insisted that the coup-group, which calls itself the Council for Democratic Reform, has no intention of retaining power, and that "we are looking for free and fair elections ahead."

He also said that the interim premier will have a free hand to choose his own civilian Cabinet to run the government for the next year, although the coup group will retain the right to remove the premier should any problem arise.

Over the weekend, the council is unveil an interim constitution, which outlines a seven- to nine-month process for the drafting of a new permanent constitution, before the country holds fresh elections.

Reports: Thailand Selects Interim Leader (AP)

Thailand's coup leaders are likely to appoint a respected former army commander as interim prime minister until promised elections next year, newspapers reported Friday.

Retired Gen. Surayud Culanont, 63, was the ruling military council's top choice to fill the position, major newspapers in Bangkok reported. A formal announcement was expected in the coming days after a draft constitution is approved by the king.

Thailand's auditor general, Jaruvan Maintaka, was quoted as confirming the appointment in a posting on the Web site of the government's Public Relations Department. "Yes, definitely, Gen. Surayud is the prime minister. He is the suitable person," she was quoted as saying.

However, when contacted by The Associated Press later Friday, she denied making the comments. "I didn't say so," she said, without elaborating.

Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, who led the coup that ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, told reporters that a draft constitution has been completed and sent to the Royal Palace. He said he hoped the constitution would be approved by King Bhumibol Adulyadej this weekend, followed by the formal announcement of the prime minister.

The expected appointment of Surayud was likely to be welcomed by many Thais.

Over a 40-year career in the military, Surayud garnered a reputation for effectiveness, tact and incorruptibility, the latter a trait not shared by some past Thai military officers. Upon his retirement in 2003, he was appointed to the Privy Council, the top advisory body to the king.

During his career, he fought Thai communist insurgents and dealt with the sensitive situation along the embattled Cambodian border during the 1980s. He was regarded as being close to the U.S. military, which praised him throughout his career.

A devout Buddhist, Surayud spent time as a monk after leaving the army and often said he had no intention of entering the political fray.

The coup leaders accused Thaksin of corruption and seized power in a bloodless takeover Sept. 19 while he was abroad, vowing to name a civilian prime minister within two weeks.

Large demonstrations early this year demanding his ouster reflected a polarized Thai society, and many Thais have greeted the coup as a resolution of a national crisis.

The United States, which has decried the coup as a setback to democracy, on Thursday suspended $24 million in assistance to Thailand.

The coup leaders, meanwhile, tightened their grip on power by sidelining officers in the military who had been key Thaksin supporters.

In an annual reshuffle of top-ranking officers announced Friday, a number of officers loyal to Thaksin were removed from commands and transferred to either inactive positions or attached to agencies that take them outside the chain of command.

An announcement in official media said the king endorsed the changes.

Two members of the ruling council — Gen. Winai Phattiyakul and Gen. Boonsang Niempradit — were given more powerful positions. Winai, secretary-general of the military council, is to become permanent secretary of the Defense Ministry, while Boonsang was promoted from deputy supreme commander of the armed forces to supreme commander.

Five other army generals who had opposed Thaksin also received promotions.

Winai said he had spoken with Thaksin and that the former prime minister had "decided to leave politics and will take a rest with his family." Thaksin, who is currently in London, had no current plans to return to Thailand, his party said Friday.

Thaksin's only public remarks since being ousted came in a prepared statement two days after the Sept. 19 coup in which he said he wanted to take a "deserved rest" from politics, and was planning to work on research and development and carry out "possible charitable work for Thailand."

The military has already said that Thaksin is welcome back in Thailand, but that a return right now might not be appropriate because of political tensions.

Retired General Seen As Thailand's New Premier (AFP)

By Thanaporn Promyamyai

AFP, September 30, 2006

Thailand's ruling junta has picked a former army chief to be the new prime minister, local media and a government official said, more than a week after the coup that ousted Thaksin Shinawatra.

At the same time, the military -- which refused to confirm or deny the name of their reported pick -- said it was reserving the right to sack the premier under an interim constitution due to be published this weekend.

General Surayud Chulanont, 63, now an advisor to the revered king, had been chosen as the successor to Thaksin, state-run Radio Thailand reported on its website citing auditor general Jaruvan Maintaka.

The choice was "quite certain," it quoted her as saying, adding that he "is the most suitable for the job, given his qualification and his seniority."

Surayud's name was also splashed across the Thai media, although a military source, who asked not to be named, said he had in fact turned the offer down.

The junta's secretary general threw his support behind Surayud and said he figured "on the list" but that no names had been sent for royal approval.

"If it is General Surayud, I like him and I respect him," General Winai Phattiyakul said. "He may be my choice, but I do not have the power to choose the prime minister."

Winai indicated Surayud's army past would not be a bar to getting the post of premier. "We really consider that a retired general is a civilian," he said.

Thailand's new military leaders pledged after taking power on September 19 to appoint a new premier within two weeks to guide Thailand towards elections in October 2007.

"The endorsement of the prime minister and handing down of the Royal Command is expected to take place on Sunday at Government House," said junta spokesman Palangoon Klaharn Friday.

The other main candidate has been former World Trade Organization chief and current head of the UN Conference on Trade and Development, Supachai Panitchpakdi, who has refused to comment.

Whoever their choice, the generals have reserved the right in their interim constitution to sack him.

"The power is in reserve, as it were," said the permanent secretary of the foreign ministry, Krit Garnjana-Goonchorn.

The junta already plans to rename itself the Council for National Security and keep a close eye on the premier and his government.

"If things didn't work out the Council for National Security would not have to resort to non-peaceful means to effect change," Krit said, although adding he did not foresee any condition where they would have to use their power.

The coup, although welcomed by many Thais for ending months of political turmoil, has met with international condemnation.

The United States, Thailand's biggest trading partner and a close ally, on Thursday said it would cut 24 million dollars in military aid in protest.

"The United States continues to urge a rapid return to democratic rule and early elections in Thailand," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

Krit, of Thailand's foreign ministry, brushed off the measure, saying there was "no going back to square one" after decades of democracy.

Thailand's junta on Friday also announced a raft of promotions for military officers who backed last week's coup while sidelining Thaksin supporters.

The changes were announced in an annual reshuffle which had become a point of tension under Thaksin because of fears he was trying to cement his control over the armed forces by promoting loyalists.

A junta spokesman also said the military planned to withdraw tanks and troops from Bangkok by October 4 and hand over security operations to the police.

Surayud was in 1998 appointed the army's commander-in-chief and has been credited with professionalising the force that had been notorious for smuggling, political meddling and human rights abuses.

He retired in 2003, ending a 38-year military career, after he clashed with Thaksin, who had sidelined him to the less influential post of supreme commander.

Surayud then became a Buddhist monk for three months before joining the Privy Council, the inner circle of advisors to King Bhumipol Aduljadeh.

The general -- who has previously said the military should stay out of politics -- said Wednesday he would consider the job if offered to him, in part because he feared possible clashes between Thaksin supporters and opponents.

Newsweek, September 30, 2006

An executive at Singapore's state-owned investment firm discusses the deal that triggered Thailand's political crisis. The company line: don't blame us. WEB EXCLUSIVE

It was the deal that crystallized Thailand's anger. Last January, Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra sold his family telecommunications empire, Shin Corp., to Singapore's government-investment fund, Temasek. The price: $1.9 billion—a sum Thaksin's family pocketed tax-free. In hindsight, the deal was the beginning of the end for Thailand's tycoon-turned-prime minister, who was toppled in a military coup on Sept. 19. Yet the deal that brought him down remains an enigma—both for its complex structure and because Temasek stayed silent as Thailand's political crisis unfolded. During spring political protests in Bangkok, effigies of Temasek CEO Ho Ching were burnt in the streets. More recently, Thai regulators have focused on whether Temasek breached a 49 percent limit on foreign holdings in strategic industries and have been investigating whether some of the consortium companies served as proxies for Temasek to gain control of Shin Corp.

Now, however, the company has come forth with its side of the story. On Sept. 28, Temasek managing director for strategic development Jimmy Phoon revealed key aspects of the transaction that will have an impact on new investigations into Thaksin's alleged corruption. Two key details stand out: he says Temasek was not informed that the sale was structured so that the prime minister's family would avoid taxes, nor was payment made into offshore bank accounts, as has been reported. Phoon insists that Temasek's motivations were purely commercial, rejects the notion that Temasek ignored glaring political risks and bears no responsibility for the Thai crisis. He spoke with NEWSWEEK's Sonia Kolesnikov-Jessop in Singapore. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: Why did you buy Shin Corp.?

Jimmy Phoon: We felt it was a very well run company with sound fundamentals. We believe it's a very good investment that will give us good returns. Moreover, we partnered with reputable co-investors such as Siam Commercial Bank. Underlying the investment is our belief in Thailand's growth potential. In particular, if you look at the telecom industry, the growth will be driven not just by [Thailand's economy] but also by the growing size of the middle-income class.

Who advised Temasek on the Shin Corp. deal?

Goldman Sachs was our international adviser and Hunton and Williams was our domestic advisor on the legal side. SCB Securities also advised us on the takeover offer in Thailand.

Did you receive any independent political risk analysis?

We did do political risk analysis as part of a detailed risk analysis, including industry risk and country risk. We are a long-term investor, and we invest purely on commercial grounds. Our investments are not predicated on which government is in power. We expect changes in environment to happen over time and we had factored in uncertainty as [we do] in all the investments that we make. There are always unforeseen developments.

Were you aware at the time of the deal that it was structured so that the seller would pay no taxes?

No, we were not aware of that. Our advisers were advising us on our side [of the transaction]. From our perspective, we've complied with all the laws and regulations in Thailand, and that's really what our advisers advised us about.

Government investigators in Bangkok suspect that Temasek-backed Thai investment company Kularb Kaew purchased Shin Corp. shares on its behalf, effectively raising Temasek's stake beyond the 49 percent legal limit. How do you respond?

We have not received any formal notification from the Ministry of Commerce regarding their review [of the sale]. Therefore it is not appropriate for us to comment. We've complied with all the laws and regulations and we will continue to cooperate fully with the authorities. We are confident that the outcome of the review by the Ministry of Commerce will be satisfactory as we complied with all laws. Currently, Temasek holds 41.7 percent of Shin Corp. directly through Aspen Holdings, while another 54.6 percent is held by Cedar Holdings, which is a joint venture by Temasek's Cypress Holdings, Siam Commercial Bank and Kularb Kaew. Importantly, the majority shareholder of Cedar is Kularb Kaew, which owns 45.2 percent and together with Siam Commercial Bank controls a majority of Cedar. Kularb Kaew was not a proxy for Temasek.

There's been speculation that you paid Thaksin's family for their stake in Shin Corp. in offshore accounts at the seller's request. Is that true?

This is incorrect. The transaction was done through the stock exchange of Thailand and fully paid for in Thailand. The money was paid in Thailand and there isn't any buyback arrangement plan whatsoever.

Temasek answers to its only shareholder, the Singapore government. How has your shareholder reacted to Shin Corp.'s troubles?

We are responsible to our investor to deliver an appropriate return. All investment decisions are made by the board of Temasek, and the government does not interfere with any decision. Let's be clear: Shin Corp remains a good investment not withstanding what has just happened. We are still invested in Shin Corp. and the underlying performance of [group] companies remains robust. Moreover, our overall portfolio is $81.1 billion [compared to] the Shin deal of $1.9 billion. It has to be looked at in that context.

Recently the Financial Times calculated that Temasek has suffered a paper loss of $820 million on Shin Corp. Is that accurate?

[They] may be quoting the difference in share price from the time when we made the investment and now, but it should be said that during that time the overall stock market in Thailand has also come down. What is very important for a long-term investor is to look at Shin Corp.'s underlying performance.

In view of the current political challenges, what's your investment strategy in Thailand going forward?

Our investment strategy in Thailand remains unchanged. We continue to believe in the long-term fundamentals of the economy, and Thailand fits in very well with our overall investment theme of investing in rising Asian economies and tapping opportunities created by a growing middle class. We see no reason why we should change our investment strategy there.

Does Temasek accept any blame whatsoever for contributing to the fall of Thailand's government?

Of course not!

What lessons have you learned from this experience?

We have invested in many different industries in many countries. We have to accept there will be changes in the [business] environment, the economy and the markets. That's part and parcel of being a long-term investor.

Russia-Georgia Tensions Concern Rumsfeld (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, concluding a visit to the Balkan region Friday, voiced concern to his Russian counterpart about growing tensions between Moscow and Georgia.

"The thread of those discussions clearly was for there to be calm, and for those tensions to be eased down in a peaceful way," Rumsfeld said, when asked about the meeting at a briefing for reporters. He added that relationships between countries often ebb and flow, and "life goes on."

Russia has expressed worries about Georgia's efforts to gain membership in NATO, and the NATO ministers have been trying to calm the rift between the two countries.

Relations between Georgia and Russia became more strained in recent weeks; Georgia detained five Russian officers on spying charges. And an angry Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov called it a "bandit state" and threatened to send two divisions of troops to the border.

Rumsfeld, however, said that "NATO membership really is a decision for individual countries, not for countries other than the individual country."

Rumsfeld was leaving for home pleased with agreements that some two-dozen NATO defense ministers reached there to bolster the alliance's support of the war in Afghanistan.

He spent much of the week trying to drum up more support, resources and troops for the war on terror and the transfer of military control in Afghanistan to NATO.

In visits to Montenegro, Albania and the wide-ranging NATO defense ministers meeting in Slovenia, Rumsfeld urged leaders to provide more equipment and troops for the Afghanistan mission and to join in training in the war on terror.

In one of their key actions, the ministers approved a plan to extend NATO's military control across all of Afghanistan in the coming weeks. The move would put as many as 12,000 American troops under foreign battlefield command, a number that U.S. officials said could be the most since World War II.

Rumsfeld also broke his silence on the much-discussed classified U.S. intelligence report that concludes the terrorist threat to the U.S. has increased. He said efforts to judge whether the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have fueled terrorism would be futile.

And while he did not directly criticize the report, he said that intelligence documents in general can be uneven, and at times "flat wrong."

The National Intelligence Estimate concluded that Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists, who are growing in number and geographic reach. If the trend continues, the analysts said, the risks to the U.S. interests at home and abroad surely will grow.

"Are more terrorists being created in the world? We don't know," said Rumsfeld, adding that there aren't good ways to measure how many terrorists are being trained at camps around the world.

Rumsfeld, who was accompanied on the trip by his wife Joyce, also broke away from his NATO responsibilities for a few hours to indulge one of his passions — horses. He toured the Lipica Stud Farm, an historic resort in the scenic rolling hills near the Slovenia-Italy border, where Lippizaner horses have been bred and trained since 1580.

He took a horse-drawn carriage tour of the farm and watched riders train the horses — whose ancestors were rescued by U.S. Gen. George Patton in an infamous military operation during World War II.

Dispute Between Georgia, Russia Escalates (WP)

By Peter Finn, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Moscow Alleges Provocation as Court Extends Detention of Officers Facing Espionage Charges

TBILISI, Georgia, Sept. 29 -- A Georgian court on Friday ordered four Russian military intelligence officers to be held for two months on espionage charges in a pretrial detention center, a decision that could prolong and deepen the heated dispute over alleged spying here.

"Russia cannot comprehend this court ruling," Russian Vice Consul Viktor Kortenov told reporters after the court hearing, which was closed to the news media. "It is unclear why a Russian lawyer was not admitted to the proceedings."

Russia's ambassador to Georgia, Vyacheslav Kovalenko, left the country Friday after being recalled by his government to protest the arrest of the Russian officers. He departed with more than 80 diplomats and their families, who were flown home by two Russian Emergency Ministry planes. Russia advised its citizens not to travel to Georgia, citing safety reasons.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov, who held talks with ministers from the NATO alliance Friday in Slovenia, complained bitterly about Georgia's actions. Ivanov charged that Georgia was provoking a conflict to try to oust Russian forces from two breakaway parts of Georgia that pledge loyalty to Moscow.

Russia describes its forces in South Ossetia and Abkhazia as peacekeepers, but the Georgians assert that they are propping up illegitimate separatist governments that obtained de facto independence after defeating Georgian forces in the early 1990s.

"It is absolutely clear to us that Georgia has chosen the military route for settling the conflicts in Abkhazia and South Ossetia," Ivanov said after the NATO meeting. "All the rest follows from that." Georgia, he said, is making "appeals to the international community that Russia is to blame for everything, including the cold weather that hit Georgia last winter."

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld called on Russia and Georgia to exercise restraint, as did other defense ministers at the meeting. "The thread of those discussions clearly was for there to be calm, and for those tensions to be eased down in a peaceful way," Rumsfeld said.

NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer called for "moderation and de-escalation, and that goes for both parties."

DOJ_NMG_0071943

In Moscow, police cordoned off the Georgian Embassy and arrested a small group of nationalists who held a brief protest outside the building. In Tbilisi, Georgian police continued to surround a Russian military headquarters where they say a fifth Russian officer facing spying charges is hiding.

At Friday's court session, 10 Georgian citizens alleged to have been working with the Russians were accused of high treason and ordered into pretrial detention. Georgian officials say that the Russian officers were gathering classified information on Georgia's cooperation with NATO.

Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili is determined to take Georgia, a former Soviet republic, into the Western military alliance, an ambition that infuriates Moscow. The military alliance agreed last week to step up discussions with Georgia on possible membership.

"NATO membership really is a decision for individual countries and not for countries other than the individual countries," Rumsfeld told reporters Friday.

Russian legislators continued to call for tough sanctions against Georgia. Yury Volkov, a deputy speaker of the lower house of the Russian parliament, said Russia should freeze bank accounts and suspend or annul business contracts with Georgia.

He didn't specify whether that could include cuts in energy supplies to Georgia, which imports Russian natural gas.

Spy Rift Has Roots In Separatist Feud (WSJ)

Georgia Hopes Arrests Get West to Help Push Russians Out of Breakaway Enclaves

Georgia's arrest this week of several Russian military officers is more than a run-of-the-mill case of alleged espionage, it is also an attempt to prompt quick international intervention to end Moscow's grip over separatist enclaves in Georgia, officials and diplomats familiar with the matter say.

The gambit is risky, however, in a volatile region where Russian and Western interests are clashing over expansion by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, energy pipelines and democratization. Georgia -- which fears it soon may lose the disputed territories permanently -- could succeed in provoking Russia, but fail in securing Western support. The European Union in particular is reluctant to confront Russia, a strategic supplier of oil and natural gas, in its backyard, officials say.

Western diplomats say they are sympathetic to Georgia's desire to end the status quo in its two separatist areas, Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which split from Georgia during the breakup of the former Soviet Union and have been under protection of Russian-led peacekeepers ever since. But Western diplomats say it has to be done prudently.

"There is a sense in Georgia that the international community is not supporting them enough, and for that reason, by taking spectacular actions of this kind, they can raise attention to their problems," said a senior European diplomat who deals closely with Georgia.

As Russia on Friday evacuated about 80 official personnel and their families from Georgia, the already-tense relationship between the two neighbors hit a new low. Russia said its citizens were at risk in the country, after Georgia on Wednesday arrested five Russian military officers on espionage charges. A court in Tbilisi, the Georgian capital, on Friday ordered that four of the officers and 10 Georgian nationals be held for two months. The fifth Russian officer was released, while Georgian police are pursuing a sixth who has taken refuge in Russia's military headquarters in Tbilisi.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov branded Georgia a "bandit state" and, at a NATO defense ministers' meeting in Slovenia Thursday night, demanded that NATO stop entertaining Georgia's attempts to join the Western military alliance. Russia told an emergency session of the United Nations Security Council Thursday that the arrests were a "dangerous" provocation by Georgia, while some Russian legislators warned darkly that Russia should use "any means" to get its soldiers back.

Denying in an interview that the arrests were designed to provoke Russia, Nino Burdzhanadze, the Georgian Parliament's powerful chairwoman, called the matter a "serious case." She said the interior ministry acted on information that the alleged spies were about to carry out an operation. While declining to describe the plot, she claimed it involved energy and noted that last winter the pipeline that supplies Georgia with Russian natural gas was blown up just inside Russia.

Georgia is an increasingly important corridor for pipelines bringing gas and oil from the Caspian region to the West, skirting Russia and Iran. This year, a million-barrel-per-day oil pipeline started pumping crude from the Caspian Sea to Turkey's Mediterranean coast via Georgia. Later this year, a natural-gas pipeline will start operation. And last week, Western investors who own the oil terminal on Georgia's Black Sea coast formed a joint venture with Kazakhstan's national oil-and-gas company, KazMunaiGaz.

With European Union peacekeepers stretched from Lebanon to Afghanistan, and little willingness to anger Russia -- Europe's largest supplier of natural gas at a time of energy scarcity -- the Georgian strategy is "extremely risky," the European diplomat said. "There is not a whole lot of tolerance at this moment for more conflicts, particularly if they are seen as avoidable."

Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili last week said in a speech to the United Nations that he would ask Russian-led peacekeepers to leave the enclaves, to be replaced by the U.N., the EU or another international organization. The U.S. and European governments persuaded him not to specify a timetable, fearing an ultimatum would precipitate a crisis, according to European and Georgian officials involved.

A senior U.S. State Department official said that, while some countries have lost their appetite for getting involved there since a series of pro-Western governments swept to power in the region in recent years, the U.S. "absolutely and definitely" has not. However, even the U.S. -- which is less dependent on Russian energy than Europe -- has reason to avoid angering Russia. Moscow's support is critical, for example, in getting U.N. sanctions to pressure Iran to give up its nuclear-fuel program, a key U.S. foreign-policy goal.

Georgia, however, is in a hurry. Russian President Vladimir Putin has warned that if the West grants independence to Kosovo, the largely ethnic-Albanian province of Serbia, as expected next year, then Russia would consider it a precedent for the two Georgian enclaves and another in Moldova.

It isn't clear Moscow would act on its threat to recognize Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which could open a Pandora's box over the legitimacy of Russia's own borders. But separatists in Moldova recently voted in a referendum to unify with Russia, and South Ossetia is due to hold a referendum on independence next month.

"Of course Russian peacekeepers will stay there, whatever Georgia says," said Vyacheslav Nikonov, president of the Moscow think tank Politika Foundation, who has close ties to the Kremlin. Noting that the borders of the former Soviet republic were drawn by Stalin, he says, "Why is Stalin's will more important than the principle of self-determination?"

Russia's Nato Arms Claim Turns Up Heat In Georgia Dispute (FT)

By Fidelius Schmid In Portoroz

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

Russia on Friday raised the temperature of a simmering spy dispute with Georgia, accusing Nato member states of illegally supplying arms to the former Soviet republic.

Russian diplomats were on Friday being evacuated from Georgia – a day after Moscow recalled its ambassador – in response to the arrest this week of four Russian army officers, who faced a Tbilisi court on Friday accused of spying for Russian military intelligence. They were formally charged with espionage, which carries a maximum sentence of 10 years' imprisonment, and told they would be detained for at least a further two months.

After a tense meeting with Nato defence ministers in Slovenia, Sergei Ivanov, Russia's defence minister, accused eastern European members of the alliance of illegally selling Soviet-made arms to Georgia. "These Nato members are violating international practice," Mr Ivanov said. "This is a form of piracy."

Mr Ivanov declined to name the countries but referred to "the younger generation of Nato members", presumably meaning the seven former eastern bloc nations that joined Nato in 2004. According to Moscow, some of these countries sell on defence products ac-quired from Russia to Georgia, in breach of the original contracts with Russia.

According to diplomats, the Russian minister indignantly expressed his concerns over the affair to Nato ministers. After the meeting, Mr Ivanov said Georgia's arrest of the soldiers was an attempt to force his nation's troops out of the country so Georgian authorities could pursue a “military solution” to conflicts in the two pro-Russian breakaway provinces of South Ossetia and Abkhazia.

They said Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Nato’s secretary-general, had told Mr Ivanov that arms sales to Georgia were not illegal, since there was no embargo. But they added that Nato ministers had urged that the dispute be handled calmly. “The thread of those discussions clearly was for there to be calm, and for those tensions to be eased down in a peaceful way,” said Donald Rumsfeld, US defence secretary.

Relations between Georgia and Moscow have been tense since the pro-western administration of President Mikheil Saakashvili took over from Eduard Shevardnadze in 2003.

Georgia is seeking to become a member of the 26-member alliance and last week received the green light to intensify its co-operation with Nato.

Moscow condemned this move as a throwback to the days of the cold war. Mr Ivanov even threatened last week to send Russian troops to the border with Georgia to ensure that “Russia’s security won’t be hurt if Georgia enters Nato”. Mr Ivanov said on Friday there was no link between Georgia’s aspirations for Nato membership and the current rift with Tbilisi.

Mr Rumsfeld insisted that Georgia was free to seek Nato membership. “Nato membership really is a decision for individual countries, not for countries other than the individual country,” Mr Rumsfeld said.

Russia May Revise Georgia Troops Plan (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Filed at 1:32 a.m. ET

TBILISI, Georgia (AP) -- Russia warned on Friday that its plans to close military bases in Georgia were in doubt and Georgia claimed Russia was moving troops near their shared border, as relations between the countries deteriorated in one of their worst crises since the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Tensions between Russia and Georgia, which have increased since pro-Western President Mikhail Saakashvili came to power in 2003, escalated after the arrest in Georgia on Wednesday of four Russian military officers accused of spying.

Russia has recalled its ambassador, evacuated some diplomats and their families and issued a formal protest to the United Nations. Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov has denounced Georgia as a "bandit" state.

Georgia on Friday accused Russia of redeploying additional troops closer to the border and said the Russian Black Sea fleet was expected to start maneuvers in the next few days. "I would advise our colleagues to stop saber-rattling. "This is unacceptable for a democratic country and we don't understand that," Interior Minister Vano Merabishvili told reporters.

Since gaining power in the Rose Revolution, Saakashvili has pledged to move the country out of Russia's orbit, take control of breakaway provinces of Abkhazia and South Ossetia and join NATO in 2008. Georgia's pro-Western course has vexed the Kremlin, and Georgian authorities accused Russia of backing separatists.

Tbilisi courts on Friday ordered the four Russian officers remanded in custody for two months, Anzor Khvadagiani, a Tbilisi prosecutor, told The Associated Press. A fifth serviceman also arrested Wednesday was released the next day for lack of evidence. The courts also extended the arrest of 10 Georgian citizens accused of involvement in a Russian spy ring.

Georgian Defense Minister Irakly Okruashvili said on Imedi television late Friday that the detained Russian officers could be returned to Russia. "I don't exclude such a possibility," Okruashvili said.

At the United Nations, the United States late Friday proposed major changes to a Russian statement expressing "deep concerns" about Georgia's actions. The U.S. did not publicly disclose the proposed changes but Russia's U.N. Mission said "the American proposals and amendments change the nature of the draft ... and that makes the acceptance of the presidential statement impossible."

Gen. Andrei Popov, commander of Russian military forces in Georgia, said Russia's obligation to close its two remaining military bases in Georgia by the end of 2008 still stands, but added that "if our servicemen are arrested and put in custody, there will be problems with the withdrawal since there will be no people left to prepare weapons for the pullout," the Interfax news agency reported.

Popov's spokesman, Col. Vladimir Kuparadze, confirmed his statement.

Russia has between 3,000 and 4,000 troops at its two military bases in Georgia proper, and 2,500 peacekeepers deployed to separatist regions of Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

Ivanov, meeting Friday with NATO members in Slovenia, said the arrests were aimed at pushing Russian troops out of Georgia so the government could seize control of the breakaway provinces by force, and he accused unnamed newer NATO members of illegally supplying Georgia with Soviet-made weapons.

"It is absolutely clear to us that Georgia has chosen the military path, the forceful path, for resolving the conflicts in South Ossetia and Abkhazia," he said, adding that Georgia's actions were "to push Russian peacekeepers out by any means possible ... and then to submit an application to join NATO."

Two Russian planes, meanwhile, evacuated 84 diplomats and their relatives from Georgia, officials said. The Russian ambassador to Georgia, Vyacheslav Kovalenko, said after returning to Moscow that families of all Russian military in Georgia also will depart, Interfax reported.

Georgian police surrounded the Russian military headquarters in Tbilisi on Friday, hoping to detain another Russian officer accused of spying. Russia has refused to surrender the officer.

In Moscow, police blocked streets around the Georgian Embassy. They allowed some 20 nationalists to protest briefly against Georgia's president before detaining them for holding an unsanctioned rally.

Russia's ultranationalist leader Vladimir Zhirinovsky called on Friday for "the most resolute action, up to the deployment of forces and air raids." A Kremlin-connected lawmaker, Konstantin Kosachev, said Moscow would not yield to what he called Georgia's provocation and stressed that "any forceful measures are absolutely excluded."

Separately, an official in South Ossetia claimed that masked Georgian officers shot out the tires of a car carrying four Russian peacekeepers, a woman and a child Thursday night, then ordered the men out and beat them. One peacekeeper sustained a fractured skull, according to the internationally unrecognized South Ossetian government, and Ivanov said there was proof they were "brutally beaten."

Georgian officials denied the allegations, saying police stopped a car with Russian peacekeepers, checked their documents and released them.

Russia's Foreign Ministry advised its citizens to refrain from traveling to Georgia, citing security concerns, and its embassy in Tbilisi stopped issuing visas to Georgian citizens.

Saakashvili denounced the moves as hysteria.

NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer called for "moderation and de-escalation, and that goes for both parties," and a U.S. State Department official said both sides had to work toward a solution.

Matthew J. Bryza, in Berlin for diplomatic consultations on Abkhazia, also told journalists that "Georgia has expressed its sovereign view ... that it doesn't want Russian peacekeepers on its territory. There is a question of what is prudent, and what is the most effective way of asserting that right in the case of Tbilisi."

In Russia, Psychiatry Is Again A Tool Against Dissent (WP)

By Peter Finn, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

DUBNA, Russia -- On March 23, police and emergency medical personnel stormed Marina Trutko's home, breaking down her apartment door and quickly subduing her with an injection of haloperidol, a powerful tranquilizer. One policeman put her 78-year-old mother, Valentina, in a storage closet while Trutko, 42, was carried out to a waiting ambulance. It took her to the nearby Psychiatric Hospital No. 14.

The former nuclear scientist, a vocal activist and public defender for several years in this city 70 miles north of Moscow, spent the next six weeks undergoing a daily regimen of injections and drugs to treat what was diagnosed as a "paranoid personality disorder."

"She is also very rude," psychiatrists noted in her case file.

In person, Trutko presents a different profile, reserved and formal as she recounts her legal and psychiatric ordeal and invokes the minutiae of Russian law without having to refer to texts. An independent evaluation found that although she did not have an "ordinary personality," she was "very gifted and creative" and displayed no psychiatric symptoms.

Trutko is new evidence that Soviet-style forced psychiatry has reemerged in Russia as a weapon to intimidate or discredit citizens who tangle with the authorities, according to human rights activists and some mental health professionals. Despite major reforms in the early 1990s, some officials are again employing this form of repression.

"Abuse has begun to creep back in, and we're seeing more cases," said Lyubov Vinogradova, executive director of the Independent Psychiatric Association of Russia, an advocacy group. "It's not on a mass scale like in Soviet times, but it's worrying."

In those years, tens of thousands of dissidents were wrongfully subjected to forced hospitalization, sometimes for years, based on trumped-up diagnoses of "schizophrenia." Dissidents were said to exhibit inflexibility of convictions and nervous exhaustion brought on by anti-government activities. "Reformist delusions," the Soviets called it. If you were against communism, in other words, you were insane.

Some of the new cases have been abetted by institutions or doctors involved in it in the Soviet period. Trutko, who is originally from Uzbekistan, was diagnosed at the Serbsky Institute for Social and Forensic Psychiatry in Moscow, one of the most infamous of the Soviet institutions that imprisoned dissidents. It remains a secretive institution that has never faced up to its repressive past, according to human rights groups.

As recently as 2001, the institute's director, Tatyana Dmitriyeva, denied that the Soviet Union engaged in any more psychiatric abuse than Western countries, according to the report "Human Rights and Psychiatry in the Russian Federation" by the Moscow Helsinki Group.

One of signatures on Trutko's official evaluation, which declared she had paranoid personality disorder, is that of Yakob Landau, a longtime Serbsky psychiatrist who headed the institute's notorious Unit No. 4 during Soviet days.

Officials at the institute, a walled and forbidding complex in central Moscow, said no one was available to comment for this article. Investigators in Trutko's case declined to comment.

The charge that psychiatry is again being abused is not universally accepted within the profession. "The problem of forced treatment or psychiatric persecution existed more than 20 years ago, but it was solved. And since then I haven't heard of any case of forced psychiatric examination or treatment," said Vladimir Rotstein, president of Public Initiative on Psychiatry, an advocacy group.

The Independent Psychiatric Association, however, says that the number of activists being wrongfully hospitalized in mental facilities totals dozens of cases in recent years and is increasing. Doctors and the courts are complicit with investigators who insist on a forced psychiatric evaluation or treatment, it says. Activists have also documented an increase of family or business disputes in which wrongful hospitalization provides an opening to seize a person's property, Vinogradova said.

Most of the targeted activists are not affiliated with major human rights groups. Rather, like Trutko, they are stubborn gadflies who are involved in long-running feuds with local authorities. Their sometimes intemperate complaints against authorities are used to open criminal investigations for slander. This allows authorities to seek hospitalization. Unlike Soviet dissidents, these activists are put away for relatively short periods of a week to several months.

Roman Lukin, a businessman in the Volga River city of Cheboksary, was hospitalized last year for "unexplainable behavior" after he held up a sign on a public square calling three judges "creeps." Seeking redress for a bad debt that ruined him, Lukin felt he had not received justice from the courts. He spent two weeks in the local psychiatric hospital, which recommended that he undergo further examination at a specialized clinic in Moscow for possible "paranoid personality disorder." Independent Psychiatric Association specialists evaluated Lukin and found no sign of mental illness.

Nikolai Skachkov, who protested police brutality and official corruption in the Omsk region of Siberia, was ordered to undergo a psychiatric evaluation last year because investigators said they suspected he was suffering from "an acute sense of justice." He spent six months in a closed psychiatric facility where he was diagnosed as paranoid. The association, which conducted a separate evaluation earlier this year, found that he was healthy.

"Psychiatry in this country has always been a tool of the authorities, a tool for managing people and pressuring people. And it still is," said Boris Panteleyev, head of the St. Petersburg Committee for Human Rights.

In an interview in her apartment, Trutko recounted her own long run-in. "Now I have this stamp on my forehead that I am a psychiatric patient," she said. "I will always have this medical record now. That means I cannot go to court because judges say I'm a psycho and call for an ambulance."

Trutko is well known in the courts in this town, having argued dozens of court cases against the local authorities and police. She is studying to be a lawyer, and for several years has acted as a public defender, as advocates without law degrees are called here.

Her troubles with mental health authorities began four years ago in a courtroom in Dmitrov, about 35 miles from Dubna.

Trutko asserted that the judge displayed bias against her client in a property dispute, and she moved to have the judge withdrawn. She also complained that the judge was not wearing her robe as required and that the Russian flag was improperly displayed. The judge, who later left the bench and could not be reached for comment, alleged that Trutko said, "Look at that fat pig sitting up there," according to legal papers.

Prosecutors opened a criminal case against Trutko on charges of contempt of court. In July 2003, the court ordered Trutko to undergo an involuntary psychiatric evaluation. Psychiatrists at the hospital said she was uncooperative, illogical and displayed emotional reactions that were "not adequate" -- a common phrase here for mental illness.

The Independent Psychiatric Association questioned these conclusions. Its own evaluation of her, conducted by four psychiatrists, found that "she is not an ordinary personality, but a very gifted and creative person. . . . No psychiatric symptoms were observed. She shows high intellectual ability and good memory. She does not need any treatment."

Trutko continued to battle the criminal complaint in court. Before a hearing at the higher Moscow regional court, she filed a motion seeking the removal of a panel of judges from her case, again asserting bias. In this case there was no claim of verbal abuse, but prosecutors said her motion amounted to slander and contempt.

In April 2004, after leaving a hearing on her case in Moscow, Trutko was detained by investigators and taken to the Serbsky Institute. It was a Friday evening when she was admitted and there was no expert commission available to evaluate her, Trutko said. Human rights groups protested her detention and threatened legal action. Trutko said she was released the following Tuesday morning without having undergone any formal examination by psychiatrists.

But the institute issued a six-page evaluation that said she suffered from a "paranoid personality disorder." The condition manifested itself in her "subjectivity," her "tendencies to verbal aggression," her "suspicious" personality and her "inability to understand the peculiarities of interpersonal relations and communication," medical records show.

The report recommended that she undergo forced hospitalization and treatment.

In September 2004, a Moscow court approved that approach. But the authorities, for reasons that remain unclear, did not act on the order until they stormed Trutko's apartment earlier this year.

Despite her subsequent release, Trutko said, the court order remains in effect and she could be institutionalized again at any time. "My career is ruined," she said. "I just stay at home."

Russia's Titans Of Energy Prepare For Acquisitions (WSJ)

By GREGORY L. WHITE

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

MOSCOW -- Russia's state-controlled energy giants are gearing up for a new round of acquisitions that could give the Kremlin ownership of nearly half the country's oil production, the highest level since privatization of the Soviet industry began more than a decade ago.

Industry executives and others close to the situation say state oil company OAO Rosneft is seeking at least several billion dollars of financing to buy many of the remaining assets of OAO Yukos at state-mandated bankruptcy auctions in coming months. OAO Gazprom, the majority state-owned natural-gas giant, this week said it would be interested in buying out the Russian partners who now hold half of TNK-BP Ltd., a joint venture with BP PLC that is the third-largest oil producer in Russia.

TNK-BP's main Russian shareholders -- tycoons Mikhail Fridman, Viktor Vekselberg and Len Blavatnik -- haven't expressed a public desire to sell and company officials insist they continue to behave as committed long-term investors. But several people familiar with their thinking say that if the Kremlin were to indicate a desire for them to sell, they would likely agree as long as the price were reasonably fair.

Since it crushed Yukos with back-tax claims starting in 2003, the Kremlin has steadily reasserted control over the energy sector. While the growing state ownership is popular in Russia, pro-market government officials and analysts warn that it is likely to reduce efficiency and raise doubts about the outlook for production growth in the world's No. 2 oil-exporting country behind Saudi Arabia.

The current terms of the agreement between TNK-BP's Russian shareholders and BP requires the consent of both sides for any sale before the end of next year. But given the importance of maintaining good relations with the government here, BP would likely agree to a Kremlin-supported deal, according to people close to the company.

There are no discussions on a deal with Gazprom under way at the moment, however, and no deal is likely before next year, according to people close to the companies. But Alexander Ryazanov, the chief executive officer of Gazprom's oil unit, on Thursday said his company would be interested in buying the TNK-BP stake were it to come up for sale. He said it would be "no problem" for Gazprom to raise the money needed, which could be as much as $25 billion.

People close to the companies said his comments are partly an attempt to warn off potential rival bidders, especially Rosneft. In July, BP spent $1 billion to buy shares in Rosneft's initial public offering, helping the Kremlin meet its price target for the politically important issue.

People close to BP said the company might prefer working with Rosneft, which is much less bureaucratic and more business-oriented than Gazprom. But having ties with both state companies could also be an asset.

A deal with Gazprom, for example, might help unlock TNK-BP's massive Kovykta gas project in Eastern Siberia. That development has largely been blocked by Gazprom to date, and regulators are threatening to revoke the license to the project.

But one person close to Rosneft said that company isn't interested in TNK-BP's portfolio of largely older assets. A few newer TNK-BP projects in East Siberia might be of interest were they up for sale, this person said.

Rosneft's current focus, according to people close to the company, is the remaining assets of Yukos due to be auctioned in the next few months. Rosneft already bought Yukos's biggest unit after a controversial government auction in December 2004. Next to come on the block are two big oil-production units, as well as several refineries and regional marketing networks. Rosneft is said to be particularly interested in the profitable refining and marketing assets. Yukos's bankruptcy administrator will select a company in mid-October to value the assets before sale.

But Rosneft could face competition in the auctions from Gazprom, as well as Russia's big remaining private oil companies, OAO Lukoil and OAO Surgutneftegaz. Foreign companies aren't expected to participate. Rosneft has something of an advantage in the process, because it has about $5 billion of claims against Yukos already included in the bankruptcy proceedings and several billion more awaiting confirmation by a court.

U.N. Says Israel Blocked Investigators (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Israel refused to give a U.N.-appointed investigation access to the officials who may have been responsible for the bombing of an observation post that killed four unarmed peacekeepers at the height of the conflict with Hezbollah, the United Nations said Friday.

Israel said the bombing of the U.N. peacekeeping post along the Israeli-Lebanese border was a mistake that occurred at the "operational level." The U.N. panel investigating the killings was not allowed to interview commanders at that level to determine what happened, U.N. spokesman Stephane Dujarric said in a statement.

The statement was delivered shortly after the Board of Inquiry investigating the attack submitted a confidential report with its findings to the U.N. and to the four nations whose observers were killed — Austria, Canada, China and Finland. The report was not sent to Israel.

Dujarric's statement said it concluded that there was nothing else the United Nations could have done "that would have changed the outcome."

The four observers were killed by an Israeli precision-guided bomb that destroyed the bunker where they took shelter after their observation post near the town of Khiam came under heavy fire. U.N. officials in New York and Lebanon had repeatedly warned Israel that the observation post, built 30 years before, was under attack.

Because of Israel's refusal, the inquiry was "unable to determine why the attacks on the U.N. position were not halted despite repeated demarches to the Israeli authorities from U.N. personnel, both in the field and at headquarters," Dujarric said.

Israel has blamed inaccurate maps for its mistake, and said the airplane that dropped the bomb thought it was targeting Hezbollah. Hezbollah was active in the area, with a post about 150 yards away.

Asked to comment on Dujarric's statement, the spokeswoman for Israel's U.N. mission, Anat Friedman, said: "Israel has expressed its regret for the unfortunate event and has investigated the tragic incident."

Friedman refused to comment on the U.N. claim that the investigators had not been allowed to interview some officials.

A U.N. official said Israel never sufficiently explained why it kept bombing the base.

"We do not have a satisfactory answer as to why those attempts failed," said the official, who spoke anonymously because the report was confidential. "The Israelis are fully aware of our position on this incident."

The official said there was nothing in the Board of Inquiry's findings to contradict U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan's earlier claim that the attack was "apparently deliberate."

The Man Who Would Be Kofi (TIME)

South Korea's quiet 'harmonizer' Ban Ki-Moon leads the race to lead the U.N.

The lowest point of South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon's two-year tenure came in June 2004, when a Korean translator working in Iraq was captured and beheaded on video by insurgents. The brutal act enraged the South Korean public, many of whom opposed the planned dispatch of further Korean troops to Iraq, and much of that anger was directed squarely at Ban and the Foreign Ministry. Taxis in Seoul refused to pick up foreign service officers, and there were public calls for Ban's resignation. But instead of panicking, Ban calmly announced that he would be reassessing the ministry, eventually adding a 24-hour telephone hotline that South Koreans abroad could call if they needed help. The rage dissipated, Ban has gone on to become one of South Korea's most respected foreign ministers — and Korean soldiers still made it to Iraq, much to the satisfaction of their U.S. allies

It was a trademark performance by the man who calls himself a "harmonizer" — quiet but effective. Now Ban, a Harvard-educated diplomat who has served his country for 36 years in New Delhi, Washington and at the United Nations, may face the ultimate diplomatic challenge. After winning Thursday's most recent straw U.N. Security Council straw poll, Ban has solidified his status as the front-runner in the race to replace Secretary-General Kofi Annan, who is required to step down after completing his second term in the job at the end of 2006. If Ban wins — a big if, given the unpredictable politics of Secretary-General races — he'd be the first Asian to lead the U.N. since the Burmese diplomat U Thant in the 1960s. And it would be a big win for South Korea, which in many ways is the U.N.'s best success story, fighting off a North Korean invasion and rising from the ashes of war to become one of the world's most vibrant economies, all with significant help from the U.N. That explains why South Korea's normally contentious politicians — fistfights between opposing parties are not uncommon in the country's parliament — have united behind Ban's candidacy.

It helps as well that the soft-spoken and French-fluent minister seems incapable of making enemies. Though relations between South Korea and Japan are worse today than they have been in decades, Japanese diplomats generally like the 62-year-old Ban himself. That matters, as Japan is currently holds one of the 10 rotating seats on the Security Council. Ban has also received enthusiastic support from Australia. But the deciding vote will likely be cast by China, one of the Council's five veto-wielding permanent members. If the South Korean is viewed by Beijing as too close to Washington, he may find China cool to his candidacy. Ironically, however, there's also a danger that South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun's rocky relationship with

Washington could cool U.S. support for Ban. Another drawback is his lack of international stature. Ban's highest-profile role has been in the Six-Party talks to defuse North Korea's nuclear ambitions, which ultimately yielded almost nothing — although that frustrating experience could be good practice for life in the U.N. But in a race typically won by the candidate most widely viewed as least objectionable, the collegial South Korean is clearly a frontrunner.

The Best Intentions: Kofi Annan and the UN in the Era of American World Power

by James Traub

Bloomsbury £20, 464 pages

Kofi Annan is likely to be remembered as one of the most significant secretary-generals in United Nations history, yet remarkably little is known about the quiet Ghanaian. A global figure who still appears uncomfortable in the public gaze, he remains mysterious even to many near him.

James Traub's The Best Intentions goes some way towards revealing the personality of this lifetime UN man. As secretary-general since 1997, Annan has served in a period of extraordinary upheaval and expansion for the world body, and has come to symbolise its unique position as the US and the rest of the world struggle to define a new international system.

From mid-2004, the New York Times magazine journalist spent more than a year following the secretary-general and his entourage. Fresh from the UN's agonies over the war in Iraq, Annan - who won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2001 - found himself under attack for his management, and faced allegations of abuse of power over Iraq's oil-for-food programme.

The soft-spoken bureaucrat's natural inclination is to conciliate rather than fight. Traub tells how Annan lost his voice, and for a period almost disappeared. Then he returned to strength to advocate one of the UN's most ambitious reform processes - albeit with limited results.

Annan appears set to leave office this year with a well-documented bang. For the UN's critics, and those with questions about his personal conduct over oil-for-food, Traub's book, the first of this crop, will disappoint.

Traub tends to give Annan the benefit of the doubt over questions surrounding his son. He focuses more on his and the institution's response to mounting US pressure, and what it revealed about the UN's systematic flaws. He does little to explore unanswered questions about possible wrongdoing.

Yet those who imagined Traub would defend Annan on all counts are in for a surprise. This book offers a tough appraisal of his record, and leaves even a sympathetic reader with an uneasy impression that there may be rather less to Annan than they imagined.

On Bosnia and Rwanda, referring to Annan's time as head of peacekeeping, Traub is unforgiving. On Srebrenica he writes: "I asked if he felt, in retrospect, that he and his colleagues had refused to look the truth in the eye... and he said: 'We had to rely on the commanders on the ground. They made judgements...'" Traub describes this as "a surprisingly impersonal and guilt-free answer".

On Rwanda, Annan "paused, and thought, and paused a bit more. 'In retrospect', he finally said, '...we should have used the media more aggressively, and exposed the situation for them to see. Of course, at that time this organisation was media shy.' And that was it."

Later, when Annan was persuaded to usher in a new team at the height of the oil-for-food crisis, Traub says his horror of confrontation, "his cowardice, really", first postponed, then "unnecessarily exacerbated" the pain of removing confidante Elizabeth Lindenmayer.

The tales are not all so harsh. Annan emerges as a basically decent man tested by events that the best of us would struggle to survive. But such asides are striking from a journalist not tainted with the "right-wing" tag of the UN's harshest American detractors.

Traub's book is about much more than Annan. It is about the post cold-war rise of the US, its growing disaffection with multilateralism, and the UN's painstaking efforts to bring it back into the fold. One wonderful chapter, "Romancing Cousin Jesse", describes the courting and semi-conversion of Senator Helms, a UN critic, as Team Annan desperately tried to get Washington to pay its arrears. As he left a lunch with leading UN lights, "the senator was heard to murmur, 'Ah've met a lot o'nahce people'," Traub says.

Despite his analysis of US-UN relations and attempts to inject UN reform efforts with drama, it is the character portraits that demand most attention. Former political chief Kieran Prendergast is deliciously savage about the shifts around him; comments by and about UN number two Mark Malloch Brown, and Shashi Tharoor, the "splendiferous" secretary-general aspirant now heading the information department, show how the place ticks.

Traub is both sympathetic and deeply critical - a reaction familiar to anyone who knows the UN well. "I liked the people around Annan," he confesses. They were mainly "highly intelligent people who had seen a great many things" and "who believed deeply in the UN's mission, no matter how acutely aware they were of its failures."

Eurozone Enjoys 'Goldilocks' Recovery (FT)

By Ralph Atkins In Frankfurt

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

The eurozone economy is for now enjoying a "Goldilocks" recovery – not too hot, not too cold. Inflation has fallen to the lowest for more than two years, while business and consumer confidence has soared to a fresh five-year high, official figures indicated on Friday.

Tumbling energy prices led to eurozone inflation falling from an annual rate of 2.3 per cent in August to 1.8 per cent in September, according to Eurostat, the European Union's statistical union. That was the lowest since March 2004 and the first time since January 2005 that inflation has been within the European Central Bank's target range – "below but close" to 2 per cent.

The drop creates a presentational challenge for the ECB, which is expected to raise its main interest rate by another quarter percentage point, to 3.25 per cent, at a meeting in Paris next week. The ECB will probably cite the volatility of monthly figures, and longer-term inflationary pressures – including those from a faster-growing economy. A three percentage point rise in German VAT in January, will also push inflation higher.

Separately, a European Commission survey suggested robust growth in the eurozone, which exceeded the US in the second quarter, was continuing. The institution's "economic sentiment" index, covering businesses and consumers, leapt from 108.3 in August to 109.3 in September – the highest since February 2001.

"The eurozone is enjoying a resilient and broad-based economic upswing that is not generating any major inflationary tensions," said Holger Schmieding, economist at Bank of America. Italy saw a particularly sharp rise in confidence, taking its index to the highest since June 2000.

However, economists fear fiscal tightening in Germany and Italy, a possible slowdown in the US and a stronger euro could soon spoil the current upbeat mood.

"It is a Goldilocks situation, I agree. The question is what happens next year," said Dirk Schumacher, economist at Goldman Sachs.

A reminder of the eurozone's weak spots came from German data that showed the country's consumers were still failing to spring to life – in spite of the economic upswing. German retail sales were unchanged in August after a 0.8 per cent fall in the previous month, according to the Federal Statistics Office.

In sharp contrast, French consumers' spending on manufactured goods leapt 3.3 per cent in August.

The poor summer weather in August, after an exceptionally hot July, had been expected to encourage more people into the shops. Germans were also expected to step up purchases to beat the VAT rise.

But economists stuck to the view that this year would bring some overall improvement. With energy prices falling and the VAT increase looming, "strong retail sales can be expected over the final months of this year, before January brings a serious slump," said Ralph Solveen, economist at Commerzbank.

DOJ_NMG_0071953

Separately, France reported an unexpected rise in unemployment in August. The jobless rate rose to 9.0 per cent in August from 8.9 per cent in July.

'Liberal' Europe? (WSJ)

By Matthew Kaminski

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

LYON, France -- To get a measure of where things stand in the battle of ideas in Europe today, one can do worse than check out the "summer university" put on by the Continent's center-right parties here last weekend. I found myself on a panel to discuss globalization and offered that conservatives might do well -- at the voting booth and otherwise -- to push free trade, liberalize markets, rein in farm subsidies and keep Europe's door open to Turkey. Nothing controversial for this crowd, I assumed, with the possible exception of the last.

The reality check arrived from a German Christian Democrat. "For us, a human being is not only a function of production," he lectured from the floor. "Our voters are not signing up to . . . your neoliberal, neoconservative agenda." (Jeesh, I hadn't even mentioned Iraq.) A senior European executive sitting nearby passed a note, "Please tell him one can be Christian and Democratic and liberal."

Maybe so. Yet the German politician served up a good reminder that conservatism doesn't necessarily mean the same thing on this side of the Atlantic. In Europe's biggest country, as well as in France, right-wing rulers remain wedded to the nanny state -- which emerged with Bismarck -- and to close alliances with guilds and big business that tend to stifle competition. In her day, Margaret Thatcher never felt welcome on the Continent.

A lot has changed since the Iron Lady resided at 10 Downing Street. In spite of some recent victories for the dirigistes, the momentum is with free-market ideas, thanks in part to formerly communist Central Europe, whose zest for capitalism proved infectious back West.

Imagine an arc that starts with Spain, where former conservative Prime Minister José María Aznar planted strong reform roots, which the ruling Socialists haven't strayed from. Continue to Britain and Labour's Tony Blair, who embraced Thatcherism. Then come the Nordic countries that, despite their reputation as welfare utopias, implemented innovative policies to revive stagnant economies. Swedes can use vouchers for schools and other public services; the country dropped the death tax and partially privatized pensions. (Take note, GOP strategists.) Next week a new center-right government comes into office in Stockholm with a pledge to cut taxes, privatize companies and hospitals, and end political control over universities.

Alas, the story line shifts dramatically in the heart of Europe -- France and Germany. On the American spectrum, the nominally conservative politicians who lead both countries would be found somewhere left of the Democrats. German Chancellor Angela Merkel last year failed to win a clear mandate, forcing her into a "grand coalition" with the Social Democrats. With this unwieldy government in place, economic reform has gone nowhere. And even so, her Christian Democratic electoral platform was a hodge-podge, calling for a flat tax as well as a large hike in the VAT. (No prize for guessing which was implemented.) The center-right has been burned in two consecutive elections; many members blame their association with unpopular free-market policies.

The ruling Gaullists in France are even more unabashedly statist than the German right. With his recent success in saving Europe's farm subsidies, keeping Chinese T-shirts out of stores and Polish plumbers and other workers from crossing borders, blocking pan-European takeovers -- the list goes on -- President Jacques Chirac is arguably the greatest champion of what Americans might call leftist policies in Europe. His prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, this year made "economic patriotism" the fig leaf du jour for protectionism of all kinds.

Yet the campaign for next year's presidential elections is livening up the French debate. The leading candidate on the right, Nicolas Sarkozy, wants a break with the Gaullists. Mr. Sarkozy mocks the idea of a French "social model," saying it's neither social (what with chronic unemployment) nor a model (who wants to copy it?). Where Mr. Chirac represents the status quo, Mr. Sarkozy says France must move with the times, citing Britain and America as examples. "Sarkozy has decided to create a quasi-cultural revolution in this country by shooting down the myths, the phony 'consensus' that we have had," says Pierre Lellouche, a

French MP and Sarkozy adviser. "For the first time the right is becoming right again." On the left, Ségolène Royal also challenges Socialist shibboleths by praising Blairism and saying globalization isn't all bad.

By next spring France is sure to see a generational change. But don't set hopes too high for one of ideas as well, says Alain Madelin, the country's most prominent laissez-faire politician. The Socialist old guard detests Ms. Royal. Mr. Sarkozy may be "pro-business" or "for lower taxes," but Mr. Madelin asks: "Does Sarkozy understand the mechanism of the market? No. His instinct is to intervene." And free-market ideas don't sell well on election day, says Mr. Madelin, who should know. He won 3.91% in the 2002 presidential vote.

Traditional labels, smudged elsewhere these days, are even less helpful to understanding politics in Europe. Best to set aside the old straight left-right line. Mr. Madelin suggests a return to the triangle used in the 19th century with conservatives, socialists and liberals (or free-marketers) at each point. The liberals are gaining in strength but have found, and need, supporters in both camps.

It can be confusing and surprising; the great intangible seems to be the quality of leadership, of which Europe hasn't had a surfeit in recent years. So Italy's Romano Prodi, leading a center-left coalition since spring, in the early days has proved far more audacious in prying open his country to competition than his predecessor, the "pro-free market" media tycoon Silvio Berlusconi, was in five years in power. The imminent departure of the conservative Mr. Chirac -- no matter who wins -- looks likely to boost liberal economic ideas.

Yes, the battle is raging and its outcome far from decided.

Security Council To Get Resolution On Myanmar (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council held its first official meeting to discuss Myanmar on Friday, and the United States announced that it was preparing a resolution to pressure the regime to release political prisoners and stop flows of drugs, AIDS and refugees that Washington says are destabilizing the region.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton pushed hard to get Myanmar on the council's agenda despite objections from several quarters, and eased the way with unofficial briefings on an impending humanitarian crisis there.

Bolton said he overcame resistance from China and Russia, who believe Myanmar does not pose a grave threat to the international order; U.N. officials who have been working quietly behind the scenes to win the confidence of the country's rulers; and European allies "who thought it wasn't a priority."

"We didn't put this issue on the agenda just to have briefings," said Bolton, adding that the U.S. would present the resolution "in the very near future."

The U.N.'s chief of political affairs, Ibrahim Gambari, briefed the council on humanitarian problems in the country of 55 million and announced that he would make a second trip there soon to talk to the military regime about restoring political freedom and democracy.

Myanmar refused overtures from the U.N.'s special envoy for two years, but finally received Gambari in May. He said the country has made "measured progress" on public health and is developing a national action plan on HIV/AIDS.

Gambari argued for a careful approach that would not undo incremental progress by the reclusive regime. "We cannot simply assume that turning up the heat will yield results," he said. "Nor can engagement be an end by itself. It should lead to meaningful results."

Myanmar's foreign minister criticized the Security Council in a speech at the U.N. on Tuesday for treating his country like a threat, and he said the Southeast Asian nation has been implementing a seven-step road map to democracy.

"Myanmar has done nothing that can undermine the peace and security of any country, let alone regional or international peace and security," Foreign Minister Nyan Win said in a speech to the General Assembly.

The military has run Myanmar under various guises since 1962, and the current group of generals has been in power since 1988.

Aung San Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy won a landslide election victory in 1990 but was denied power by the junta.

Myanmar, formerly known as Burma, has become a popular political cause in the United States. Suu Kyi, its charismatic opposition leader who won the Nobel Peace Prize and has been under house arrest on and off for two decades, has helped galvanize world support for democratic reforms. First Lady Laura Bush was the host of a round table on the issue last week during the General Assembly meeting.

Rival To Panama Canal Planned (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar And Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

Nicaragua intends to spend $20 billion on a new Central American waterway that was initially proposed in the 19th century.

MEXICO CITY — Seeking to cash in on booming Asian exports, Nicaragua will announce a $20-billion proposal next week to build a canal linking the Pacific and the Atlantic oceans that would accommodate ships too large to use the Panama Canal, Nicaraguan officials said Friday.

If approved by Nicaragua's Congress, the project would be a joint public-private venture financed by unnamed investors, said Lindolfo Monjarretz, a spokesman for Nicaraguan President Enrique Bolanos.

The Grand Inter-Oceanic Nicaragua Canal would make use of the 60-mile-wide Lake Nicaragua and follow at least part of a route first proposed by American and European entrepreneurs in the 19th century, officials said.

"We will have a deeper draft than the Panama Canal and reach a different market than Panama," Monjarretz said in a telephone interview. "The construction of the canal … will be pushed forward by Nicaragua because it's necessary for global trade."

The official announcement will come Monday, when Nicaragua plays host to a summit of Western Hemisphere defense ministers, including U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Monjarretz said.

With the century-old Panama Canal expected to soon reach the limit of its capacity, a boom in Asian commerce is fueling several proposals for new projects to ship containers across the Central American isthmus.

The Panama Canal, opened in 1914, cannot accommodate vessels that are more than 106 feet wide and 965 feet long. On Oct. 22, Panamanians will vote on a referendum to expand their country's facilities. The proposed $5.25-billion upgrade would allow vessels with double the current tonnage to use the 50-mile-long waterway.

Rodolfo Sabonge, a top official of the Panama Canal Authority, the quasi-independent body that has run the canal since the United States turned it over to Panama in 1999, said Friday that there was insufficient ship traffic to support both a widened Panama Canal and a second canal in Nicaragua.

"If the referendum passes and the widening goes forward, [the Nicaraguan project] is not feasible," Sabonge said. "Our analysis shows that if our project is approved, there would not be enough demand to pay for the two, and they would have to have a cost structure much higher than ours."

Recent polls show that nearly two-thirds of Panamanian voters favor expanding the canal. If approved, the project calls for work to begin next year, with completion expected in 2014.

Private investors are behind at least two other so-called dry-canal projects across Nicaragua and neighboring Honduras that would include new highway and rail links connecting expanded Pacific and Caribbean ports on either side of the isthmus.

"Obviously they are trying to compete with the Panama big locks project," Geraldine Knatz, executive director of the Port of Los Angeles, said of the Nicaraguan proposal.

"But Panama has spent years studying this project, looking at the economics and doing the engineering," Knatz added. "This is not something you just decide on overnight…. It would be a big catch-up for Nicaragua to step in and do this."

Knatz said she favored an expanded Panama Canal. "I can look out ahead to a time when the West Coast is not going to be able to handle all of the volume," Knatz said, noting that the Port of Los Angeles, the nation's busiest container facility, would reach capacity between 2020 and 2025.

Ships currently must reserve passage through the Panama Canal up to several months in advance. Those lacking a reservation can be forced to wait as long as four days for an open slot to cross from the Pacific to the Caribbean.

For years, shipping lines have called for the Panama Canal to be enlarged so that it could accommodate bigger oil tankers and containerships larger than the so-called Panamax generation of vessels, which are specifically designed to allow them to transit the canal.

Nicaraguan President Bolanos told reporters in Managua, the capital, last week that his government had been studying a canal proposal for "six or seven years." He said Nicaragua's canal would take a decade to build and when completed would be more modern than Panama's.

"We know that for every 100 ships that come to the Americas, only 7 use the Panama Canal," he said, according to Nicaraguan media reports. "There's a lot of business to share."

If a Nicaraguan canal were built, "it would bring an economic effervescence never seen before in Central America," Bolanos said.

Spokesman Monjarretz said that the Nicaraguan government had been in informal talks with private investors and that an announcement Monday would formalize an agreement. He declined to elaborate.

Nicaragua has been considered for a canal project since the mid-19th century, when increased shipping traffic from the California Gold Rush created a demand. At one point, railroad baron Cornelius Vanderbilt held an exclusive contract to build a canal there.

Although a canal was never built, thousands of pioneers made the transit disembarking from ships at San Juan del Norte on the Caribbean coast, trekking overland by stagecoach to Lake Nicaragua, crossing the lake by boat, then making their way to the nearby Pacific coast.

Nicaragua was seriously considered for the U.S.-built canal that was ultimately constructed in Panama in the early 1900s. A Nicaraguan postage stamp depicting a large volcano helped stoke fears among U.S. congressmen that an earthquake or volcanic eruption would hit the area.

Now, Panamanian President Martin Torrijos and other officials are warning that failure to widen the Panama Canal will invite competing projects, jeopardizing the nation's single-largest source of revenue.

In recent years, Japanese and Chinese investors, among others, have reportedly met with Nicaraguan officials to discuss a possible canal project.

New impetus to the efforts in Central America has come from the global explosion in world trade. Container traffic last year grew 4.8% worldwide.

Mike Wasem, spokesman for the Port of Tacoma, Wash., the West Coast's fourth-largest, said a large-scale canal system in Nicaragua "would certainly give shippers greater waterborne access to the Gulf Coast and the East Coast of the United States."

But he added that Nicaragua faced significant competition from projects already underway to build international container facilities at Prince Rupert, Canada, and Lazaro Cardenas, Mexico.

A Nicaraguan canal would pose little threat to U.S. West Coast ports, he said. "It would provide an additional outlet for a volume of cargo that is expected to grow beyond the current ports' expansion options."

Failure to boost capacity on the West Coast of the U.S. — or to expand cross-isthmus traffic in Central America — could lead to expanded use of the Suez Canal for shipping from East Asia to Europe, some analysts say.

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Disputes Book's Report Of Anti-Rumsfeld Moves (WP)

By Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

New revelations that White House aides tried twice in the past two years to persuade President Bush to fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld fueled a caustic election-season debate yesterday over the president's wartime leadership and underscored divisions within his administration.

The latest book by Washington Post journalist Bob Woodward, "State of Denial," paints a portrait of an administration riven by personal and policy disagreements exacerbated by a deteriorating situation in Iraq that has grown even worse than Bush admits to the public. In Woodward's account, Bush has become increasingly isolated as his team has rejected advice to shift gears in Iraq before it is too late.

The White House tried yesterday to dismiss the significance of Woodward's assertions, while Democrats eagerly seized on the book to bolster their campaign attacks five weeks before midterm elections. Coming days after the partial release of a National Intelligence Estimate concluding that the Iraq conflict has spread the "global jihadist movement," the latest disclosures kept the focus on the missteps and consequences of an unpopular war.

The book reports that then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. twice suggested that Bush fire Rumsfeld and replace him with former secretary of state James A. Baker III, first after the November 2004 election and again around Thanksgiving 2005. Card had the support of then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and his successor, Condoleezza Rice, as well as national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and senior White House adviser Michael J. Gerson, according to the book.

Even first lady Laura Bush reportedly told Card that she agreed Rumsfeld had become a liability for her husband, although she noted that the president did not agree. "I don't know why he's not upset with this," she told Card, according to the book. But Vice President Cheney and senior Bush adviser Karl Rove argued against dumping Rumsfeld, and Bush agreed.

The book details how Rumsfeld alienated key figures throughout the government and military: Rice complained that Rumsfeld would not return her telephone calls, forcing Bush to personally intervene. Rumsfeld rebuffed Card when he conveyed Bush's order to send National Guard troops to Louisiana after Hurricane Katrina until hearing from the president himself. Gen. John P. Abizaid, the senior U.S. commander in the Middle East, concluded that "Rumsfeld doesn't have any credibility anymore."

It also reports on ultimately futile attempts by civilian officials to persuade the Bush team to send more troops to Iraq and outlines secret government findings about escalating attacks on U.S. troops and dire forecasts about the war worsening over the next year rather than improving.

The White House has been bracing for weeks for the book, which is scheduled for release next week and will be excerpted in The Washington Post tomorrow and Monday. Woodward, a Post assistant managing editor, has built a career on producing bestsellers with sensational revelations from unnamed sources that touch off Washington furors and send politicians racing to explain themselves.

The White House cooperated extensively with Woodward's first two books on the Bush presidency, "Bush at War" and "Plan of Attack," granting him extraordinary access, including four interviews with the president. The books were criticized by some as overly favorable to Bush. But the White House seems to have anticipated that Woodward's third book would take a more critical view, and Bush declined to speak with him for it.

After the New York Times managed to buy an early copy of "State of Denial" and reported on it on yesterday's front page, Bush aides frantically called Woodward and asked for copies, which he sent over. A squadron of White House aides then spent hours tearing through the book and doing quick research to try to undercut its more damaging elements. They settled on a strategy of disputing certain conclusions while broadly dismissing it as old news.

"In a lot of ways, the book is sort of like cotton candy -- it kind of melts on contact," White House spokesman Tony Snow said at a briefing dominated by the topic. "We've read this book before. This tends to repeat what we've seen in a number of other books that have been out this year where people are ventilating old disputes over troop levels." Snow said it was well known that events in Iraq have been difficult and that officials have debated the right approach. "Rather than a state of denial," he said, "it's a state of the obvious."

Senate Democrats beat Snow to the punch and called their own news conference about the book two hours earlier, before they even had a copy. The title alone quickly became a Democratic mantra throughout the day. House Minority Leader Nancy

Pelosi (D-Calif.) said four times at a separate briefing that Bush was "in denial," and Democrats released a series of statements and "fact sheets" trumpeting the line.

"The president himself is out of touch with reality, is in denial as to what is happening in Iraq," Pelosi said. "That could be the only explanation for why he has withheld the truth to the American people."

Rumsfeld, traveling overseas, said he has not read the book, and he declined to discuss it. A spokesman said the Pentagon would have no comment. Card, Hadley, Gerson and the first lady's office declined to comment or did not return telephone calls. But Snow, speaking on behalf of Laura Bush, said the first lady's office called Woodward's account "flatly not true." And Snow quoted Rice as saying of her reported dispute with Rumsfeld: "This is ridiculous, and I told that to Woodward."

Card confirmed to ABC News yesterday that he suggested replacing Rumsfeld with Baker after the 2004 election as part of broader changes to the Cabinet, but he denied to news services that he led "a campaign" to oust the defense secretary.

""But were there times that we talked about potential changes in the Cabinet? Yes. Did they center around Rumsfeld? Not necessarily. They were in a broader context." He denied that Laura Bush encouraged an effort to remove Rumsfeld. "Mrs. Bush and I never discussed it," Card told the Associated Press.

The book also reports that then-CIA Director George J. Tenet and his counterterrorism chief, J. Cofer Black, grew so concerned in the summer of 2001 about a possible al-Qaeda attack that they drove straight to the White House to get high-level attention.

Tenet called Rice, then the national security adviser, from his car to ask to see her, in hopes that the surprise appearance would make an impression. But the meeting on July 10, 2001, left Tenet and Black frustrated and feeling brushed off, Woodward reported. Rice, they thought, did not seem to feel the same sense of urgency about the threat and was content to wait for an ongoing policy review.

The report of such a meeting takes on heightened importance after former president Bill Clinton said this week that the Bush team did not do enough to try to kill Osama bin Laden before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) said her husband would have paid more attention to warnings of a possible attack than Bush did. Rice fired back on behalf of the current president, saying the Bush administration "was at least as aggressive" in eight months as President Clinton had been in eight years.

The July 10 meeting of Rice, Tenet and Black went unmentioned in various investigations into the Sept. 11 attacks, and Woodward wrote that Black "felt there were things the commissions wanted to know about and things they didn't want to know about."

Jamie S. Gorelick, a member of the Sept. 11 commission, said she checked with commission staff members who told her investigators were never told about a July 10 meeting. "We didn't know about the meeting itself," she said. "I can assure you it would have been in our report if we had known to ask about it."

White House and State Department officials yesterday confirmed that the July 10 meeting took place, although they took issue with Woodward's portrayal of its results. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, responding on behalf of Rice, said Tenet and Black had never publicly expressed any frustration with her response.

"This is the first time these thoughts and feelings associated with that meeting have been expressed," McCormack said. "People are free to revise and extend their remarks, but that is certainly not the story that was told to the 9/11 commission."

Tenet and Black did not respond to messages yesterday.

White House Disputes Book's Account Of Rifts On Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29 — The White House on Friday dismissed a new book's portrayal of division and discord inside the Bush administration, suggesting that the account by Bob Woodward had been provided by former aides who believed that their advice on troop levels and other questions of strategy in Iraq had been ignored.

Even as the White House scrambled to obtain a few copies of the book, "State of Denial," to be released Monday, administration officials were rebutting specific examples in Mr. Woodward's account, which described sharp clashes and long-running feuds fueled by the debate over the war. But other administration officials, speaking only if they were not identified, said the details in the book reflected a breakdown of discipline in an administration that once prized its ability to keep its disputes in-house.

"Look, this is a war, and you are going to have a lot of really smart people with completely different opinions," Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said at a briefing on Friday afternoon.

In Washington, Mr. Snow said, "you're going to see people who are on the losing side of arguments being especially outspoken about their opinions." He added, "The average Washington memoir ought to be subtitled, 'If they only listened to me.' "

But Mr. Snow had difficulty explaining why President Bush had failed to listen to such a broad range of officials who had called for more troops, including Robert D. Blackwill, the former top Iraq adviser, and L. Paul Bremer III, the senior American official running the occupation. Nor did Mr. Snow explain why Mr. Bush's upbeat assessments of a "Plan for Victory" in Iraq, laid out in speeches late last year, contrasted so sharply with the contents of classified memorandums written by officials who warned that failure was also a significant possibility.

Some of those memorandums were written by Philip D. Zelikow, a counselor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, including one in early 2005 in which Mr. Zelikow characterized Iraq as "a failed state" two years after the invasion, and another in September 2005, in which he said there was a 70 percent chance of success in achieving a stable, democratic state. That meant, Mr. Zelikow said, that there was a 30 percent chance of failure, including what he called a "significant risk" of "catastrophic failure," meaning a collapse of the state Mr. Bush has tried to create.

Mr. Zelikow declined to comment on Friday, apart from confirming the accuracy of the words from the memorandums Mr. Woodward cited in the book.

Other senior State Department officials dismissed the book's account as a familiar one. "This just in — Condi and Rumsfeld argue a lot," one said. "Didn't we know that?"

In the past, State Department officials have described extreme tension between the two over Ms. Rice's sense that Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld was not paying enough attention to detention issues, beginning with the abuses at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq that came to light in 2004.

The book contends that Andrew H. Card Jr., as White House chief of staff, urged Mr. Bush to replace Mr. Rumsfeld. In a telephone interview on Friday, Mr. Card confirmed that he had raised the issue, but suggested that Mr. Woodward had ignored the context. "Right after the election, I went to Camp David and talked to the president, and we talked about a lot of changes, starting with the chief of staff," Mr. Card said, recounting how he used to tote around what he called his "hit by a bus book," a notebook of lists of potential replacements for senior White House staff members and top cabinet officials.

"It's not inaccurate to say that we talked about Rumsfeld," he said. "I can understand why Bob would try to create a climate around these conversations." But he added: "There was no campaign, and I didn't go out and solicit others to back any view about getting rid of anyone. I could talk about these things with the president, and plant seeds, because there is a cadence to life in Washington and you raise these issues periodically."

Mr. Card acknowledged that he renewed the question of replacing Mr. Rumsfeld this year, but again insisted that it was not part of a specific effort to single out the defense secretary for removal.

Many of the episodes Mr. Woodward describes in his book have not been previously disclosed, but others have been reported in other books and news accounts.

Mr. Woodward, the Washington Post reporter and author, cites several instances where Gen. John P. Abizaid, the commander of American forces in the Middle East, criticized Mr. Rumsfeld to top officials.

On Friday, however, Maj. Chris Karns, a spokesman for the United States Central Command, said General Abizaid had denied ever telling visitors in Qatar that Mr. Rumsfeld "doesn't have any credibility anymore" to make the case for strategy in Iraq.

"General Abizaid has nothing but the greatest respect for Mr. Rumsfeld," Major Karns said.

The book also recounts a recommendation by Mr. Blackwill in September 2003 that 40,000 more troops were needed in Iraq. Mr. Blackwill refused on Friday to discuss his recommendation but said that Ms. Rice, then the national security adviser, and her deputy, Stephen J. Hadley, "were always more than willing to give me as much time as I wanted to make my arguments." It was unclear whether Mr. Blackwill's view was passed on to the president.

The White House went to extra lengths to dispute Mr. Woodward's portrait of Mr. Bush as a president who viewed news from Iraq through the best possible lens and who failed to come to grips with reports of a deteriorating security situation. "A couple of weeks ago, the president was being accused of trying to scare people," Mr. Snow told reporters. "Now, all of a sudden, he's accused of looking at the world through rose-colored glasses. Neither one is true."

The memorandums Mr. Woodward writes about — and others that have come to light, including a National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism and Iraq's role in inspiring terrorists that the White House declassified in part this week — suggest a more complex picture.

The memorandums and intelligence estimate clearly describe escalating terrorism, rising anti-Americanism and the risks of failure. Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice, among others, acknowledged the rising difficulties, but consistently expressed optimism about eventual victory.

In October 2005, for example, shortly after Mr. Zelikow's memorandum stating that there was a 30 percent chance of failure, Ms. Rice, in an interview with the BBC, referred to "a few violent men who can always wreak havoc, who can always grab the headlines, who can always kill innocent men, women and schoolchildren," but she would not be drawn into predictions of how long the insurgency could go on.

Mr. Bush's record is similarly complex. Last November, he began a series of speeches describing a strategy for victory. Mr. Card defended those speeches Friday, saying, "Nothing is 100 percent, but in the case of Iraq, failure is not an option."

The State Department also disputed the book's description of a meeting between George J. Tenet, then the director of central intelligence, and Ms. Rice on July 10, 2001, two months before the Sept. 11 attacks. The book describes the meeting as a heated one in which Mr. Tenet hoped to "shake Rice" into developing covert and overt plans to stop Osama bin Laden from attacking.

But Ms. Rice and other State Department officials denied that was the case, noting that the report of the Sept. 11 commission, which had testimony from Mr. Tenet and others at the meeting, made no mention of the July 10 encounter.

"The recollections as portrayed in the Woodward book in no way reflect the public and private testimony under oath of those individuals to the 9/11 commission," said Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman.

Book Details Attempts To Oust Rumsfeld (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

The White House disputes Woodward's account that the first lady backed one effort. A second book says Powell was forced out.

WASHINGTON — President Bush's then-chief of staff tried to convince the president to fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on at least two occasions in the last two years, once with the support of First Lady Laura Bush, according to a new book by author and journalist Bob Woodward.

The first of the attempts by Andrew Card, made in November 2004, was thwarted by Vice President Dick Cheney, a longtime friend of Rumsfeld's, and Karl Rove, the White House political chief, who felt any move against Rumsfeld would be seen as an acknowledgment that the Iraq war was on the wrong course. The second effort, made a year later, came with Laura Bush's backing, the book says.

Some of the assertions in the book, "State of Denial," were made public Friday by Woodward's newspaper, the Washington Post, after other news organizations acquired copies ahead of Monday's official publication date. A spokesman for Simon & Schuster, the publisher, said the book's release had been moved up to today because of the disclosures.

The White House on Friday did not contradict Woodward's account of Card's efforts to oust Rumsfeld. But Tony Snow, Bush's spokesman, denied that either of the efforts were supported by the first lady, saying her office dubbed the suggestion "flatly not true."

Card "was asked to take a look at everybody, including himself," Snow said at a news conference. "It's typical — as a matter of fact, quite often in administrations at this point, people are asked to submit their resignations. The president's commander in chief. He picks."

Asked about the book's contents by reporters traveling with him at a NATO meeting in Slovenia, Rumsfeld said he had not read the account — or Woodward's previous books on the war. "I wouldn't hold your breath on this one," Rumsfeld said.

Another upcoming book on the Bush administration, a biography of former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell by Washington Post editor Karen DeYoung, will report that Powell was forced out of his job.

The account contradicts statements by the White House at the time — as well as Powell's own resignation letter — which made it appear that his decision to leave following the 2004 election was mutual. The excerpt from the book, "Soldier: The Life of Colin Powell," obtained by the Los Angeles Times ahead of next week's publication, recounts how Card broke the news to an unsuspecting Powell.

" 'The president would like to make a change,' [Card] said, using a time-honored formulation that avoided the words 'resign' or 'fire,' " the book says.

The two books add to a growing chorus of former administration officials, retired generals and onetime war supporters who have broken ranks and spoken out against a White House once renowned for its tight lips and reverence for loyalty.

Indeed, the White House on Friday sought to dismiss the Woodward book as a repeat of old allegations, arguments over troop levels and bitter recriminations from former officials whose advice was not taken.

Despite White House efforts, however, Woodward's book — like his two preceding tomes on Bush's stewardship of the war in Iraq, "Bush at War" and "Plan of Attack" — hit Washington like a major movie opening, with details spilling out in advance and interviews scheduled by CBS' "60 Minutes" and CNN's Larry King.

The first two Woodward books were so laudatory that White House aides gave them to each other as Christmas gifts. "Plan of Attack" was even listed as recommended reading on the Bush campaign's reelection website. However, "State of Denial" prompted backpedaling by the White House and was embraced by congressional Democrats, who cited it as further evidence of the administration's mismanagement of the war.

Among the famous names in the book is Henry Kissinger, President Nixon's secretary of State during the Vietnam War. Woodward reports Kissinger has been a frequent visitor at the White House, offering Bush advice on Iraq.

"Now, what's Kissinger's advice?" Woodward said in his "60 Minutes" interview. "In Iraq, he declared very simply, 'Victory is the only meaningful exit strategy.' This is so fascinating. Kissinger's fighting the Vietnam War again, because in his view, the problem in Vietnam is we lost our will."

Woodward's account of the widening divisions within the administration over Iraq policy relies on at least four separate, privately written assessments that were submitted to senior administration officials detailing dire predictions for Iraq if the White House did not change course.

One of those assessments, Woodward recounts, is a secret intelligence estimate prepared in May by the intelligence division of the U.S. military's Joint Chiefs of Staff. It predicts that violence in Iraq will increase during 2007. The conclusion is similar to a National Intelligence Estimate prepared earlier this year, portions of which were declassified this week by Bush.

Another secret assessment revealed by Woodward is a 15-page memo prepared early last year for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice by longtime friend and State Department Counselor Philip Zelikow, who wrote that Iraq was a "failed state shadowed by constant violence." Zelikow's memo was delivered to Rice even as the administration continued to insist Iraq was stabilizing.

Rumsfeld himself received a private assessment from a close friend, Steve Herbits, in July 2005. The seven-page memo asked Rumsfeld who was responsible for several miscues in Iraq — including the disbanding of the Iraqi army and the overreaching effort to rid the Iraqi government of members of Saddam Hussein's Baath party — and bluntly informed the Defense secretary of how colleagues viewed "Rumsfeld's style of operation."

"Indecisive, contrary to popular image," Woodward writes, quoting the memo by Herbits, a former Seagram's executive who has worked as a Pentagon consultant. "Would not accept that some people in some areas were smarter than he."

The fourth assessment was written in September 2003 to Rice by Robert D. Blackwill, a former National Security Council advisor, warning that more ground troops — perhaps as many as 40,000 — were needed to stabilize Iraq.

Woodward writes that the White House did nothing in response, though Snow on Friday disputed that claim, noting that Rumsfeld had said in one interview that he recalled receiving the Blackwill memo and ordered it be taken seriously.

DeYoung's book on Powell contains an account of a similar warning given to Bush by Powell in their last meeting at the White House. Powell used the January 2005 Oval Office meeting, intended to be a "farewell call," to "unload," DeYoung recounts.

"The war in Iraq was going south, [Powell] said after a few moments of small talk, and the president had little time left to turn it around," DeYoung wrote, adding that Powell warned not to expect too much progress to emerge from upcoming Iraqi elections. "There would be a window of about two months after the election 'to start to see progress,' he told Bush. 'If by the first of April this insurgency is not starting to ameliorate in some way, then I think you really have a problem.' "

A Portrait Of The President As The Victim Of His Own Certitude (NYT)

By Michiko Kakutani

In Bob Woodward's highly anticipated new book, "State of Denial," President Bush emerges as a passive, impatient, sophomoric and intellectually incurious leader, presiding over a grossly dysfunctional war cabinet and given to an almost religious certainty that makes him disinclined to rethink or re-evaluate decisions he has made about the war. It's a portrait that stands in stark contrast to the laudatory one Mr. Woodward drew in "Bush at War," his 2002 book, which depicted the president — in terms that the White House press office itself has purveyed — as a judicious, resolute leader, blessed with the "vision thing" his father was accused of lacking and firmly in control of the ship of state.

As this new book's title indicates, Mr. Woodward now sees Mr. Bush as a president who lives in a state of willful denial about the worsening situation in Iraq, a president who insists he won't withdraw troops, even "if Laura and Barney are the only ones who support me." (Barney is Mr. Bush's Scottish terrier.) Mr. Woodward draws an equally scathing portrait of Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, who comes off as a bully and control freak who is reluctant to assume responsibility for his department's failures, and who has surrounded himself with yes men and created a system that bleached out "strong, forceful military advice." Mr. Rumsfeld remains wedded to his plan to conduct the war in Iraq with a lighter, faster force (reflecting his idée fixe of "transforming" the military), even as the situation there continues to deteriorate.

Mr. Woodward reports that after the 2004 election Andrew H. Card Jr., then White House chief of staff, pressed for Mr. Rumsfeld's ouster (he recommended former Secretary of State James A. Baker III as a replacement), and that Laura Bush shared his concern, worrying that Mr. Rumsfeld was hurting her husband's reputation. Vice President Dick Cheney, however, persuaded Mr. Bush to stay the course with Mr. Cheney's old friend Mr. Rumsfeld, arguing that any change might be perceived as an expression of doubt and hesitation on the war. Other members of the administration also come off poorly. Gen. Richard B. Myers is depicted as a weak chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who routinely capitulated to the will of Mr. Rumsfeld and who rarely offered an independent opinion. Former C.I.A. director George J. Tenet is described as believing that the war against Iraq was a terrible mistake, but never expressing his feelings to the president. And Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice (who appears in this volume primarily in her former role as national security adviser) is depicted as a presidential enabler, ineffectual at her job of coordinating interagency strategy and planning.

For instance, Mr. Woodward writes that on July 10, 2001, Mr. Tenet and his counterterrorism coordinator, J. Cofer Black, met with Ms. Rice to warn her of mounting intelligence about an impending terrorist attack, but came away feeling they'd been given "the brush-off" — a revealing encounter, given Ms. Rice's recent comments, rebutting former President Bill Clinton's allegations that the Bush administration had failed to pursue counterterrorism measures aggressively before 9/11.

As depicted by Mr. Woodward, this is an administration in which virtually no one will speak truth to power, an administration in which the traditional policy-making process involving methodical analysis and debate is routinely subverted. He notes that experts — who recommended higher troop levels in Iraq, warned about the consequences of disbanding the Iraqi Army or worried about the lack of postwar planning— were continually ignored by the White House and Pentagon leadership, or themselves failed, out of cowardice or blind loyalty, to press insistently their case for an altered course in the war.

Mr. Woodward describes the administration's management of the war as being improvisatory and ad hoc, like a pickup basketball game, and argues that it continually tried to give the public a rosy picture of the war in Iraq (while accusing the press of accentuating the negative), even as its own intelligence was pointing to a rising number of attacks against American forces and an upward spiral of violence. A secret February 2005 report by Philip D. Zelikow, a State Department counselor, found that "Iraq remains a failed state shadowed by constant violence and undergoing revolutionary political change" and concluded that the American effort there suffered because it lacked a comprehensive, unified policy.

Startlingly little of this overall picture is new, of course. Mr. Woodward's portrait of Mr. Bush as a prisoner of his own certitude owes a serious debt to a 2004 article in The New York Times Magazine by the veteran reporter Ron Suskind, just as his portrait of the Pentagon's incompetent management of the war and occupation owes a serious debt to "Fiasco," the Washington Post reporter Thomas E. Ricks's devastating account of the war, published this summer. Other disclosures recapitulate information contained in books and articles by other journalists and former administration insiders.

But if much of "State of Denial" simply ratifies the larger outline of the Bush administration's bungled handling of the war as laid out by other reporters, Mr. Woodward does flesh out that narrative with new illustrations and some telling details that enrich the reader's understanding of the inner workings of this administration at this critical moment.

He reports, for instance, that the Vietnam-era Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger "had a powerful, largely invisible influence on the foreign policy of the Bush administration," urging President Bush and Vice President Cheney to stick it out. According to Mr. Woodward, Mr. Kissinger gave the former Bush adviser and speechwriter Michael Gerson his so-called 1969 salted peanut memo, which warned President Richard M. Nixon that "withdrawal of U.S. troops will become like salted peanuts to the American public; the more U.S. troops come home, the more will be demanded."

As with Mr. Woodward's earlier books, many of his interviews were conducted on background, though, from the point of view of particular passages, it's often easy for the reader to figure out just who his sources were. In some cases he recreates conversations seemingly based on interviews with only one of the participants. The former Saudi Arabian ambassador Prince Bandar bin Sultan, Mr. Card, Mr. Tenet, Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage and Brent Scowcroft, the former national security adviser (to Bush senior), appear to be among the author's primary sources.

Whereas Mr. Woodward has tended in the past to stand apart from his narrative, rarely pausing to analyze or assess the copious material he has gathered, he is more of an active agent in this volume — perhaps in a kind of belated mea culpa for his earlier positive portrayals of the administration. In particular, he inserts himself into interviews with Mr. Rumsfeld — clearly annoyed, even appalled, by the Pentagon chief's cavalier language and reluctance to assume responsibility for his department's failures.

Mr. Woodward reports that when he told Mr. Rumsfeld that the number of insurgent attacks was going up, the defense secretary replied that they're now "categorizing more things as attacks." Mr. Woodward quotes Mr. Rumsfeld as saying, "A random round can be an attack and all the way up to killing 50 people someplace. So you've got a whole fruit bowl of different things — a banana and an apple and an orange."

Mr. Woodward adds: "I was speechless. Even with the loosest and most careless use of language and analogy, I did not understand how the secretary of defense would compare insurgent attacks to a 'fruit bowl,' a metaphor that stripped them of all urgency and emotion. The official categories in the classified reports that Rumsfeld regularly received were the lethal I.E.D.'s, standoff attacks with mortars and close engagements such as ambushes."

Earlier in the volume, in a section describing the former Iraq administrator Jay Garner's reluctance to tell the president about the mistakes he saw the Pentagon making in Iraq, Mr. Woodward writes: "It was only one example of a visitor to the Oval Office not telling the president the whole story or the truth. Likewise, in these moments where Bush had someone from the field there in the chair beside him, he did not press, did not try to open the door himself and ask what the visitor had seen and thought. The whole atmosphere too often resembled a royal court, with Cheney and Rice in attendance, some upbeat stories, exaggerated good news and a good time had by all." Were the war in Iraq not a real war that has resulted in more than 2,700 American military casualties and more than 56,000 Iraqi civilian deaths, the picture of the Bush administration that emerges from this book might resemble a farce. It's like something out of "The Daily Show" or a "Saturday Night Live" sketch, with Freudian Bush family dramas and high-school-like rivalries between cabinet members who refuse to look at one another at meetings being played out on the world stage.

There's the president, who once said, "I don't have the foggiest idea about what I think about international, foreign policy," deciding that he's going to remake the Middle East and alter the course of American foreign policy. There's his father, former President George Herbert Walker Bush (who went to war against the same country a decade ago), worrying about the wisdom of another war but reluctant to offer his opinions to his son because he believes in the principle of "let him be himself." There's the president's national security adviser whining to him that the defense secretary won't return her phone calls. And there's the president and Karl Rove, his chief political adviser, trading fart jokes.

Mr. Woodward suggests that Mr. Rumsfeld decided to make the Iraq war plan "his personal project" after seeing a rival agency, the C.I.A., step up to run operations in Afghanistan (when it became clear that the Pentagon was unprepared for a quick invasion of that country, right after 9/11). And he suggests that President Bush chose Mr. Rumsfeld as his defense secretary, in part, because he knew his father mistrusted Mr. Rumsfeld, and the younger Bush wanted to prove his father wrong.

Many of the people in this book seem not only dismayed but also flummoxed by some of President Bush's decisions. Mr. Woodward quotes Laura Bush as telling Andrew Card that she doesn't understand why her husband isn't upset about Mr. Rumsfeld and the uproar over his handling of the war . And he quotes Mr. Armitage as telling former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell that he's baffled by President Bush's reluctance to make adjustments in his conduct of the war.

"Has he thought this through?" Mr. Armitage asks. "What the president says in effect is, We've got to press on in honor of the memory of those who have fallen. Another way to say that is we've got to have more men fall to honor the memories of those who have already fallen."

Woodward: Card Wanted To Fire Rumsfeld (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, September 30, 2006

Former White House chief of staff Andrew Card twice sought to persuade President Bush to fire Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the second time with the support of first lady Laura Bush, Bob Woodward writes in a new book on the Bush administration's Iraq war policy.

Card on Friday did not dispute that he had talked about a Rumsfeld resignation with the president but said it was his job to discuss a wide range of possible replacements, including his own. He denied talking to Mrs. Bush about the subject.

The Washington Post assistant managing editor's third book on the Bush administration, "State of Denial," comes out next week. Some details have already appeared, however, including on the newspaper's Web site.

White House spokesman Tony Snow shrugged off the book as "cotton candy. It kind of melts on contact."

"We've read this book before. This tends to repeat what we've seen in a number of other books that have been out this year where people are ventilating old disputes over troop levels," Snow said Friday.

Woodward writes that Card sought and failed in November 2004, right after Bush won a second term, and again a year later, to persuade the president to fire Rumsfeld.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Card rejected any suggestion that he led a campaign to dump Rumsfeld but said he did discuss with the president Rumsfeld's role in Bush's second term.

After re-election, he and the president "talked about every Cabinet post and senior White House position," Card said.

DOJ_NMG_0071967

He said he kept a notebook listing all top jobs and possible replacements. "It's the chief of staff's job to give the lay of the land, have the president consider a lot of different options," Card said.

As to whether the first lady had any particular views about Rumsfeld, "Mrs. Bush and I never discussed it," Card said.

Dorrance Smith, the assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, responded to a request for comment by referring a reporter to Card's comments on the matter.

As for the war, Woodward writes that White House and Pentagon officials voiced concern about the conduct of the fighting in reports and internal memos and that a secret intelligence report circulated last May predicted violence would continue for the rest of 2006 and increase in 2007. At the same time, Bush, Rumsfeld and other senior officials insisted publicly the situation was going well, Woodward writes, according to the Post.

Snow insisted that the president "was not, in fact, painting a rose-colored picture. He has been saying that it's a tough war, it's a long war, it's a war that's going to outlive his presidency."

The White House spokesman did confirm one detail in Woodward's forthcoming book — that Henry Kissinger has been advising Bush about Iraq.

"The president has a lot of people in, and he listens to them. And Dr. Kissinger was one of them," Snow said. He said Bush listens to Kissinger's advice even when the two men disagree.

In an interview scheduled to air Sunday night on CBS-TV's "60 Minutes," Woodward says Kissinger, who served in the Nixon and Ford administrations, has been telling Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney that in Iraq, "victory is the only meaningful exit strategy."

As for accounts in the book of administration infighting, Snow said, "Quite often in a book like this you're going to see people who are on the losing side of arguments be especially outspoken about their opinions that nobody listened to."

"As a matter of fact, the average Washington memoir ought to be subtitled 'If only they listened to me,'" said the White House spokesman.

Reporters Press Tony Snow On The Woodward Book -- He Denies White House In Denial (EDNPUB)

Editor & Publisher, September 30, 2006

NEW YORK At his briefing this afternoon, Tony Snow, White House press secretary, faced probing questions from reporters fueled by numerous tidbits and charges already emerging from Bob Woodward's new "State of Denial" book.

Snow tried to counter some allegations and put off others. One high point came when a reporter asked about Woodward's depiction of very strong and ongoing disputes between Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice and Pentagon chief Donald Rumsfeld -- leading to Rumsfeld refusing to take her calls. Snow replied that he had asked Rice about this specifically and she said, "That is ridiculous and I told that to Woodward."

Snow repeated that denial a few minutes later.

Asked about Woodward claiming that Gen. John Abizaid had stated that Rumsfeld had lost all credibility, Snow simply said the reporters should ask Abizaid about that.

When a reporter pointed out that former top aide Andrew Card had confirmed today the charge in Woodward's book that Card had once sought Rumsfeld's exit, Snow said he had tried to reach Card himself today, unsuccessfully so far. He said he had not asked the president about this. He said it was traditional for the resignations of everyone to be on the table when the White House mulls a shakeup.

Snow ignored a question from one reporter who asked why the White House had hailed Woodward's two previous books on Bush and the war as accurate but now they say the new one has many errors.

He denied the White House was in "denial" about the war, saying that it was indeed a "war" and that people focus too much on Baghdad when there is progress elsewhere.

Snow also hit the Woodward book, and any such book, for being partly based on interviews with "smart" people who did not get their way. He said just about any Washington memoir could have been subtitled, "If Only They'd Listened To Me."

Book Says Top Aide Urged Bush To Fire Rumsfeld (WP)

By William Hamilton, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Former White House chief of staff Andrew H. Card Jr. on two occasions tried and failed to persuade President Bush to fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, according to a new book by Bob Woodward that depicts senior officials of the Bush administration as unable to face the consequences of their policy in Iraq.

Card made his first attempt after Bush was reelected in November 2004, arguing that the administration needed a fresh start and recommending that Bush replace Rumsfeld with former secretary of state James A. Baker III. Woodward writes that

Bush considered the move but was persuaded by Vice President Cheney and Karl Rove, his chief political adviser, that it would be seen as an expression of doubt about the course of the war and would expose Bush to criticism.

Card tried again around Thanksgiving 2005, this time with the support of first lady Laura Bush, who, according to Woodward, felt that Rumsfeld's overbearing manner was damaging to her husband. Bush refused for a second time, and Card left the administration in March, convinced that Iraq would be compared to Vietnam and that history would record that no senior administration officials had raised their voices in opposition to the conduct of the war.

The book is the third that Woodward, an assistant managing editor at The Washington Post, has written on the Bush administration since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The first two were attacked by critics of the administration as depicting the president in a heroic light. But the new book's title, "State of Denial," conveys the different picture that Woodward paints of the administration since the invasion of Iraq in March 2003. Excerpts of the book will be published in the Sunday and Monday editions of The Post.

Woodward writes that there has been a vast difference between what the White House and the Pentagon knew about the situation in Iraq and what they have been saying publicly. In memos, reports and internal debates, administration officials have voiced their concerns about the conduct of the war, even while Bush and Cabinet members such as Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have insisted that the war was going well.

In May, Woodward writes, the intelligence division of the Joint Chiefs of Staff circulated a secret intelligence estimate predicting that violence in Iraq will not only continue for the rest of this year but also increase in 2007.

"Insurgents and terrorists retain the resources and capabilities to sustain and even increase current level of violence through the next year," said the report, which was distributed to the White House, the State Department and intelligence agencies.

The report presented a similarly bleak assessment of oil production, electricity generation and the political situation in Iraq.

"Threats of Shia ascendancy could harden and expand Shia militant opposition and increase calls for coalition withdrawal," the report said.Several Warnings on Iraq

Woodward writes that Rice and Rumsfeld have been warned repeatedly about the deteriorating situation in Iraq.

Returning from his assignment as the first head of the Iraq postwar planning office, retired Lt. Gen. Jay Garner told Rumsfeld on June 18, 2003, that the United States made "three terrible mistakes" in Iraq.

The first two, he said, were the orders his successor, L. Paul Bremer, had given banning members of the Baath Party from government jobs and disbanding the Iraqi military. The third was Bremer's dismissal of an interim Iraqi leadership group that had been eager to help the United States administer the country in the short term.

"There's still time to rectify this," Garner said. "There's still time to turn it around."

But Rumsfeld dismissed the idea, according to Woodward. "We're not going to go back," Rumsfeld said.

A year later, Rumsfeld received even more blunt criticism from Steve Herbits, a longtime friend who, according to Woodward, has served as an informal adviser to Rumsfeld since he became defense secretary. In a seven-page memo in July 2004 titled "Summary of Post-Iraq Planning and Execution Problems," Herbits listed a series of questions for Rumsfeld:

Â· "Who made the decision and why didn't we reconstitute the Iraqi Army?"

Â· "Did no one realize we were going to need Iraqi security forces?"

Â· "Did no one anticipate the importance of stabilization and how best to achieve it?"

Â· "Why was the de-Baathification so wide and deep?"

He then described "Rumsfeld's style of operation," which he said was the "Haldeman model, arrogant," referring to President Richard M. Nixon's White House chief of staff H.R. "Bob" Haldeman. "Indecisive, contrary to popular image. Would not accept that some people in some areas were smarter than he. . . . Trusts very few people. Very, very cautious. Rubber glove syndrome -- a tendency not to leave his fingerprints on decisions."

Woodward does not say how Rumsfeld responded.Misgivings in the Military

Some of the highest-ranking officers serving under Rumsfeld had similar misgivings about Iraq.

In March, Gen. John P. Abizaid, the senior U.S. commander for the Middle East, met privately with Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who had criticized the Bush administration's approach to Iraq as "a flawed policy wrapped in illusion" and called for withdrawal. Murtha was attacked by the White House for "endorsing the policy positions of Michael Moore and the extreme liberal wing of the Democratic Party."

According to Murtha, Woodward writes, Abizaid raised his hand, held his thumb and forefinger a quarter of an inch from each other and said, "We're that far apart."

But, according to Woodward, Rumsfeld made sure that his choices for chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff -- Air Force Gen. Richard B. Myers and Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace -- were not people who would directly challenge him.

Woodward writes that just before Pace was named chairman, he was visited by an old friend, Marine Corps Gen. James L. Jones, the NATO commander. Jones expressed concern that Pace would even want to be chairman. "You're going to face a debacle and be part of the debacle in Iraq," he said. U.S. prestige was at a 50- or 75-year low in the world. Jones said he was so worried about Iraq and the way Rumsfeld ran things that he wondered if he himself should not resign in protest.

And, he told his friend, according to Woodward: "You should not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder."

Woodward writes that he called Jones at NATO headquarters in Brussels and that Jones confirmed the story.

Woodward describes Rice as frequently at odds with Rumsfeld when she served as national security adviser, and her staff as increasingly concerned about the lack of a strategy for winning the war in Iraq.

When she became secretary of state in 2005, Rice asked Philip D. Zelikow, an old friend whom she had brought on as an adviser, to travel to Iraq to assess the situation. On Feb. 10, two weeks after Rice became secretary, Zelikow presented her with a 15-page, single-spaced memo.

"At this point Iraq remains a failed state shadowed by constant violence and undergoing revolutionary political change," he wrote.A 'Brush-Off' From Rice

"State of Denial" adds new information about Rice's role in the Bush administration's efforts to combat terrorism in the months before the Sept. 11 attacks. That subject became a source of controversy this week after former president Bill Clinton accused "President Bush's neocons" and other Republicans of ignoring Osama bin Laden until the attacks; Rice responded angrily to the charge.

Woodward writes that on July 10, 2001, then-CIA Director George J. Tenet became so concerned about the communications that intelligence agencies were receiving indicating a terrorist attack was imminent, he went to the White House with counterterrorism chief J. Cofer Black -- without an appointment -- to meet with Rice, then the national security adviser. He and Black hoped the meeting would alert Rice to the urgency they felt.

But Tenet and Black felt that Rice gave them "the brush-off," according to Woodward, telling them that a plan for coherent action against bin Laden was already in the works. Woodward writes that both Tenet and Black felt that the meeting was the starkest warning the White House was given about bin Laden.

The book describes Tenet as feeling that Rice could have gotten through to Bush on the bin Laden threat but that she had not understood it in time. Black described his frustration more directly, according to Woodward: "The only thing we didn't do was pull the trigger to the gun we were holding to her head."

Woodward writes that former secretary of state Henry A. Kissinger has played a key role as an outside adviser to Bush on the Iraq war. Kissinger, according to Woodward, sees Iraq through the prism of his experience in the Nixon administration during the Vietnam War, and has counseled Bush to "stick it out" and not even entertain the idea of withdrawing troops.

At one point, to emphasize his position, he gave Michael Gerson, then a White House speechwriter, a copy of a memo he wrote to Nixon in September 1969. "Withdrawal of U.S. troops will become like salted peanuts to the American public; the more U.S. troops come home, the more will be demanded," Kissinger wrote.

Unlike Woodward's previous books, "Bush at War" and "Plan of Attack," "State of Denial" does not focus on Bush. Woodward writes that Bush, who agreed to be interviewed for the first two books, declined this time.

Woodward also spends little time on Cheney, writing that since 2005 the vice president has been perceived as having no visible role in Iraq policy. He describes Cheney's associates as saying he was "lost" without his former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who resigned after he was indicted for his role in the Valerie Plame leak case.

According to Woodward, Cheney relied on his wife, Lynne, and his daughter Liz for advice, and some close friends believed he "became increasingly removed from reality."

The White House is in full damage-control mode over his new book WEB EXCLUSIVE

There are few journalists in Washington who can throw the White House off its stride: Bob Woodward is one of them. Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," paints a damning picture of White House policy in the aftermath of the Iraq invasion. After The New York Times printed excerpts of the book on Friday, the West Wing immediately went into full damage-control mode, as top aides tried to figure out how to respond. Woodward had delivered copies of the book to the White House on Friday morning—earlier than they expected because of the newspaper leak. The arrival of a Woodward Tome has become a kind of biennial ritual in Washington. The last two, which detailed the Afghan war and the successful early invasion of Iraq, were fairly kind to the president and his staff. But this was a different kind of book, and the administration was already bracing for a rougher ride.

The White House stayed quiet all morning, until the press briefing, which began unusually late. Soon after press secretary Tony Snow stepped up to the podium, it was clear the White House had settled on a time-tested strategy: deny, downplay and sidestep. Snow had a quip at the ready. “The book’s certainly cotton candy—it kind of melts on contact.”

The calculated ho-hum reaction is partly the result of having already responded to several critical books on Iraq in recent months—as well as public discontent with the war. Bush’s aides believe they have already debated extensively the conflicting recommendations about troop levels, and consider that an old—and exhausted—dispute.

White House officials also think they can easily knock down Woodward’s premise that Bush has misled the public about the level of attacks on troops in Iraq. Since late last year, Bush has spoken more openly and directly about the nature of the enemy in Iraq and the scale of the challenge in building a peaceful and democratic nation. Snow himself quoted Bush at length at a press conference in Chicago in July saying, “We’ve lost obviously a lot of lives here in the homeland, and we lost lives overseas.” Snow added that Bush had been telling the American people that “it’s a war that’s going to outlive his presidency.”

The harder material for the White House to dispute concerns Donald Rumsfeld—including harsh assessments of the Defense Secretary from Pentagon brass. According to the book, General Jim Jones, the NATO commander, told his friend Peter Pace, then in line to become chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to steer clear of the job. "Military advice is being influenced on a political level," he said. The JCS had improperly "surrendered" to Rumsfeld. "You shoul not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder," Jones said.

Administration officials prefer to either dismiss those stories as “gossip” (as Snow did on Friday) or sidestep them altogether. According to Woodward, former Chief of Staff Andy Card recommended that Rumsfeld should be fired. Instead of disputing that, Snow dodged the question altogether with an admirably confusing non sequiter. "Anybody who knows Andy Card knows that there's not a bitter bone in his body."

Bush’s aides concede that they can't dispute the book's direct quotes from Card about his desire to see Rumsfeld leave. Instead, they focused their denials elsewhere. They rejected outright Woodward's contention that First Lady Laura Bush dislikes Rumsfeld. But the Bush team cannot easily dismiss Woodward's reporting skills outright. In his earlier two books—Bush At War and Plan of Attack—Woodward gained extensive cooperation from the White House, and Bush officials openly praised the quality of his reporting. This time around, neither Bush nor Dick Cheney agreed to be interviewed. That doesn’t mean the White House froze Woodward out, merely that he was kept at the same distance as most journalists in Washington. As the president now knows, Woodward isn't fond of the view from the cheap seats.

End Of The Affair (TIME)

The Bush White House used to love Bob Woodward. Now, thanks to the revelations in his newest book, State of Denial, the breakup will be nasty

Bob Woodward's first book on this Administration, Bush At War, was hagiography, the prose equivalent of those post-9/11 Annie Leibovitz photographs for Vanity Fair that captured the President and his War Cabinet in heroic still lifes. Woodward, the world's most famous investigative reporter and an assistant managing editor at the Washington Post, took a lot of heat for going soft on the President in Bush At War, but the author's critics were wrong to suggest he was politically motivated. That book, remember, chronicled the President and his inner circle during the first three months after 9/11. All things considered, and certainly by comparison to what followed, those were pretty good days for this Administration.

Then came Plan of Attack, Woodward's second Bush book. Published in April 2004, this one was decidedly more nuanced. Like all Woodward products, its tone reflected the moment in time when it was written — in this case, that fuzzy period between Bush celebrating Iraq as a "Mission Accomplished" and the turning point when the greater national security establishment decided Iraq had become a disaster. In Plan of Attack, Bush and his team were flawed, but well-intentioned; they made both good decisions and bad, and they feuded among themselves, sometimes less than nobly, over the best policies to pursue. But the White House and the Bush-Cheney campaign cleverly decided to ignore all the negative stuff in the book. Instead, they said it showed the President as a leader. They even listed it as recommended reading on the campaign's website. Thanks to the Bush team's embrace, Woodward was accused unfairly of being a lapdog for the President. Woodward, understandably, was chagrined; very, very rich for a working print journalist (Plan of Attack, like most Woodward books, was a best seller), but chagrined nonetheless.

Now we have State of Denial. The title alone is a departure for Woodward. His books during the Clinton years — The Agenda, The Choice — all carried neutral titles that revealed little about how the people in power were portrayed. The same can be said of Bush At War and Plan of Attack. From the moment the title of the third book leaked, White House officials knew they were in trouble.

Actually, they suspected long ago that Woodward's newest book would not be good for them. Woodward had plenty of access to Bush and Cheney for his first two tomes. Not this time. "We had a sense that this was going to be a different kind of book," says one source familiar with the discussions on how to handle Woodward. "The third time is not the charm."

The line out of Bush World on State of Denial is that it's "nothing new" and "old news" — the standard damage control response I remember hearing again and again from Clinton flacks during times of trouble in those years. "These are just gossipy snapshots of issues that have been covered ad nauseam," says Dan Bartlett, the President's counselor. Bartlett has the unenviable task this weekend of appearing on three Sunday shows to talk down the significance of the Woodward book.

But thanks to the New York Times' David Sanger, who scooped the Washington Post on the key revelations in State of Denial this morning, we know that some of Woodward's revelations ARE new. That then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card urged the removal of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld — that's new. That Robert Blackwill, the White House point man on Iraq in the first term, told Condi Rice and her deputy that 40,000 more troops were needed but was rebuffed — that's new, too. And there are more.

Still, Bartlett and others on the Bush team may yet succeed in convincing people that Woodward's revelations are ancient history, but not necessarily for reasons that are helpful to the President or the Republican Party. The real-time news out of Iraq continues to be so relentlessly grim that nothing, not even another Woodward expose, may be able to steal the spotlight for too long. So come to think of it, the White House might want to make State of Denial recommended reading after all.

'State Of Denial' Lands Early And Hits Harder (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Bob Woodward at Center of Whirlwind Over Latest Book

The impassioned debate that seems to surround each new book by Bob Woodward burst into public view yesterday, two days ahead of schedule.

The unveiling of "State of Denial," Woodward's latest take on the Bush administration's struggle with the conflict in Iraq, scrambled the usual media alliances. The New York Times ran a front-page exclusive on a book by a journalist for The Washington Post -- which begins running excerpts tomorrow -- and Brian Williams led "NBC Nightly News" with a story based on advance tidbits put out by CBS's "60 Minutes," which airs its Woodward interview tomorrow.

For several years now, liberal critics have been denigrating Woodward as a high-level stenographer for an administration they detest, even as his last two books have also revealed information that embarrassed the White House. But this new volume -- written, unlike the others, without access to President Bush -- has media and political circles buzzing about whether the one-time Watergate sleuth has suddenly gotten tougher on the administration.

"I found out new things, as is always the case when you re-plow old ground," Woodward said. "The bulk of them I discovered this year. I wish I'd had some of them for the earlier books, but I didn't."

Woodward said he pushed repeatedly to interview Bush, who actually suggested that he write the book "Plan of Attack." But White House counselor Dan Bartlett and national security adviser Stephen Hadley, after a period of cooperation, told him an interview was unlikely and then stopped returning his calls. In the new book, Woodward attributes the lack of a presidential interview -- which has the effect of removing a strong counterweight to criticism of the White House -- to Bush's declining popularity.

Bartlett said yesterday that he and other officials, while cooperating, noticed "a different tone and tenor to this project. . . . Some pretty hard conclusions had already formed in Bob's mind. So we made the judgment that the third time was not a charm." The book's "gossipy" aspects will titillate the cocktail party circuit, Bartlett said, but "the underlying issues are ones covered by a half-dozen books before his."

What accounts for the tsunami of publicity? Three decades after he was portrayed by Robert Redford in the movie version of the Watergate book "All the President's Men," Woodward has become a bankable commodity, his books virtually guaranteed to generate headlines and top bestseller lists.

But for all his popularity and credibility, Woodward has seen his reputation has taken a bit of a scuffing as detractors have assailed his recent books as too sympathetic toward Bush, Vice President Cheney and other officials who have cooperated with him. Woodward also apologized to The Post in November for failing to disclose for more than two years that an administration official had told him about Valerie Plame's status as a CIA operative, a silence he attributed to trying to avoid a subpoena from the special prosecutor investigating the leak.

The very title of "State of Denial" suggests a more sharp-edged approach than "Bush at War" or "Plan of Attack," although the latter, in particular, contained revelations about the administration that were seized upon by John Kerry's presidential campaign after its 2004 release. But the narrative pushed by Woodward's critics was that of a journalist who was an outsider while digging into the Nixon White House but had since become wealthy, famous and too cozy with those in the Bush White House.

The dominant theme of the new book -- that the administration was torn by internal divisions over Iraq and failed to recognize its blunders -- could prompt a reassessment of Woodward's work.

"In my view, his reputation had suffered from the first two books on the Bush administration, and I believe he's a very smart guy and he knows that," said Jay Rosen, a New York University journalism professor. "I think he was used to put out a narrative that was radically incomplete."

"Obviously he's more critical of the president, but this comes at a point when the war has gone on as long as World War II," said Times columnist Frank Rich, a fierce Bush critic.

Said Bob Kuttner, co-executive editor of the liberal American Prospect: "Either Bob was shamed into using his tremendous reporting talent to explain what was really going on, or he felt foolish in light of what was written before and what was subsequently unearthed."

On the conservative side, Bill Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard, said of the new book: "I don't know whether that's where his reporting led him or whether it's more fashionable to be anti-Bush in 2006 than in 2002. I don't see what the big revelations are, and I don't see this changing anyone's mind in November."

Asked about criticism that he has gone easy on the Bush team in the past, Woodward said: "Anyone who's read the books would realize that it's unfounded. All of the three books are reported, and this is what I found."

Some commentators have maintained that those who cooperate with Woodward fare better in his narratives. In this case, however, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- who had to be ordered by Bush to cooperate with "Plan of Attack" -- granted two on-the-record interviews. Yet Rumsfeld is portrayed as "an arrogant, indecisive bumbler who won't take responsibility for his mistakes," as the New York Daily News, which also obtained an advance copy of the book, put it.

Yesterday's publication by the Times and Daily News -- Times reporter Julie Bosman bought her copy and, in what is usually a sin in New York, paid retail -- caused plenty of head-shaking in The Post newsroom, where numerous staffers wondered how the paper was beaten on a book by its own assistant managing editor. The Post quickly published a news story online yesterday morning.

Leonard Downie Jr., The Post's executive editor, said the book was "fair game" for any competitor and that he probably should have moved faster after "60 Minutes" issued a press release on the book Thursday.

"We weren't prohibited from doing it; I just didn't think to do it," Downie said. "I was sort of upset with myself for not having decided yesterday to just do a story. . . . I'm somewhat surprised at how much commotion the release of the book has caused."

Newsweek, a Washington Post Co. property, is still planning a cover-story excerpt for tomorrow. Editor Jon Meacham said he was "not surprised" by the leak. "The exclusive excerpts game has been changed over the last five to 10 years, and it's very hard to protect any book after it's shipped from the publisher."

While the Times was scooping The Post -- in part by keeping the story off its Web site until the middle of the night -- NBC was beating CBS by using footage of the "60 Minutes" interview posted on CBS's Web site. "We knew a story when we heard one, and we found a way to cover it," NBC anchor Williams said. "We unabashedly threw CBS's logo up on the air."

NBC correspondent Andrea Mitchell had signed a confidentiality agreement in exchange for an advance copy, Williams said, so "she recused herself from any discussions."

"60 Minutes" spokesman Kevin Tedesco was unperturbed, saying: "Ultimately it all adds to the buzz, and hopefully more viewers for Sunday's broadcast."

Times reporter David Sanger, who wrote his paper's story, said Woodward books are always news. "As someone who covers the White House, I can only view this with admiration," Sanger said. "He's got some fabulous supporting details and great scenes. Did we all know there was tension between Condoleezza Rice and Don Rumsfeld? Yes. Did we know the president told him to return her calls? No."

The busting of book embargoes is becoming common practice. After all, the Associated Press obtained an advance copy of "Plan of Attack" before The Post ran its excerpts. (Woodward was also scooped by Vanity Fair last year on the identity of Deep Throat, but that stemmed from his decision that one-time FBI official Mark Felt was no longer mentally competent to release him from a 33-year-old pledge of confidentiality.)

The Post was the aggressive party in 2003 when, on the heels of the AP, the paper obtained an advance copy of Hillary Rodham Clinton's autobiography before it was serialized in Time. A year later, Newsweek, the Times and the AP got hold of Bill Clinton's memoir before an exclusive Time interview with the former president.

When Newsweek had the rights to "Dutch," Edmund Morris's 1999 biography of Ronald Reagan, The Post scooped its sister publication by coming up with a copy. In 1995, Newsweek's Meacham obtained a manuscript of Colin Powell's autobiography, prompting Time to slash the fee it paid Random House for the excerpts.

This time, Simon & Schuster, Woodward's publisher, responded to the leak by moving up the sale date for the book -- 825,000 copies have already been shipped -- from Monday to today. "We were completely blindsided by it," said publicity chief Victoria Meyer.

How does Woodward feel about his newspaper losing first crack at his book? "It's the world we live in," he said.

Research editor Alice Crites contributed to this report.

Woodward Book Debut Not Quite As Planned (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

Simon & Schuster had an intricate strategy all worked out for rolling out Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," scheduled for publication on Monday.

Extensive excerpts would appear in The Washington Post, where Mr. Woodward works, on Sunday and Monday. The book would be featured Sunday night on "60 Minutes." And excerpts would appear Monday in Newsweek, which is also owned by the Washington Post Company.

But that plan was disrupted Friday when The New York Times and The Daily News published articles with details of the book, which describes behind-the-scenes disputes within the Bush administration over the Iraq war.

Now, Simon & Schuster has moved up the release of the book to today, allowing bookstores, which have had it for days, to put it on their shelves earlier than the scheduled sale date.

The decision to make the book available earlier than planned highlights the difficulty that publishers face in trying to execute a promotional strategy on their own timetable.

It also raises questions about the relationship between The Post and Mr. Woodward, a prolific author who is by far its most famous reporter for his role in exposing the Watergate scandal, which brought down Richard Nixon's presidency. His books often contain exclusive material that has not appeared in the newspaper, where he is an assistant managing editor.

"60 Minutes" began promoting its segment about "State of Denial," including details of the book's content, on its Web site on Thursday. An internal critique yesterday at The Post, written by a former reporter, suggested little patience with Mr. Woodward's special relationship with his paper.

"The big question of the day is, Why A1 didn't have Woodward on Bush before CBS began promoting their interview," the critique read. "Oh yeah, I know why, blah, blah, blah."

Leonard Downie Jr., the executive editor of The Post, said that during the course of reporting for this book and others, Mr. Woodward "has been helpful to us from time to time."

He declined to specify Mr. Woodward's contributions to the newspaper from "State of Denial," but noted that after the articles were published in The New York Times and The Daily News on Friday, The Post ran on its Web site "material that originated with us" and said that it would have excerpts in its Sunday issue, which will be available today.

"You will still read Woodward's words first in their entirety in The Washington Post," Mr. Downie said. He added that he was not upset about the turn of events, saying being scooped was part of the ebb and flow of a competitive business.

"Sometimes you win, and sometimes you lose," he said.

Simon & Schuster was somewhat less sanguine. Some industry watchers said that the front-page treatment in The Times could only help lift sales of the book. But David Rosenthal, publisher of Simon & Schuster, maintained that the book already had significant buzz and that it was not clear whether additional publicity would increase it.

Regardless of sales, he said, a principle was violated because it appeared some booksellers had sold the book to The Times, The Daily News and other outlets even though they had signed affidavits saying they would abide by embargoes.

Breaking an embargo, he said, can disrupt a highly structured, coordinated publicity and sales program.

"You want your sales to start happening at a synchronized time, in a concentrated period at first, to drive the book" on the best-seller lists, he said. "And its list position affects the discounting of a book."

Mr. Rosenthal said he had moved up the release date to today "because it's the soonest we can" and because "we don't want to penalize stores that are upholding the embargo."

Barbara Meade, a co-owner of the Politics and Prose bookstore in Washington, said that she had received a "frenzy" of calls yesterday for the book. Even if the publisher had not moved up the sale to today, she said, she might have started selling it then anyway to avoid disappointing her customers. "It would be a bad business decision not to put it out," she said.

Howard Rubenstein, a public relations executive familiar with roll-out campaigns like this one by Simon & Schuster, said that controlling such information "really doesn't work anymore."

He said that he advises clients to prepare a strategy for publicity but also to prepare for leaks. "And if it happens," he said, "jump on the bandwagon."

Gonzales Cautions Judges On Interfering (AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

AP, September 30, 2006

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who is defending President Bush's anti-terrorism tactics in multiple court battles, said Friday that federal judges should not substitute their personal views for the president's judgments in wartime.

He said the Constitution makes the president commander in chief and the Supreme Court has long recognized the president's pre-eminent role in foreign affairs. "The Constitution, by contrast, provides the courts with relatively few tools to superintend military and foreign policy decisions, especially during wartime," the attorney general told a conference on the judiciary at Georgetown University Law Center.

"Judges must resist the temptation to supplement those tools based on their own personal views about the wisdom of the policies under review," Gonzales said.

And he said the independence of federal judges, who are appointed for life, "has never meant, and should never mean, that judges or their decisions should be immune" from public criticism.

"Respectfully, when courts issue decisions that overturn long-standing traditions or policies without proper support in text or precedent, they cannot — and should not — be shielded from criticism," Gonzales said. "A proper sense of judicial humility requires judges to keep in mind the institutional limitations of the judiciary and the duties expressly assigned by the Constitution to the more politically accountable branches."

His audience included legal scholars and judges, including Justice Clarence Thomas, one of the Bush administration's most reliable supporters on the Supreme Court.

The attorney general did not refer to any specific case or decision but only to wartime, military and foreign affairs cases in general.

Gonzales has sent Justice Department lawyers into federal courts from coast to coast defending Bush's detention of terrorist suspects at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, his plans to try some of them before military tribunals and his use of the National Security Agency to wiretap Americans without court warrants when they communicate with suspected terrorists abroad.

Over administration objections, the Supreme Court ordered that detainees could challenge aspects of their imprisonment in federal courts and overturned Bush's plans for military tribunals, forcing Bush to ask Congress to approve a new version of the panels.

A handful of federal district judges either ordered an end to the warrantless wiretapping or agreed to hear court challenges to it. Opponents of the plan argue the NSA program violates the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act's requirement that the government get a warrant from a court that meets in secret before wiretapping Americans to gain intelligence information.

The administration contends that despite the statute's language, the president has inherent authority from the Constitution to order such eavesdropping without court permission. Justice lawyers also have argued that the challenges to the NSA program should be thrown out of court because trials would expose state secrets. Most of the judges' rulings and proceedings have been stayed pending appeal.

Gonzales also said he thought more states should move away from having judges stand in partisan elections to keep their seats. Gonzales himself as a Texas Supreme Court justice "had to raise enough money to run print ads and place television spots around the state in order to retain my seat."

In such contested elections, "most of the contributions come from lawyers and law firms, many of whom have had, or will have, cases before the court," Gonzales said. "The appearance of a conflict of interest is difficult to dismiss."

He noted favorably that some states have adopted other ways of picking judges, including merit selection and appointment with simple up-or-down retention elections rather than contested campaigns. With polls showing many voters think judges can be swayed by campaign contributions, Gonzales said, "If Americans come to believe that judges are simply politicians, or their decisions can be purchased for a price, state judicial systems will be undermined."

Detainee Bill Shifts Power To President (NYT)

By Scott Shane And Adam Liptak

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29 — With the final passage through Congress of the detainee treatment bill, President Bush on Friday achieved a signal victory, shoring up with legislation his determined conduct of the campaign against terrorism in the face of challenges from critics and the courts.

Rather than reining in the formidable presidential powers Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney have asserted since Sept. 11, 2001, the law gives some of those powers a solid statutory foundation. In effect it allows the president to identify enemies, imprison them indefinitely and interrogate them — albeit with a ban on the harshest treatment — beyond the reach of the full court reviews traditionally afforded criminal defendants and ordinary prisoners.

Taken as a whole, the law will give the president more power over terrorism suspects than he had before the Supreme Court decision this summer in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld that undercut more than four years of White House policy. It does, however, grant detainees brought before military commissions limited protections initially opposed by the White House. The bill, which cleared a final procedural hurdle in the House on Friday and is likely to be signed into law next week by Mr. Bush, does not just allow the president to determine the meaning and application of the Geneva Conventions; it also strips the courts of jurisdiction to hear challenges to his interpretation.

And it broadens the definition of "unlawful enemy combatant" to include not only those who fight the United States but also those who have "purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States." The latter group could include those accused of providing financial or other indirect support to terrorists, human rights groups say. The designation can be made by any "competent tribunal" created by the president or secretary of defense.

In very specific ways, the bill is a rejoinder to the Hamdan ruling, in which several justices said the absence of Congressional authorization was a central flaw in the administration's approach. The new bill solves that problem, legal experts said.

"The president should feel he has better authority and direction now," said Douglas W. Kmiec, a conservative legal scholar at the Pepperdine University School of Law. "I think he can reasonably be confident that this statute answers the Supreme Court and puts him back in a position to prevent another attack, which is the goal of interrogation."

But lawsuits challenging the bill are inevitable, and critics say substantial parts of it may well be rejected by the Supreme Court.

Over all, the legislation reallocates power among the three branches of government, taking authority away from the judiciary and handing it to the president.

Bruce Ackerman, a critic of the administration and a professor of law and political science at Yale University, sharply criticized the bill but agreed that it strengthened the White House position. "The president walked away with a lot more than most people thought," Mr. Ackerman said. He said the bill "further entrenches presidential power" and allows the administration to declare even an American citizen an unlawful combatant subject to indefinite detention.

"And it's not only about these prisoners," Mr. Ackerman said. "If Congress can strip courts of jurisdiction over cases because it fears their outcome, judicial independence is threatened."

Even if the Supreme Court decides it has the power to hear challenges to the bill, the Bush administration has gained a crucial advantage. In adding a Congressional imprimatur to a comprehensive set of procedures and tactics, lawmakers explicitly endorsed measures that in other eras were achieved by executive fiat. Earlier Supreme Court decisions have suggested that the president and Congress acting together in the national security arena can be an all-but-unstoppable force.

Public commentary on the bill, called the Military Commissions Act of 2006, has been fast-shifting and often contradictory, partly because its 96 pages cover so much ground and because the impact of some provisions is open to debate.

"This bill is about so many things, and it's a mixed bag," said Elisa Massimino, the Washington director of Human Rights First, a civil liberties group.

Ms. Massimino's group and others criticized the bill as a whole, but she agreed with the Republican senators who negotiated for weeks with the White House that it would ban the most extreme interrogation methods used by the Central Intelligence Agency and the military.

"The senators made clear that waterboarding is criminal," Ms. Massimino said, referring to a technique used to simulate drowning. "That's a human rights enforcement upside."

The debate over the limits of torture and the rules for military commission dominated discussion of the bill until this week. Only in the last few days has broad attention turned to its redefinition of "unlawful enemy combatant" and its ban on habeas corpus petitions, which suspects have traditionally used to challenge their incarceration.

Law professors will stay busy for months debating the implications. The most outspoken critics have likened the law's sweeping provisions to dark chapters in history, comparable to the passage of the Alien and Sedition Acts in the fragile years after the nation's founding and the internment of Japanese-Americans in the midst of World War II.

Conservative legal experts, by contrast, said critics could no longer say the Bush administration was guilty of unilateral executive overreaching. Congressional approval can cure many ills, Justice Robert H. Jackson wrote in his seminal concurrence in Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company v. Sawyer, the 1952 case that struck down President Harry S. Truman's unilateral seizure of the nation's steel mills during the Korean War.

Supporters of the law, in fact, say its critics will never be satisfied. “For years they’ve been saying that we don’t like Bush doing things unilaterally, that we don’t like Bush doing things piecemeal,” said David B. Rivkin, a Justice Department official in the administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush.

How the measure will look decades hence may depend not just on how it is used but on how the terrorist threat evolves. If a major terrorist plot in the United States is uncovered — and surely if one succeeds — it may vindicate the Congressional decision to give the government more leeway to seize and question those who might know about the next attack.

If the attacks of 2001 recede as a devastating but unique tragedy, the decision to create a new legal framework may seem like overkill. “If there is never another terrorist attack and we never obtain actionable intelligence, this will look like a huge overreaction,” said Gary J. Bass, a professor of politics and international affairs at Princeton.

Long before that judgment arrives, legal challenges are likely to bring the new law before the Supreme Court. Assuming the justices rule that they retain the power to hear the case at all, they will then decide whether Congress has resolved the flaws it found in June or must make another effort to balance the rights of accused terrorists and the desire for security.

Detainee Bill Boosts The GOP (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

Its passage on President Bush's terms renews public focus on an issue that has been a political winner for Republicans since 9/11.

WASHINGTON — Three months ago, the Supreme Court handed President Bush what appeared to be a stinging defeat, ruling that he had overstepped the bounds of his power by holding and trying terrorism suspects without clear authority from Congress. Two weeks ago, Bush's hopes of settling the issue with new legislation ran into serious trouble when powerful Republican senators rebelled against him.

But this week, the president brushed aside those setbacks and won what appeared to be a significant political victory largely on his terms, securing passage of tough rules that allow the government to hold, interrogate and try "enemy combatants" while granting them legal rights that are limited.

The complex bill, which swept through the House and Senate after backroom negotiations, not only gave Bush most of what he wanted in substance, it also provided Republicans with a rhetorical club to use against Democrats on terrorism.

The renewed focus on the issue that has most benefited the GOP since Sept. 11, 2001, has provided a much-needed lift for Republicans as they move into the final weeks of the hotly contested campaign for control of Congress.

"At least for the moment," said political scientist Ross K. Baker of Rutgers University, "it has deprived the Democrats of the momentum that they enjoyed as recently as six weeks ago."

The opportunity was not lost on GOP leaders, who wasted no time in using it.

"Do [voters] want to be voting for a party that does unabashedly say, 'We're going to have victory in this war on terror,' or a party that says, 'We've got to surrender'?" Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said Friday.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said in a television interview that Democrats "are so bent on protecting criminals … they're not allowing us to prosecute these people."

"The 130 most treacherous people probably in the world, and they want to put them and release them out in the public eventually," Hastert said.

No Democrat in Congress has called for releasing the detainees considered most dangerous at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, or proposed that the United States surrender to terrorists.

As the dust settled after a week of heated debate and rapid-fire votes, some Democrats privately acknowledged Bush's clear victory.

What Democratic leaders most wanted was to change the subject from terrorism to Iraq, on which the president has been much less successful.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) held a news conference Friday to argue that recently released excerpts of a National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism, as well as a new book by Bob Woodward of the Washington Post, offered new evidence that the president had mismanaged the war in Iraq.

Legal experts said the tribunal law was certain to be challenged, beginning with a controversial provision that blocks foreign prisoners held by the military from appealing their detention in federal courts. But they also noted that no challenge would reach the Supreme Court before the Nov. 7 election.

"It is an appallingly bad bill. I think it is a stain on our national reputation and a national disgrace," said Harold Koh, a former Clinton administration official who is now dean of Yale Law School.

"By going on the offensive to turn this into a test of members' commitment to the war on terror, Bush bullied them into taking a bad bill with virtually no legislative process. Where were the hearings? Where were the expert witnesses?"

A conservative legal scholar, Douglas W. Kmiec of Pepperdine Law School, disagreed with Koh's assessment.

But he agreed that the bill had turned into a political football.

"I think this is a reasonable effort to respond to the concerns raised by the Supreme Court," said Kmiec, a former Reagan administration official. "I think it will be challenged; I think it should on its face survive challenge…. It is more protective and solicitous [of detainees' rights] than anything I can recall out of the Civil War, World War I or World War II."

Still, he added, "there's an awful lot of politics surrounding this matter at the moment, and both sides are playing the game.

"The president is insisting that Democrats who don't support him are weak in the defense of the nation, and Democrats in turn are suggesting that the president doesn't care about the Constitution."

Reflecting the power of the terrorism issue at the polls — or at least candidates' perception of its power — almost every Democratic lawmaker in a potentially tight Senate race voted with the Republican majority to approve the bill: Sens. Robert Menendez of New Jersey, Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Debbie Stabenow of Michigan and, in the House, Senate candidates Sherrod Brown of Ohio and Harold E. Ford Jr. of Tennessee.

On the flip side, Sen. Lincoln Chafee, facing a tough reelection battle in largely Democratic Rhode Island, was the sole Republican senator to vote no.

Though Menendez and Stabenow voted for the bill, a Republican group attacked them for earlier supporting an amendment by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) that would have given terrorism suspects the right to challenge their detention in federal court.

Menendez and Stabenow "sided with trial lawyers and terrorists," the National Republican Senatorial Committee charged, linking them to two of the GOP's favorite targets.

"We hit every Democrat in a competitive seat on this issue," said Brian Nick, a spokesman for the GOP committee.

The bill, said Rutgers' Baker, "is one more blunt instrument that the president can use on the Democrats to say what he's been saying all along … which is to charge that the Democrats are soft on terrorism."

"It's hard to know what issue is going to be the most powerful [in November]…. But the pushback on terrorism has been extremely well-orchestrated," Baker said.

"The Republicans have stayed on message with incredible discipline."

Democratic consultant Jeremy Rosner argued that the charge of "soft on terrorism" might be less effective this year than it was four years ago. Republicans then gained seats in both chambers of Congress.

"I think it's too early to tell how this will all play for sure," he said.

The renewed attention to terrorism after the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks "did lift Bush's personal approval in the polls, but it didn't move approval of Congress," Rosner said.

Congressional analyst Charlie Cook, editor of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, said the outcome of November's election would still depend largely on what issue dominates voters' thinking five weeks from now.

"To the extent that the spotlight moves toward terrorism [and] national security … that's a good thing for President Bush, it's a good thing for his party," Cook said.

"If it moves back over toward Iraq, then that's bad for President Bush, it's bad for the Republican Party, and they lose the House for sure.

"The more likely outcome, I think, is what if that spotlight shifts about halfway over, so it's partially terrorism, national security, falling gas prices and partially on the war in Iraq," he said. "That's where this thing becomes a real, real, real close call, and the House could go either way."

Briton Cites 'Divergence' With U.S. (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Senior Official Critical of Going 'Beyond the Law' to Fight Terror

LONDON, Sept. 29 -- Charles Falconer, one of the highest-ranking justice officials in Britain, said Friday that there is a "great divergence" in how Britain and the United States are handling the fight against terrorists, describing the U.S. approach as a willingness "to do things beyond the law."

Falconer said in an interview that the practices of holding terrorism suspects without charge at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and interrogating them in secret CIA prisons have made it "harder to identify to the world what your values are."

Holding the posts of lord chancellor and secretary of state for constitutional affairs, Falconer is widely seen as a spokesman for the British government, the closest U.S. ally in the war in Iraq. He is scheduled to visit Washington next week, where he will meet with Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and deliver a speech at Georgetown University.

His visit will come shortly after Congress approved legislation to establish new policies for dealing with terrorism suspects and set rules for their legal rights. The U.S. Supreme Court in June struck down the Bush administration's program for trying suspects before military commissions.

Falconer recently called Guantanamo Bay "an affront to the principles of democracy." In a lengthy interview Friday, he said Britain had learned hard lessons in the 1970s when it pursued a hard-line course in response to the bombing campaign of the Irish Republican Army. Police got new leeway in interrogation, while suspects' civil protections were reduced. In multiple cases, innocent people were convicted and sentenced.

"We suffered badly in the '70s and '80s," Falconer said, adding that the United States was among those criticizing the British approach at the time. He also noted that IRA fundraising "shot up" during this period.

Among the examples of miscarriages of justice that he mentioned were the Guildford Four, four men wrongly convicted in 1975 for a pub bombing that killed five people. They were imprisoned for 15 years before being exonerated; they said at their trial that they had been tortured by police into signing false confessions.

Prime Minister Tony Blair has since apologized for this and other legal cases.

"Keep your justice system as pure as you can," Falconer said. "This is advice to a friend from the experience we have had."

Falconer has gone further in his criticism than his close friend Blair, who has called Guantanamo Bay an "anomaly that has to end."

Blair has been faulted by critics here for not using his closeness with President Bush to urge the United States to shut down Guantanamo Bay right away and end extrajudicial methods in terrorism cases.

Anthony King, a professor of government at Essex University, said it is "very hard to read" whether Falconer in his statements is carrying a message for Blair. But King said, "My impression is the British government would like to separate itself for those particular ways the U.S. government is fighting the war on terror."

Falconer said both countries value democracy and rule of law. But some U.S. practices are "undercutting the very values both countries adhere to," he said.

Asked whether these practices had hurt U.S. prestige in the world, Falconer said, "it is something that is raised a lot."

Detainee Law May Not Provide Total Immunity For CIA Interrogators (MCT)

By Greg Gordon And Marisa Taylor

McClatchy Newspapers, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Congress has eased the worries of CIA interrogators and senior administration officials by granting them immunity from U.S. criminal prosecutions for all but "grave" abuses of terrorism detainees.

But legislation passed Friday may not leave them entirely in the clear.

International legal experts said the measure is meaningless overseas, where international courts theoretically could still prosecute alleged violations of anti-torture treaties.

The same experts concede such prosecutions are highly unlikely - but not because there's no evidence of wrongdoing. Instead, they predict American economic, military and political power will deter any country from allowing the cases to proceed.

"The obstacles to these prosecutions are not legal, they're political," said William Schabas, director of the Irish Center for Human Rights at the National University of Ireland in Galway. "There's certainly an arguable case that international crimes have been committed by American officials, and probably with the blessing of civilian political leaders going right to the top."

President Bush asserts that al-Qaida terrorists are a different kind of enemy and that the Geneva Conventions ensuring the humane treatment of prisoners were too vague to define what interrogation methods could be used to extract information that might prevent another Sept. 11. He said in announcing the transfer of 14 top terror suspects from secret CIA prisons to Guantanamo Bay that the United States does not torture, but that "alternative" techniques gleaned information that disrupted attacks and saved lives.

Human rights groups here and abroad, however, are in an uproar, assailing tactics such as giving a detainee a drowning sensation or shackling him to the floor naked for hours in a 50-degree room.

On the Senate floor Wednesday, Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., said some of the techniques appear to have broken the law, and that through amnesty, "those who sent out the memos, those who gave the new directions will be off the hook," setting a precedent that "will make it harder to prosecute war criminals who abuse Americans."

The firestorm seems sure to rage on, because the new legislation appears to allow Bush to authorize continued use of some coercive interrogation tactics, possibly including sleep deprivation or making a detainee stand for hours.

The law itself also is expected to face strong legal challenges in the United States, mainly because it bars captives from appealing their detentions in court.

Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents hundreds of detainees, said his group is preparing to file new war crimes charges in November in Germany against more than a dozen senior U.S. officials, probably including attorneys who shaped the policy. Two years ago, the group filed similar charges against Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and 10 others - charges that were dismissed after Rumsfeld hedged on whether he would attend a conference in Germany.

Legal experts say charges also could be filed in a recently created International Criminal Court in The Hague, Netherlands, which has jurisdiction over war crimes. European authorities are under pressure to respond to allegations that they breached human rights laws by cooperating with illegal CIA kidnappings and detentions of their own citizens. Italy has issued arrest warrants for 22 CIA agents.

Avril McDonald, an international law expert based in The Hague, said it's possible that U.S. officials could be charged with conspiracy in the ICC or in countries such as Belgium, whose legal systems allow private parties to bring war crimes charges.

At least 11 officials were involved in shaping the U.S. policy for interrogating captives overseas, including three Cabinet members - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who was White House counsel at the time, Rumsfeld and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who officials say was consulted while he was chief of the Justice Department's Criminal Division. Another of those involved is 9th Circuit federal appeals court judge Jay Bybee, who as an assistant attorney general signed off on it.

Even if there were no prosecutions, experts said, the fallout from revelations over the U.S. government's secret policy could tarnish America's moral standing in the world.

Adam Roberts, a professor of international relations at Oxford University and co-editor of the book "Documents on the Laws of War," noted that the United States has been at the forefront in urging prosecutions of war criminals in genocides in Bosnia and Rwanda "no matter how high the positions" they held.

Roberts called the provision of immunity for all but grave abuses "extremely controversial both within the USA and internationally," adding that it sets a bad example for dictatorships to follow. He also said U.S. personnel could be arrested and prosecuted if they travel abroad and are recognized as alleged violators.

Congress was pressed into action after the Supreme Court ruled June 29 that Bush overstepped his authority in setting up a special military court system for terror detainees. The high court also suggested that the Geneva Conventions could apply.

The legislation now headed to Bush's desk not only creates a new military court system but also grants immunity to everyone involved in creating or carrying out the interrogation policies, so long as they did not commit "grave" Geneva violations. Sponsors of the bill said it would prohibit the most controversial technique - simulated drowning, known as "water boarding" - a method that sources say was used on self-proclaimed Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and No. 3 man Abu Zubaydah.

The policy permitting such tactics emerged as administration lawyers grappled with the reach of the president's war powers in responding to the Sept. 11 attacks. In January 2002, the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel issued an opinion that the Geneva Conventions do not apply to violent, stateless actors such as al-Qaida and the Taliban in Afghanistan.

When Secretary State Colin Powell objected, then-White House Counsel Gonzales urged Bush to stand firm. If the Geneva prohibition on "outrages upon personal dignity" applied, Gonzales wrote in a memo, U.S. officials could face prosecution under the 1996 U.S. War Crimes Act that enforced the treaty.

If Geneva were ruled inapplicable, he said, that "would provide a solid defense to any future prosecution."

With the CIA pressing for precise guidance on how far it could go in interrogating senior al-Qaida captives, Office of Legal Counsel chief Bybee issued a controversial Aug. 1, 2002, memo defining torture as actions triggering severe pain akin to organ failure "or even death."

John Yoo, the lawyer who drafted the memo, said in an interview on Wednesday that he and other administration lawyers faced "the toughest kinds of questions" in the months after Sept. 11 and "tried to do their best to protect the government from future attacks from a very dangerous enemy."

Powell wasn't the only dissenter. FBI Director Robert Mueller directed bureau counter-terrorism agents to stay out of the room during coercive interrogations of detainees in Guantanamo Bay, said a U.S. government official who insisted upon anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter.

While criminal prosecutions have been brought over abuse of Prisoners of War in Iraq and the death of a detainee in Afghanistan, a person familiar with the program said the interrogations of senior al-Qaida figures at secret sites were "very tightly controlled," with a physician and psychologist present.

Experts in international law said that the tactics would violate the Geneva Conventions, which override any nation's assertion of amnesty for war crimes.

"Legally, this isn't worth the paper it's written on," said McDonald, of the T.M.C. Asser Institute in The Hague.

Even so, Martin Lederman, a Georgetown University law professor, called it "virtually inconceivable" that interrogators who abided by Justice Department guidelines would face U.S. prosecution even without the amnesty provision.

The department's advice "was completely wrong in many respects, but nevertheless, it was probably reasonable for them to rely on it," Lederman said. Senior administration officials could argue they made reasonable legal interpretations, he said.

Yoo, now a University of California law professor who has written a book defending the expansion of the president's war powers, argued that Bush could abrogate any international treaty. He said he is not worried about legal liability.

Pirates Of The Mediterranean (NYT)

By Robert Harris

Kintbury, England

IN the autumn of 68 B.C. the world's only military superpower was dealt a profound psychological blow by a daring terrorist attack on its very heart. Rome's port at Ostia was set on fire, the consular war fleet destroyed, and two prominent senators, together with their bodyguards and staff, kidnapped.

The incident, dramatic though it was, has not attracted much attention from modern historians. But history is mutable. An event that was merely a footnote five years ago has now, in our post-9/11 world, assumed a fresh and ominous significance. For in the panicky aftermath of the attack, the Roman people made decisions that set them on the path to the destruction of their Constitution, their democracy and their liberty. One cannot help wondering if history is repeating itself.

Consider the parallels. The perpetrators of this spectacular assault were not in the pay of any foreign power: no nation would have dared to attack Rome so provocatively. They were, rather, the disaffected of the earth: "The ruined men of all nations," in the words of the great 19th-century German historian Theodor Mommsen, "a piratical state with a peculiar esprit de corps."

Like Al Qaeda, these pirates were loosely organized, but able to spread a disproportionate amount of fear among citizens who had believed themselves immune from attack. To quote Mommsen again: "The Latin husbandman, the traveler on the Appian highway, the genteel bathing visitor at the terrestrial paradise of Baiae were no longer secure of their property or their life for a single moment."

What was to be done? Over the preceding centuries, the Constitution of ancient Rome had developed an intricate series of checks and balances intended to prevent the concentration of power in the hands of a single individual. The consulship, elected annually, was jointly held by two men. Military commands were of limited duration and subject to regular renewal. Ordinary citizens were accustomed to a remarkable degree of liberty: the cry of "Civis Romanus sum" — "I am a Roman citizen" — was a guarantee of safety throughout the world.

But such was the panic that ensued after Ostia that the people were willing to compromise these rights. The greatest soldier in Rome, the 38-year-old Gnaeus Pompeius Magnus (better known to posterity as Pompey the Great) arranged for a lieutenant of his, the tribune Aulus Gabinius, to rise in the Roman Forum and propose an astonishing new law.

"Pompey was to be given not only the supreme naval command but what amounted in fact to an absolute authority and uncontrolled power over everyone," the Greek historian Plutarch wrote. "There were not many places in the Roman world that were not included within these limits."

Pompey eventually received almost the entire contents of the Roman Treasury — 144 million sesterces — to pay for his "war on terror," which included building a fleet of 500 ships and raising an army of 120,000 infantry and 5,000 cavalry. Such an accumulation of power was unprecedented, and there was literally a riot in the Senate when the bill was debated.

Nevertheless, at a tumultuous mass meeting in the center of Rome, Pompey's opponents were cowed into submission, the Lex Gabinia passed (illegally), and he was given his power. In the end, once he put to sea, it took less than three months to sweep the pirates from the entire Mediterranean. Even allowing for Pompey's genius as a military strategist, the suspicion arises that if the pirates could be defeated so swiftly, they could hardly have been such a grievous threat in the first place.

But it was too late to raise such questions. By the oldest trick in the political book — the whipping up of a panic, in which any dissenting voice could be dismissed as "soft" or even "traitorous" — powers had been ceded by the people that would never be returned. Pompey stayed in the Middle East for six years, establishing puppet regimes throughout the region, and turning himself into the richest man in the empire.

Those of us who are not Americans can only look on in wonder at the similar ease with which the ancient rights and liberties of the individual are being surrendered in the United States in the wake of 9/11. The vote by the Senate on Thursday to suspend the right of habeas corpus for terrorism detainees, denying them their right to challenge their detention in court; the careful wording about torture, which forbids only the inducement of "serious" physical and mental suffering to obtain information; the admissibility of evidence obtained in the United States without a search warrant; the licensing of the president to declare a legal resident of the United States an enemy combatant — all this represents an historic shift in the balance of power between the citizen and the executive.

An intelligent, skeptical American would no doubt scoff at the thought that what has happened since 9/11 could presage the destruction of a centuries-old constitution; but then, I suppose, an intelligent, skeptical Roman in 68 B.C. might well have done the same.

In truth, however, the Lex Gabinia was the beginning of the end of the Roman republic. It set a precedent. Less than a decade later, Julius Caesar — the only man, according to Plutarch, who spoke out in favor of Pompey's special command during the Senate debate — was awarded similar, extended military sovereignty in Gaul. Previously, the state, through the Senate, largely had direction of its armed forces; now the armed forces began to assume direction of the state.

It also brought a flood of money into an electoral system that had been designed for a simpler, non-imperial era. Caesar, like Pompey, with all the resources of Gaul at his disposal, became immensely wealthy, and used his treasure to fund his own political faction. Henceforth, the result of elections was determined largely by which candidate had the most money to bribe the electorate. In 49 B.C., the system collapsed completely, Caesar crossed the Rubicon — and the rest, as they say, is ancient history.

It may be that the Roman republic was doomed in any case. But the disproportionate reaction to the raid on Ostia unquestionably hastened the process, weakening the restraints on military adventurism and corrupting the political process. It was to be more than 1,800 years before anything remotely comparable to Rome's democracy — imperfect though it was — rose again.

The Lex Gabinia was a classic illustration of the law of unintended consequences: it fatally subverted the institution it was supposed to protect. Let us hope that vote in the United States Senate does not have the same result.

Officials Plan To Move Quickly For Terrorism Trials In Spring (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29 — Officials at the Justice Department and the Pentagon said Friday that they would move quickly to adopt the regulations on treating terrorism suspects as soon as President Bush signed them law.

The military said it planned to go to trial with up to 14 senior members of Al Qaeda, as government lawyers prepared to defend a provision that would strip hundreds of other suspects of their right to challenge in court their detention.

The Justice Department officials said they would argue in court that the new law would wipe out all the suits by the 450 or so detainees who have been held at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. The bill would retroactively strip the detainees of the ability to file habeas corpus challenges that oblige the government to defend its reasons for detention before a federal judge.

Civil liberties groups are preparing to challenge that aspect of the law, most likely in an appeals court here that is already wrestling with a related suit on habeas corpus that was started before the new measure. The 14 senior Qaeda members at Guantánamo were recently sent there after as long as four years in secret Central Intelligence Agency custody.

The military is planning to put in motion the new procedures to try those suspects for war crimes before military commissions, though government and private lawyers estimate that the trials could begin no earlier than next spring.

The law provides for explicit Congressional approval of the commissions to try figures like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, thought to be the chief planner of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and other senior Qaeda prisoners who were in secret C.I.A. custody.

It is widely accepted that the new trials before a panel of military officers will take some time to organize.

"It's clear that the trials are not going to occur anywhere in the near future," said Eugene R. Fidell, a lawyer here who has closely followed the debate on the military commissions.

Kristine Huskey, a professor of clinical law at American University who represents a Guantánamo detainee, said it appeared that any trials would not start until spring at the earliest. Professor Huskey said that at a recent panel at her university, Brig. Gen. Thomas L. Hemingway, the Air Force officer who is legal adviser for the commissions, said the Pentagon was planning to spend the next month or so preparing a manual of procedures for the commissions before proceeding.

In a conference call with civilian lawyers on Thursday, General Hemingway said that his office hoped to move as quickly as possible to begin the trials and that the Pentagon was setting up a new appeals panel for the military commissions that would be composed entirely of military appeals judges.

Under the commission system that the Supreme Court overturned, the appeals panel was to be made up of senior civilian lawyers like Judge Griffin Bell, attorney general under President Jimmy Carter, and William T. Coleman, a former transportation secretary.

Military officials and lawyers have estimated that charges against the Qaeda prisoners are not likely to be brought before the end of January. The hiring of defense lawyers and challenges would make it unlikely that any trial could begin before the spring, they said.

After the new regulations are published and possibly challenged, it is almost certain that commission prosecutors will begin preparing cases against some or all the 14 new prisoners. Mr. Bush has said they will face war crimes trials. Other officials have suggested that some of the 14 will not be charged.

Any of the 14 who are charged will be assigned military lawyers. At that point, they are likely to acquire civilian defense lawyers, too. Bill Goodman, the legal director of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which has coordinated the assignment of volunteer lawyers for the hundreds of habeas suits, said several lawyers had expressed interest in representing the senior Qaeda officials.

Government lawyers and civil liberties groups say they expect the constitutionality of blocking habeas suits to be contested in the federal appeals court here.

After Mr. Bush signs the bill, government lawyers said, they expect to file briefs in the pending case in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The government is expected to argue that the suits filed by dozens of lawyers on behalf of all the Guantánamo detainees who were there before the 14 arrived this month are no longer valid.

Tribunal Bill Sets Up An Ironic Legal Limbo (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

Detainees deemed less of a threat might go untried yet be unable to challenge detention.

WASHINGTON — The bill that Congress approved Friday to bring terrorism suspects to trial contains a central irony: The suspects considered most dangerous will have the most rights, while the others will remain in legal limbo with no ability to challenge their detention.

The government plans to try about 100 of the detainees being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba — those suspected of the most serious crimes against the United States. These prisoners, and any others charged, would be able to appeal convictions to the U.S. courts.

The other 355 detainees, who are considered less of a threat, may never be tried and may therefore be denied the right to challenge their imprisonment.

"It leaves them with no protection. You can put someone down there and never bring charges against them and leave them in that status forever," said retired Rear Adm. Don Guter, a former Navy judge advocate general.

The tribunal legislation also raises the prospect for the first time that foreigners in the United States could be declared "enemy combatants" and sent to Guantanamo, according to defense lawyers and advocacy groups.

Under the legislation, "enemy combatants" are defined to include not only people who have engaged in hostilities against the U.S. but people who have "purposefully and materially supported" hostilities.

The definition, which "certainly goes far beyond the battlefield, will include people who never took up arms or planned attacks, and will include people who simply gave money," said Chris Anders, a legislative counsel with the American Civil Liberties Union. "It greatly expands the number of people who can have their habeas rights stripped and potentially be brought before military commissions."

The tribunal bill officially strips prisoners of the right to challenge their detention under a writ of habeas corpus.

The legislation, which President Bush plans to sign soon, will set up the nation's first system for trying terrorism suspects. It is expected to face court challenges from detainees' lawyers.

U.S. officials plan to try 14 terrorism suspects who were secretly held by the CIA until recently, and 10 other detainees have been charged.

Officials are seeking, with mixed success, to send others swept up in the war in Afghanistan back to their homelands.

Administration officials say they have no intention of indefinitely holding people without charge and are working to clear detainees they do not intend to try. "We would like it to be less than 100 in Guantanamo," said a Pentagon official.

Although detainees could begin to be charged in the fall, the Defense Department needs at least a month to develop additional rules for the new military commissions. Defense lawyers said they did not expect the trials to begin before February.

The Justice Department has begun identifying federal prosecutors who could assist in the trials before the commissions. Under the statute, the Defense Department will be permitted to designate nonmilitary trial counsel.

Soon after Bush signs the measure into law, Justice Department lawyers are expected to request court dismissal of petitions challenging the confinement of hundreds of Guantanamo detainees.

The State Department has been working to send most of those detainees home, but it has run into trouble with the three countries where most are citizens: Afghanistan does not have the prisons to hold them, Yemen has not assured the U.S. they won't be tortured, and Saudi Arabia worries that they could destabilize the ruling regime.

"Anyone who was picked up wrongly we have either sent back home or are trying to send back," said an administration official.

Congressional negotiators said there was never any intention that everyone in Guantanamo would be tried.

"The idea was the guys we have the goods on, let's try, and the guys we don't, let's do something else with them," said a congressional aide involved in the negotiations.

Defense lawyers question what "something else" might be. Some wondered what would happen if home countries refused to take the detainees back but the U.S. lacked enough evidence to try them.

"The detainee who isn't charged with anything, he sits forever," said Army Maj. Tom Fleener, a military defense lawyer. "It is an absurd twist."

Besides the 100 or so detainees to be tried, defense and other administration officials say, any other Al Qaeda members or other international terrorists whom the U.S. captures could also be sent before a commission.

The officials say the system is not meant to try unlawful combatants in Iraq or Afghanistan who have attacked American troops.

Marine Maj. Michael Mori, who represents Guantanamo detainee David Hicks of Australia, says that just shows how the new tribunal system is more political than judicial.

"We are releasing people who have been shooting at American forces," Mori said. "There are people who have been shooting at Americans in Iraq and Afghanistan; why aren't they being tried? Because this isn't meant to be a real system."

Although the Pentagon says it does not intend to prosecute people captured in Iraq or the majority of detainees in Guantanamo, critics said the bill is written very broadly, in a way that would allow the military to prosecute any non-American suspected of being an enemy combatant.

"The justice system they created is so open they could try thousands and thousands of people," Fleener said. "Practically, though, I hope it's only a handful."

The congressional aide involved in the bill negotiations said the broad definition was necessary to ensure that Salim Ahmed Hamdan, Osama bin Laden's driver, could be charged under the law, as well as detainees accused of having made bombs to be used against U.S. troops.

A senior administration official disputed the idea that the definition in the law was overly broad and said that just because someone could be tried did not mean the person would be.

"The only people who will be tried will be people who have committed a crime," said the official.

But giving uncharged detainees the right to challenge their detention, the official said, would clog the courts with combatants legitimately captured on the battlefield. Instead, military judges are to periodically review their cases and status.

"In a normal war, people do not have a right to challenge their detention," the official said. "But we acknowledge this war is different, and we are giving them appropriate access to the courts."

Legal experts were divided on whether the restriction violated detainees' rights. The Supreme Court held in a 1950 case, Johnson vs. Eisentrager, that foreigners charged by a military commission had no constitutional right to challenge their confinement in civilian courts.

Though the situation of the Guantanamo detainees is different — they were picked up during an unconventional war and are afforded few rights by the status review boards — the current Supreme Court may be disinclined to depart from the precedent.

"The attorneys are going to have to go in and persuade a court that Eisentrager is either different in context or should be reinterpreted or overruled," said Scott Silliman, an expert in military law at Duke University law school. "I won't say that is an easy challenge. I think it is going to be a difficult challenge."

(INFOBOX BELOW)
Tribunal system
The military commissions to be used to try terrorism suspects differ in significant ways from the civilian courts.
· Detainees will have no right to file a writ of habeas corpus in U.S. courts to challenge their detention as unlawful.
· Suspects will have no right to a speedy trial.
· Tribunals will be able to consider evidence that is obtained through coercion, though not through torture.
· Hearsay evidence will be allowed.
· Verdicts will be delivered not by juries, but by members of the armed services presided over by a military lawyer.

Pakistan Accused Of Illegal Detentions (AP)

By Munir Ahmad, Associated Press Writer
AP, September 30, 2006

Pakistan illegally detained innocent people on suspicion of terrorism, secretly imprisoned them, and transferred them to U.S. custody for money, human rights watchdog Amnesty International said Friday.

President Gen. Pervez Musharraf, in a memoir released days ago, wrote that his government has earned bounties totaling "millions of dollars" from the transfer of terror suspects to U.S. authorities.

Hundreds of Pakistanis and foreigners were rounded up in Pakistan on suspicion of links to terrorism since the U.S.-led war on terror started after the Sept. 11 attacks, Amnesty said in a report, titled "Human Rights Ignored in the War on Terror."

"The war on terror has added a new layer of human rights violations to the existing patterns of abuses (in Pakistan)," said Angelika Pathak, an Amnesty researcher who helped prepare the report.

"The phenomenon of enforced disappearance was virtually unknown before the war on terror," Pathak said.

Amnesty suggested the lure of U.S. government rewards led in many cases to the illegal arrests of people, including women and children, in Pakistan.

Pakistan also has its own bounty program that provides money for the capture of suspected terrorists, which the Amnesty report did not take into consideration.

"Bounty hunters — including police officers and local people — have captured individuals of different nationalities, often apparently at random, and sold them into U.S. custody," said Claudio Cordone, senior director of research at Amnesty International.

Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam rejected the report's allegations that Pakistan illegally detained people in exchange for money.

"Whenever we arrest any foreign terror suspect, we try to send him back to the country he belongs," she told The Associated Press. "In most of the cases, such suspects are not accepted by their own government."

"Naturally, we cannot keep them here," she said.

Amnesty's allegations, largely based on interviews with former detainees, came days after Musharraf revealed in his memoir that Pakistan had captured 689 al-Qaida terror suspects and turned over 369 to Washington.

"We have earned bounties totaling millions of dollars," Musharraf wrote in his book, "In The Line of Fire," without specifying how much was paid.

Cordone said in a statement that many people detained in Pakistan ended up in secret locations or at U.S. prisons, including Guantanamo Bay and Bagram, north of the Afghan capital, Kabul.

"Hundreds of people have been picked up in mass arrests, many have been sold to the U.S.A. as 'terrorists' simply on the word of their captor, and hundreds have been transferred to Guantanamo Bay, Bagram Air base or secret detention centers run by the U.S.A.," he said. "The road to Guantanamo very literally starts in Pakistan."

Amnesty said the increase in enforced disappearances and holding of suspects incommunicado puts such detainees at "risk of torture and unlawful transfer to third countries."

Numerous detainees claimed U.S. agents were present during interrogations in Pakistan, the Amnesty report said. It also details the "unlawful transfer" of detainees into U.S. custody, including a Pakistani chicken farmer who was accused of being a deputy foreign minister for the Taliban and sent to Guantanamo.

Many innocents, including children, have also been rounded up in Pakistan under the pretext of the war on terror, the Amnesty report said.

"Some (children) were arrested alongside their adult relatives, some were themselves alleged to be terror suspects and some were held as hostages to make relatives give themselves up or confess," Amnesty stated.

The report also detailed the detentions and killings of reporters and activists allegedly targeted by Pakistani authorities. These include Hayatullah Khan, a journalist whose bullet-riddled body was found in the North Waziristan tribal region in June, more than six months after being detained.

Khan disappeared Dec. 5, 2005, days after photographing shrapnel from a Hellfire missile allegedly fired by an unmanned American aerial drone that killed a wanted Egyptian al-Qaida figure, Hamza Rabia, in the North Waziristan town of Mir Ali.

The photos sparked mass protests across Pakistan and spurred criticism of Islamabad's ties with Washington.

Members of Khan's family accused Pakistan's intelligence service of involvement in his disappearance, but authorities denied it. No one has claimed responsibility.

Mosque Leader Tells Of Disbelief (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Albany Times Union, September 30, 2006

Terror trial defendant says he thought FBI informant was crazy

ALBANY -- The leader of an Albany mosque testified Friday that he thought an FBI informant was crazy and lying when he spoke about a terrorist attack being planned in New York City.

Yassin M. Aref, a 36-year-old Kurdish refugee who was on the stand for the third straight day at his federal trial on terrorism-related charges, appeared to stun Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericak as he admitted hearing about the attack.

"Oh, you heard him say they are -- they were going to do a missile attack in New York City?" Pericak asked, his voice raising slightly.

FBI agents had been hiding in a car nearby, listening in when their informant, who went by the name "Malik," told Aref about the attack in February 2004. But the conversation, which is a critical part of the sting case, was not taped because the informant's recording device had fallen off moments before the meeting.

"I didn't hear the word 'missile,' but that day he say ... next week it will be attack there," Aref said. "And we get mad at him and kick him out. And he say he was joking after that. And I say this is not way to joke."

Pericak, who began his cross-examination of Aref on Friday morning, pressed the defendant on why he didn't call the FBI, especially since agents had visited him months earlier, left their business cards and asked him to report any suspicious activity.

"And an attack on New York City as described by Malik, that's not suspicious?" Pericak said.

"Yes, it was suspicious if I believe so, but 100 percent I was sure that's not right, that's not true," Aref answered.

Federal authorities allege Aref and his co-defendant, Mohammed M. Hossain, 51, who owns an Albany pizzeria, willingly took part in a scheme to launder money from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile to terrorists. The year-long sting began in August 2003 when the FBI sent the informant into Hossain's shop posing as a wealthy businessman interested in buying Hossain's struggling Central Avenue shop.

Over the next year, authorities said, the informant gave almost $50,000 cash to Hossain in an alleged money-laundering scheme that involved Hossain paying him back with checks in monthly installments.

Still, the scheme was set up by the government as a loan, and Aref and Hossain contend they believed all along that it was nothing more than that, despite the informant's talk about missiles and supplying "ammunition" to terrorist groups.

Aref, who speaks broken English, said he never understood those words when they were used by the informant. As authorities played excerpts from the secretly recorded meetings in court, the informant could be heard using an unusual pronunciation of the word "missile," which sounded like "mizz-aisle."

Pericak pressed Aref on other words used by the informant, including "mujahideen."

"When Malik said mujahideen, he was bringing ammunition to his brother mujahideen to fight the holy war, did you understand it to mean the same thing?" Pericak asked.

"Never I meant here the holy war," Aref answered.

Under follow-up questioning from his attorney, Terence L. Kindlon, Aref said the money-laundering allegations make no sense because he told the informant during a recorded conversation that he thought Hossain was borrowing more money than he needed, and that he was concerned about his ability to repay it.

Kindlon also questioned Aref about the night the informant blurted out a warning about an impending missile attack in New York City.

"Did you think it was crazy?" Kindlon asked.

"It is more than crazy, Mr. Kindlon," Aref said. "I get really mad. ... I told him get of my house."

During dozens of conversations between the informant and Aref, many of which were replayed for jurors on Friday, the informant can be heard soliciting spiritual advice from Aref as he baits him about whether it is all right under their Muslim faith to support a Pakistani terrorist group.

Aref cautioned the informant to be careful, warning him about American laws and the FBI, as he repeatedly told the informant he did not know anything about the group except what he had seen on television. He also encouraged the informant to help Muslims by donating money for women and children who may be suffering in oppressed and impoverished areas.

Aref is scheduled to resume his testimony on Monday as the trial enters its fourth week. Aref and Hossain, who are facing charges that include money laundering in support of terrorism, face up to 400 years if convicted.

Hossain, whom authorities said stood to make $5,000 from the loan, is pursuing an entrapment defense. Aref contends he was only called in to witness the loan, and that he never knew the informant claimed to be laundering money in connection with illegal arms dealing.

Prosecutors Cross Examine Aref (CAPN9)

Capital News 9, September 30, 2006

The leader of an Albany mosque who's facing terrorism-related charges was questioned by federal prosecutors on Friday. Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain are on trial in federal court stemming from their arrest in a sting operation in August 2004. Aref answered questions from his own attorneys on Wednesday and Thursday. On Friday, prosecutors cross examined him.

One of the defendants on trial for supposedly supporting terrorism faced cross examination Friday. Prosecutors tried to poke holes in the explanations given by Yassin Aref, as the mosque leader continued to argue he didn't know what was going on when he allegedly laundered money in a 2004 FBI sting operation. Our Steve Ference has been reporting on this case and has the latest details.

Prosecutors said Aref clearly understood the terrorism-related talk by the government's informant - known as Malik - who spoke with Aref during the sting. That includes talk about a missile, caught on audio tape and played for the courtroom where Malik told Aref, "That's why the missile that we sent it to New York City to teach President Musharraf the lesson." Aref said, "Right brother." Or did he? Aref maintains he asked, "What brother?" He also said he "thought said Messiah, not missile." The prosecutor asked, "You understood him to be sending the Messiah to New York?" Aref said, "No. I don't know what he was talking."

On Thursday, Aref told the court he didn't know what missile meant until he was arrested. But the government produced a document in which Aref had defined several words, including rocket equalling missile. It's unclear when it was written or what that would mean.

Aref also denied being part of the money-laundering scheme that would supposedly purchase the fake missile for the New York City plot, saying he thought when Malik the informant said he needed to legalize the money, it meant Malik would use the money scheme to pay his business taxes.

This leaves the jury to decide how honest Aref has or hasn't been in his testimony. The trial continues Monday.

6 Charged In Md. Arms Deal Sting (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, September 30, 2006

Officials say Tamil Tigers were to receive weapons

Six South Asian arms dealers who paid undercover customs agents in Maryland hundreds of thousands of dollars to ship restricted, high-tech weapons to rebels in Sri Lanka and the Indonesian Army have been arrested by federal authorities in Guam, officials said yesterday.

The elaborate sting operation took center stage in Baltimore this summer, where federal agents put up a Singapore arms broker at a four-star Inner Harbor hotel, arranged for him to attend religious services at a mosque in Laurel and took him to a shooting range in Harford County so he could test-fire machine guns they said he was interested in illegally buying.

The ruse, authorities said, led representatives for the Tamil Tigers insurgents in Sri Lanka to deposit $700,000 with undercover agents as a down payment for millions of dollars in sniper rifles, submachine guns and grenade launchers. The arms dealers also inquired about unmanned air vehicles and buying surface-to-air missiles to shoot down Israeli-built aircraft in Sri Lanka, according to federal court papers.

Yesterday's announcement once again highlighted how attractive Maryland appears to be to arms dealers who want to buy banned state-of-the-art weapons in a state rich with defense contractors. Officials said they have stepped up enforcement, pointing out that the original tip in the case was handled by a military technology task force set up by federal and local law enforcement in 2002 to root out those who attempt to export arms illegally.

Last month, FBI agents searched the office of a Cumberland physician who is president of a Sri Lankan charitable organization suspected of funneling money to the Tamil Tigers. Officials said yesterday that the two cases are unrelated.

"It's our commitment to make sure we do everything we can not only to make sure that terrorists don't attack us in the United States, but terrorists do not find any support here in the United States for their activities overseas," Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said at a news conference yesterday.

Federal prosecutors charged all six defendants - Haniffa Bin Osman, 55, of Singapore; Thirunavukarasu Varatharasa, 36, of Sri Lanka; and Erick Wotulo, 60, Haji Subandi, 69, Reinhard Rusli, 34, and Helmi Soedirdja, 33, of Indonesia - with conspiracy to export arms and munitions.

Osman, Wotulo and Subandi were also accused of money laundering and conspiring to provide material support to a terrorist organization.

The defendants, arrested Thursday and yesterday, traveled to the American-controlled South Pacific island to purchase night vision devices, sniper rifles, submachine guns with suppressors and grenade launchers. Federal prosecutors from Maryland will ask a judge in Guam on Monday to send the defendants to Baltimore for trial. The maximum prison sentences range from five years on conspiracy to export arms to 20 years for money laundering.

The military equipment at issue, which can only be purchased in the United States by a licensed dealer for an approved customer, was to be shipped to the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, also known as the Tamil Tigers, and customers in Indonesia, including the army, according to court papers and interviews with federal officials.

Mark Bastan, acting special agent in charge of the Baltimore office of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said the potential arms shipment would have weighed more than 3 1/2 tons and would have filled 14 pallets on a truck.

"American-made weapons and weapons technology are the envy of the world. And they give us a competitive military edge," Bastan said, adding that the mission to combat the illegal export of military technology was among his agency's highest priorities. The customs investigators were aided by agents from the Baltimore FBI, the Defense Criminal Investigative Service and the Baltimore Police Department.

Investigators said they set up their operations in 2004 when an arms broker suspect contacted an undercover customs agent about acquiring arms for the Tamil Tigers. According to court papers, the broker became the link in both cases, introducing federal agents to those interested in buying weapons for the Tamil Tigers as well as the Indonesian military.

The Tamil Tigers have long advocated the violent overthrow of the Sri Lankan government, using suicide bombings. The State Department labeled the Tamil Tigers as a foreign terrorist organization in 1997. The paramilitary organization cannot legally raise money or buy sensitive military equipment in the United States. But experts said the Sri Lankan rebels have skirted the ban by seeking out arms in other countries.

"They have a global arms procurement network" stretching from Croatia to South Africa to Singapore, said Peter Chalk, senior analyst at the Rand Corp., based in Santa Monica, Calif.

The Tamil Tigers, Chalk said, purchased its most sophisticated weapons with funds raised largely by the foreign diaspora who support their cause, he said. A truce between the rebels and government forces ended in August of this year, leading to the conflict's resumption.

From March 2004 until April this year, Subandi told the undercover agent in Maryland that he intended to sell conventional arms and munitions to the Tamil Tigers, according to court papers.

On May 24, federal prosecutors said, Subandi told agents that Osman, a representative for the Tamil Tigers, wanted grenade launchers and other weapons delivered to a spot in international waters off Sri Lanka's coast.

Wotulo, who identified himself two days later to undercover agents as a retired Indonesian Marine Corps general, entered the negotiations to submit a purchase order for nine restricted items totaling about $3 million, authorities said.

But it was Osman who traveled to Baltimore in late July and stayed at the Harborplace Renaissance Hotel. There, he told agents that the arms Wotulo requested were for the Tamil Tigers, and Osman knew the delivery would be illegal, according to court papers. Osman told agents that a subsequent order could be worth as much as $15 million, prosecutors said.

On July 28, Osman test-fired several of the weapons, including machine guns, at a Harford County police range, according to the indictment.

"After hours or in low-light conditions, it wouldn't stick out with a strong government or police feel," Havre de Grace police spokesman Maj. John Van Gilder.

The indictment says that on Aug. 2, undercover agents received $250,000 from a bank in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, as a down payment for the weapons purchase, expected to total $900,000.

DOJ_NMG_0071988

Osman and Varatharasa met with undercover agents in Guam to inspect the weapons on Monday, federal prosecutors said. They were arrested days later.

4 Charged In Plot To Ship Arms (WP)

By Eric Rich, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

U.S. Agents Ran Md. Sting Operation

BALTIMORE, Sept. 29 -- An elaborate sting involving a business in Maryland that was secretly run by federal agents has led to the arrests of four foreign nationals on charges of conspiring to illegally ship surface-to-air missiles and other weapons to the Sri Lankan rebel group known as the Tamil Tigers, authorities said Friday.

The suspects are accused of arranging, during negotiations that accelerated in April, for a $900,000 shipment of arms to be delivered to international waters in the Indian Ocean. The shipment was to be received by members of the violent separatist group, which the United States has designated a terrorist organization since 1997.

Mark J. Bastan, the special agent in charge of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Baltimore office, said at a news conference that the shoulder-fired missiles, grenade launchers, machine guns and other weapons amounted to "an arsenal of U.S. military hardware -- enough to inflict serious casualties on any military force, let alone a civilian population."

Although the suspects lived overseas, one -- Haniffa bin Osman of Singapore -- traveled to Baltimore in July, according to an indictment unsealed yesterday along with two criminal complaints. Bastan said undercover agents "wined and dined" Osman as he stayed at a four-star hotel on the Inner Harbor. "We treated him like any other businessman," Bastan said.

At one point, he said, Osman test-fired some of the weapons at a firing range in Havre de Grace, Md., -- but only after signs indicating that the facility belonged to local police had been removed.

U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said the suspects were arrested Thursday and Friday in Guam, where they had met with undercover agents to finalize the details of delivery to the ethnic separatist group.

The Tamil Tigers have been among the world's most lethal rebel groups, carrying out scores of suicide bombings on the island nation of Sri Lanka since the late 1980s. The conflict between the Tigers and the government, which is dominated by members of the Sinhalese majority, has by many estimates claimed at least 65,000 lives.

In 1991, a suspected Tamil Tiger member assassinated former Indian prime minister Rajiv Gandhi. Two years later, another suspected member of the group staged a suicide bomb attack that killed Sri Lankan President Ranasinghe Premadasa and 23 others.

In addition to Osman, 55, the indictment unsealed here accuses Indonesian nationals Erick Wotulo, 60, and Haji Subandi, 69, of conspiring to provide material support to a terrorist organization, conspiring to export arms without a required State Department license and money laundering. A related criminal complaint filed in Guam charges Thirunavukarasu Varatharasa, 36, a citizen of Sri Lanka, as a participant in the alleged conspiracy to export arms.

Subandi is also charged in a separate complaint, along with two other Indonesian nationals, with conspiring to ship state-of the-art night vision goggles to Indonesia without the necessary State Department approvals. Authorities said Subandi described the other defendants -- Reinhard Rusli, 34, and Helmi Soedirdja, 33 -- as his financial partners in that transaction.

Rosenstein said the suspects are expected to appear in federal court in Guam, a U.S. territory, on Monday and to later be transferred to Baltimore.

According to the indictment, Subandi presented himself as a broker as he corresponded with the undercover business on a regular basis beginning in March 2004 in an effort to secure military equipment and technology for potential buyers in Sri Lanka and Indonesia. The documents made public Friday do not indicate how those contacts began, and authorities for security reasons declined to provide details about the bogus company beyond what was contained in the public court file.

But in April, the indictment says, Subandi e-mailed the undercover business about a possible purchase of weapons that he said were for the Tamil Tigers. In May, it says, Subandi identified Wotulo and Osman as Tamil Tiger representatives who would be involved in the transaction.

In an e-mail to the agents May 26, the indictment says, Wotulo identified himself as a retired Indonesian Marine Corps general and wrote, "I understand this business is dangerous, also extraordinary, high risk." It says he later told the agents that "the chief" of the rebel group had requested that he and Osman travel to Baltimore -- although, in the end, only Osman allegedly did so.

In Baltimore, in late July, Osman told the agents that although he was helping the rebel group obtain arms, he was not a member. He said that if the delivery was successful, a second order could be worth as much as $15 million.

Also while in Maryland, Osman told undercover agents that Varatharasa would inspect the weaponry before it would be accepted by the rebel group, the complaint against Varatharasa says.

On Aug. 2, the undercover business received a $250,00 deposit in the form of a wire transfer from a bank in Kuala Lumpur, that complaint says.

It says Osman and Varatharasa met with the undercover agents in Guam on Monday. Then and the next day, they finalized the transaction, inspecting the shipment and arranging for $450,000 to be transferred as further payment.

Six Indicted In Arms Brokering For Tamil Tigers And Indonesia (AP)

By BRIAN WITTE

AP, September 30, 2006

BALTIMORE - Arms brokers for the Tamil Tiger terrorist group are charged with trying to buy missiles and other weapons through undercover agents in Maryland, along with arms dealers who tried to get military equipment for the Indonesian Army, federal officials said Friday.

Haji Subandi, a suspected international arms dealer from Indonesia, was at the center of two conspiracies to buy weapons and other military equipment, said U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein.

"The common tie between the two conspiracies is that members of both conspiracies dealt with a suspected international arms dealer named Haji Subandi, who acted as a broker and arranged for military equipment to be purchased," Rosenstein said at a news conference in Baltimore.

The Tamil Tigers are a rebel group that began fighting in 1983 for a separate state on the Indian Ocean island of Sri Lanka. The group was added to the U.S. State Department's list of foreign terrorist organizations in 1997. The designation bars the group from raising money, obtaining weaponry or lobbying for support in the United States.

In one conspiracy, Subandi made numerous requests to the undercover agents between March 2004 and April 2006 on behalf of Tamil Tigers to acquire night-vision goggles, special forces weaponry, communication devices, sonar technology and unmanned aerial vehicles, according to a federal indictment.

Subandi, 69, has been charged with Haniffa Bin Osman, 55, and Erick Wotulo, 60, in a three-count indictment unsealed Friday. They are charged with conspiracy to export arms and munitions, conspiracy to provide material support to a foreign terrorist organization, and money laundering.

Thirunavukarasu Varatharasa, 36, of Sri Lanka, also is charged with being part of the conspiracy.

Wotulo, who identified himself to undercover agents as a retired Indonesian Marine Corps general, submitted a purchase order in June to a dummy business set up by U.S. investigators for weapons totaling about $3 million, authorities said. Osman told undercover agents that if the first order was successful, a second order could be worth as much as $15 million.

In another conspiracy, Subandi is charged with conspiracy to violate the arms export control act, along with Reinhard Rusli, 34, and Helmi Soedirdja, 33. The three are Indonesian citizens. They allegedly conspired to ship night-vision goggles and a holographic weapons sight to customers in Indonesia, according to the indictment.

All the men were arrested Thursday and Friday in Guam, where they met to examine the weapons, which weighed 3.5 tons and filled up 14 pallets in a truck, said Mark Bastan, acting special agent in charge of the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement office in Baltimore.

"They had a plan to ship these weapons from Guam to members to the Tamil Tigers in the Indian Ocean, where they would then be used for their terrorist purposes," Rosenstein said.

The weapons waiting for them included grenade launchers, submachine guns, sniper rifles and night-vision devices, Bastan said.

Bastan said the weapons were intended to be used against the Sri Lankan government, but it was unclear whether they were to be used for a specific attack.

Authorities said that among the weapons Osman sought to purchase were surface-to-air missiles.

"The indictment quotes one defendant as saying that the Stinger missiles were for the Tamil Tigers to use in downing Israeli aircraft flown by Israeli pilots in Sri Lanka for the Sri Lankan Air Force," Bastan said.

Under the operation initiated by ICE, investigators posed as arms dealers, wining and dining Osman when he came to Baltimore in July to work out the deal. Investigators even took him to the Havre de Grace police department's firing range near the Susquehanna River to test some of the guns.

"We just took the police signs off" the range, Bastan said, describing the set up.

Last month, U.S. officials in New York announced that eight emissaries of the rebel group had conspired to buy surface-to-air missiles in the United States amid an escalating conflict with military forces in Sri Lanka. The men charged in that case also tried to get the Tamil Tigers removed from a list of terrorist organizations and sought to bribe U.S. officials for classified information, according to a criminal complaint.

The National Intelligence Estimate doesn't say what Bush says it does. How will he handle upcoming secret reports on Iran and Iraq? WEB EXCLUSIVE

The White House's release of a dire National Intelligence Estimate on global terrorism has illustrated once again how easy it is to publicly misrepresent intelligence-community findings—especially when almost all of the key documents remained shrouded in secrecy.

Only two days ago, while attempting to knock down stories by The New York Times and other publications about the NIE, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow insisted to reporters that the document's conclusions were entirely consistent with the public statements of the president and other Bush administration officials.

News reports on the NIE "contain nothing that the president hasn't said," Snow told reporters in Riverside, Conn. "Obviously, we're not going to go into what the classified report does say, but … the substance is precisely what the president has been saying."

But the actual wording of the NIE contains sobering conclusions that, in tone and substance, are very different from what Bush and other administration officials have recently been saying about the government's progress in the war on terror. Even more potentially problematic for the White House, intelligence-community officials say, there are at least two more secret studies underway that are likely to undercut the administration's public positions on sensitive national-security issues.

The NIE, which is supposed to reflect the consensus judgment of the U.S. intelligence community, states that the global jihadist movement "is spreading and adapting to counter-terrorism efforts"; that the number of jihadists are "increasing in both number and geographic dispersion," and that the war in Iraq had become "the cause celebre" for jihadis around the world, "breeding a deep resentment of U.S involvement in the Muslim world and cultivating supporters for the global jihadist movement."

None of these downbeat assessments could be found in President Bush's speech just three weeks ago when he described the government's war on terror since September 11 in largely upbeat terms.

"Together with our coalition partners," Bush said, "we've removed terrorist sanctuaries, disrupted their finances, killed and captured key operatives, broken up terrorist cells in American and other nations and stopped many attacks before they're carried out. We're on the offense against the terrorists on every battlefront.…"

While the president did warn that Al Qaeda "remains dangerous" and that there were more threats from "locally established terrorist cells," he gave no indication that the intelligence community had concluded that the numbers of actual terrorists had increased, rather than declined, in recent years.

Even yesterday, after four pages of the NIE were declassified and released, White House counterterrorism adviser Frances Fragos Townsend continued to insist that the NIE tracked with other public statements from the administration.

In a briefing at the White House, she pointed reporters to a section of the administration's "National Strategy for Combating Terrorism"—released the same day as the president's Sept. 5 speech on the subject—which warned that "terrorist networks today are more dispersed and less centralized." Yet that document too gave no hint that the terrorist movement was now judged by the U.S. intelligence community to be larger than it was five years ago.

Townsend also noted that the White House-released terrorism strategy had stated that the "ongoing fight for freedom in Iraq has been twisted by terrorist propaganda as a rallying cry." Yet the public national strategy document left out the more significant finding from the secret NIE: that the terrorists' attempt to use Iraq for their own purposes had apparently succeeded and that by fueling resentment throughout the Muslim world had allowed them to cultivate new supporters.

None of this necessarily undercuts the president's argument that a U.S. defeat in Iraq would embolden the worldwide jihadi movement and make the country even more vulnerable to future attacks. But it does illustrate the perils for the White House when it mischaracterizes intelligence-community assessments in politically useful ways. Indeed, career intelligence officials this week expressed dismay that documents such as the NIE have been selectively used by policymakers—or leaked for political purposes. "It does get frustrating" to see such documents cited incompletely or quoted out of context, said one U.S. intelligence official, who asked not to be publicly identified because the matter is politically sensitive.

The potential for political misrepresentations may become even greater in the coming months as the U.S. intelligence community completes two more documents with a potential bearing on the Bush administration's approach to terrorism and related national-security issues. One of the studies is a broad overview of the military and political situation in Iraq; the other is an up-to-date assessment of the progress—or lack thereof—that the government of Iran is making in its alleged efforts to develop nuclear weapons.

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte's office began the Iraq study in the summer following demands by congressional Democrats that such an assessment be produced (although his spokesman maintained that the intelligence czar ordered up the Iraq study on his own and not in response to congressional demands). At the time the Iraq study was first proposed, intelligence sources said there was some pressure on agencies to produce the paper so it would be available before the November congressional elections—even if its contents remained classified, as is customary with such documents.

But as of this week, one official said, Negroponte's office was still exchanging messages with the agencies working on the paper about the document's "terms of reference"—the broad outlines of questions which the new estimate is expected to answer. Given that its structure has still not been agreed, the likelihood of the Iraq paper being completed before the midterm elections has become remote; officials now are talking about finishing it by next January.

Indications are that whenever the new Iraq NIE is complete, it will not offer much optimism for Bush administration policymakers. Like the newly released NIE on terrorism, the upcoming intelligence estimate on Iraq is likely to contrast with public pronouncements of progress from the White House. In secret papers and briefings over the last 18 months, intelligence professionals have repeatedly portrayed a bleak picture in which disorder in Iraq appears to be growing rather than receding.

More than a year ago, a classified CIA paper assessment reported that Iraq had become a venue where a new wave of Islamic militants, many of them from outside Iraq, not only could be indoctrinated in jihad but could practice and perfect urban-warfare skills under live-fire conditions, in some cases presumably before returning to their home countries to carry out planned terror attacks. Two counterterrorism sources said there is no reason to believe CIA analysts have changed their pessimistic assessment since the paper was produced.

In a series of closed-door briefings earlier this summer on Capitol Hill, the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency painted what people familiar with the sessions described as an extremely gloomy assessment of the situation in Iraq; in the briefings, according to the sources, DIA officials described a situation in which insurgent groups are continuing to thrive and grow, increasingly influential sectarian militias are stoking intercommunal violence and the elected Iraqi government is showing itself, at least at the moment, incapable of curbing the violence.

A Defense official familiar with the briefings said that DIA also assessed that if Iraqi security forces could be trained and put into operation according to U.S. and Iraqi government plans then the violence conceivably could be curbed. One official who is familiar with the contents of the DIA briefings commented, however, that administration officials have made similar assertions in the past about Iraqi security forces that, so far at least, have not been validated by events.

Spinning The Spin (NSWK)

For voters, the National Intelligence Estimate is probably the single most important document to emerge in this election. Plus, Dick Cheney's surprise party. WEB-EXCLUSIVE COMMENTARY

Amid all the hoopla about the National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism, it's worth stepping back to gain a little perspective. Like three and a half years of perspective. Back in March 2003, President Bush addressed the nation from the Oval Office just after the first military strikes in Iraq. "The people of the United States and our friends and allies will not live at the mercy of an outlaw regime that threatens the peace with weapons of mass murder," he said. "We will meet that threat now, with our Army, Air Force, Navy, Coast Guard and Marines, so that we do not have to meet it later with armies of firefighters and police and doctors on the streets of our cities."

Never mind that the weapons of mass murder were never found. And never mind the suggestion, now retracted, that Saddam's regime would coordinate operations with terrorists. The central premise of the war in Iraq was that military force would stop terrorists from attacking America—that troops would fight the threat in Iraq rather than firefighters rescuing the victims on the homeland.

Does the NIE's key findings support that strategy? Not exactly.

Iraq has not stopped the prospect of firefighters rescuing Americans from terrorist attacks because the global jihadist movement has grown. There are, according to the NIE, four reasons for this growth: entrenched grievances, the Iraq jihad, the slow pace of reforms in the Middle East and pervasive anti-American sentiment. In fact, the NIE also blames the pervasive anti-American sentiment on the Iraq conflict. So Iraq is really two of the four factors in the growth of the movement.

Does that mean the White House spin is out of control? Not exactly.

The NIE points out that defeat of the jihadis in Iraq would stop the movement's growth. It also points out that jihadi success in Iraq would inspire more to join the cause. In that sense, Bush's words in March 2003 were wrong at the time, but correct now.

Like the struggle against global jihadism, the political fight over Iraq and terrorism has adapted to the new realities on the ground. The battle over the NIE is a wonderful chance for both parties to lob their own grenades: Democrats can accuse Republicans of failing to make America safer, while Republicans can accuse Democrats of failing to have a plan for victory in Iraq.

Is this a trivial debate, a case of dirty election tricks? Not at all. There's no more important debate facing voters in November's elections and beyond. The NIE is not the knockout blow that Democrats had hoped for, and it's not the vindication that the White House says it is.

But for voters, it's probably the single most important document to emerge in this election. The NIE report is a comprehensive assessment of terrorism produced in April by American intelligence agencies. After parts of it were leaked to The New York Times, President Bush announced yesterday that portions of it were being declassified and released to the media. In the NIE's analysis, the war in Iraq has not made America safer, but defeat in Iraq would make America even less safe than it is today.

Until the NIE emerged, the conventional wisdom inside the Beltway was that the election would come down to a struggle between terrorism and Iraq. If the debate were about terrorism, the GOP would win; if about Iraq, the Democrats would win.

Instead, the NIE sheds light on a different debate that is all about Iraq. In November, voters will have a relatively simple choice: they need to decide whether to punish the GOP for starting the war or trust the GOP to end the war.

It's My Party

Vice President Dick Cheney is a man who clearly doesn't like surprises. On Monday evening, en route back from a pair of party fund-raisers in the Midwest, Cheney's staff summoned reporters traveling with the VP to the front cabin of Air Force Two to watch as they presented Cheney with a cake celebrating his 100th fund-raiser for the GOP this election cycle.

It was a notable milestone. According to the Republican National Committee, Cheney has raised roughly $34 million for Republican parties and candidates over the last 10 months—making him the most prolific fund-raiser in the party after President Bush, who has raised more than $175 million for the GOP. On Monday, Cheney held his 99th and 100th events for the party: a rally for Wisconsin Republicans in Milwaukee and a private fund-raiser for GOP Senate candidate Mike Bouchard in Michigan. And Cheney has no plans of slowing up. In the weeks leading up to Election Day, the veep is set to headline at least 15 more events, including upcoming stops in Montana and Texas where he'll campaign for several congressional candidates.

On Air Force Two, Cheney's aides gathered around a red, white and blue sheet cake decorated with tiny paper U.S. flags that read 100 … ON TO VICTORY! Summoned from his private cabin, Cheney looked less surprised and more like a deer in headlights. Eying his staff and reporters a tad warily, Cheney seemed uncertain what to do or say. "What's this?" the veep asked, with an awkward smile. A few feet away, a White House photographer clicked away on his camera, capturing the moment for history's sake.

As one staffer handed Cheney a large knife to cut the cake, Mel Raines, Cheney's political director, explained the reason for celebrating. 'You're the only one here who's been to all 100," she said. Cheney wore a slight smile. "And I'm the only one who always has to give a speech," he quipped, as he moved to cut a narrow slice of cake. "Does my wife know about this?"

Handing a piece of cake to a reporter and the knife to his press secretary, Lea Anne McBride, Cheney lingered in the room for only a few minutes longer, before retreating back to his private cabin without sampling the cake. While the VP took just one question—about his fund-raising—the brief encounter was enough for reporters on the trip to wonder: was this the awkward beginnings of a Cheney charm offensive?

There are signs that Cheney has moved to improve his image. While reporters aren't always invited on Cheney's trips, they are asked to accompany him more often these days than in the past. Moreover, the VP's aides have moved to allow reporters to observe Cheney more candidly. Two weeks ago, on the anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, Cheney's aides allowed a handful of reporters to accompany the veep and his family to a memorial service that had initially been off-limits to the press. At the same time, Cheney's approval ratings are looking less dismal these days. A year ago, a CBS News poll found Cheney's approval rating was at a mere 19 percent, an all-time low. Two weeks ago, a Harris Interactive poll found Cheney's ratings up to 30 percent approval—about 10 points shy of his boss. Not great, but for a veep pegged by Democrats and some Republicans as a political bogeyman, not bad either.

Numbers, of course, seldom tell the whole story. On Monday, Cheney's aides were willing to answer one burning question that White House spokesman Tony Snow and the RNC were not willing to answer about Bush: of the 100 fund-raising events Cheney has attended this year, 56 have been closed to the press, preventing candidates or donors from being publicly photographed with the veep. The number suggests that in this tough election year, Cheney's image rehab still has some ways to go.

Growing Unarmed Battalion In Qaeda Army Is Using Internet To Get The Message Out (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan — On the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, Abu Omar received the call to jihad. Literally.

"There's a present for you," a voice on the other end of the phone said that morning, he recalled. It was a common code whenever his friends and colleagues wanted to share a new broadcast or communiqué from Al Qaeda over the Internet, he said.

Abu Omar, speaking on the condition that only his nickname be used, said he soon went to one of the Internet cafes he frequents in Amman and began distributing the latest video by Al Qaeda, alerting friends and occasionally adding commentary.

"We are the energy behind the path to jihad," Abu Omar said proudly. "Just like the jihadis reached their target on Sept. 11, we will reach ours through the Internet."

Abu Omar, 28, is part of an increasingly sophisticated network of contributors and discussion leaders helping to wage Al Qaeda's battle for Muslim hearts and minds. A self-described Qaeda sympathizer who defends the Sept. 11 attacks and continues to find inspiration in Osama bin Laden's call for jihad, Abu Omar is part of a growing army of young men who may not seek to take violent action, but who help spread jihadist philosophy, shape its message and hope to inspire others to their cause.

Though he does not appear to be directly connected to Al Qaeda, Abu Omar does seem to be on a direct e-mail list for groups sympathetic to Al Qaeda, making him a link in a chain that spreads the organization's propaganda using code and special software to circumvent official scrutiny of their Internet activity.

As Al Qaeda gradually transforms itself from a terrorist organization carrying out its own attacks into an ideological umbrella that encourages local movements to take action, its increased reliance on various forms of media have made Web-savvy sympathizers like Abu Omar ever more important.

For example, this past Sept. 11, Abu Omar said, a link sent to a jihadist e-mail list took him to a general interest Islamic Web site, which led him to a password-protected Web site, then onto yet another site containing the latest release from Al Qaeda: a lecture by its No. 2 man, Ayman al-Zawahri, threatening attacks on Israel and the Persian Gulf. Abu Omar said he then passed the video to friends and confidants, acting as a local distributor to other sympathizers.

In recent years, Al Qaeda has formed a special media production division called Al Sahab to produce videos about leaders like Mr. bin Laden and Mr. Zawahri, terrorism experts say. The group largely once relied on Arab television channels like Al Jazeera to broadcast its videos and taped messages.

Al Sahab, whose name means the cloud, has continued to draw on a video library featuring everything from taped suicide messages by the Sept. 11 hijackers to images of gun battles and bombings spearheaded by Al Qaeda and others, said Marwan Shehadeh, an expert on Islamist movements with the Vision Research Institute in Amman who has close ties to jihadists in Jordan and Syria.

But this year Al Sahab has released many more recordings than in previous years, said Chris Heffelfinger, a specialist in jihadi ideology at the Combating Terrorism Center at West Point, in what many analysts see as a new offensive focusing on the Muslim mainstream. Jihadi Web sites, meanwhile, have continued sprouting on the Internet, serving as a conduit for Al Qaeda's propaganda.

Mr. Shehadeh describes Al Sahab as an informal group with video camcorders and laptops. Some news reports have described it as an organization with a mobile production unit that navigates the Pakistani provinces. "The jihadis have successfully used American technology to show the U.S. as a loser," Mr. Shehadeh said. "This is an open-ended war, and they use media as part of their jihad against Western and Arab regimes."

Just days before the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, Al Sahab released a barrage of videos, including images of Mr. bin Laden seated with some of the Sept. 11 suicide bombers; a documentary that some have described as a "making of Sept. 11" feature, with testaments by two of the bombers; and the lecture by Mr. Zawahri that Abu Omar said he received that morning.

What is most striking about the messages is their tone, terrorism analysts say. In the past, the group's leaders were generally depicted as soldiers in battle, often filmed outdoors with weapons in the background. But the more recent communiqués show Al Qaeda's leaders in the comfort of a living room or office, set against bookshelves with religious texts. The group has also taken to quoting Western authors and famous speeches, in what seems to be an effort to reach those with Western sensibilities.

"It's a clear message: when there's a gun in the background, they're saying, 'I'm a fighter like you'; when there are books in the background, it means, 'I am a scholar and deserve authority,' " said Fares bin Hizam, a journalist who reports on militant groups for the Arab satellite news channel Al Arabiya. "It is a message that resonates well with an impressionable young man who is 17 or 18."

One result, terrorism analysts say, is a militant group in transition, seeking to push ideology over direct action, franchising its name and principles to smaller groups acting more independently.

"Al Qaeda has been turning itself from an active organization into a propaganda organization," said Mr. Heffelfinger. "They now appear to be focused on putting out disinformation and projecting the strength of the mujahedeen. They're no longer the group that is organizing the mujahedeen. Instead, they are giving guidance to all the movements."

Men like Abu Omar have become integral to that transformation. Mr. Shehadeh, who introduced Abu Omar to this reporter, says he has known Abu Omar ever since he was a teenager and has observed his gradual embrace of jihadist ideology. He says he has seen Abu Omar's contributions on numerous chat boards and notes that while Abu Omar is probably not a Qaeda member, he regularly relays news and spreads the group's message to friends and colleagues.

In Amman's more conservative neighborhoods, Abu Omar and several analysts said, one or two jihadists tend to be the organizers, distributing messages and content to volunteers, and controlling membership in jihadist e-mail lists.

"We are typically observers, but when we see something on the Net, our job is to share it," Abu Omar said. He no longer trusts news reports on television, he said. He even cast doubt on Al Jazeera, which typically broadcasts Al Qaeda's videos but is, he said, still beholden to Arab governments. "We become like journalists ourselves."

Abu Omar, who owns a computer store in one of Amman's refugee camps, said he became involved in jihadi movements about six years ago, driven in part by his anger over the death of his father, who he said was a fighter with the Palestinian faction Fatah when Israel invaded Lebanon in 1982. "On the Net, you can see all the pictures of Palestine and the Muslim world being attacked, and then you see the planes crashing into one of the towers and you think, 'I can understand it,' " he said.

He goes to an Internet cafe several times a week. In recent years, Jordan's Internet cafes have begun taking increased security measures, like registering users' identification cards, he said, but jihadists in Amman alternate among a network of sympathetic cafe owners who allow them to surf anonymously.

He never uses his own computer to search for jihadi content, and he limits his time online to about 30 minutes — not long enough for the authorities to locate him, he figures.

In 2005, Jordanian authorities arrested an 18-year-old man, Murad al-Assaydeh, accusing him of using the Internet to threaten attacks on intelligence officials. Abu Omar said several of his friends and comrades had been arrested by the General Information Department in Jordan in connection with Mr. Assaydeh's case and in subsequent dragnets. Abu Omar said he was once called in for questioning but was released the same day.

He now changes his e-mail address frequently, he said, and he typically carries software that can delete details of his actions from a computer. "In the beginning, I thought maybe I would go for jihad in Iraq, but it was very difficult to get there," he said. "Now I realize it's better to work on the Net and get the message out."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Ports Security Bill Passes In The House (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

The House approved a major ports security bill early Saturday, providing new steps to prevent terrorists from slipping a nuclear, chemical or biological device into one of the 11 million shipping containers entering the nation every year.

Passage of the bill was the last act of the House as lawmakers left for a five-week election campaign during which candidates will be trying to prove to voters their commitment to keeping America safe in the war on terrorism. The Senate also planned to endorse the bill before it recessed, sending it to the president for his signature.

Containers, now largely uninspected, "have the potential to be the Trojan Horse of the 21st century," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. She said the legislation would be a "major leap ahead" in strengthening national security.

Democrats favored the bill, but said it failed to address rail and mass transit, other areas considered highly vulnerable to terrorist attack.

"The terrorist attacks on rail and transit systems in Spain, London and Mumbai (Bombay) should be enough evidence to convince the Republican-led Congress that U.S. rails are dangerously vulnerable," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn.

The bill approves $400 million a year over five years for risk-based grants for training and exercises at ports. It requires the nation's 22 largest ports, which handle 98 percent of all cargo entering the country, to install radiation detectors by the end of next year.

Pilot programs would be established at three foreign ports to test technology for nonintrusive cargo inspections. Currently only one foreign port, Hong Kong, scans all U.S.-bound cargo for nuclear materials.

Background checks and credentials will be required for workers at the nation's 361 ports, and the Homeland Security Department would set up protocols for resuming operations after an attack or incident. It is feared that a terrorist attack, such as a nuclear device set off by remote control, could cripple the entire economy as well as cause massive casualties.

Preferential cargo processing is offered importers who meet certain security requirements.

The bill would authorize $3.4 billion over five years for ports security. The House vote was 409-2, with only Reps. Edward Markey, D-Mass., and Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., opposing.

The bill was slow in reaching the House and Senate floors because lawmakers from both sides sought to attach their own favorite pieces of legislation to the ports measure because of the certainty it would reach the president's desk.

In the end, the only major add-on was legislation to restrict Internet gambling. Also attached was a measure, pushed by Sen. David Vitter, R-La., to help communities lacking telecommunications infrastructure install sirens and other emergency alert systems.

With an eye to the election, Congress has concentrated on security-related issues in the past two weeks, considered measures on military tribunals, President Bush's wiretapping program, spending for defense and homeland security and a bill to build a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border.

Democrats, in a letter to House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King, R-N.Y., who headed House-Senate negotiations on the bill, complained they were denied the right to offer amendments to restore rail security language contained in the original Senate bill.

Congress made port security a priority after a fight in February over a buyout that put a Dubai company in control of some operations at six American ports. The outcry led the Dubai company, DP World, to promise it would sell the U.S. operations to an American company. The sale is pending.

Congress OKs Port Security Bill (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

The legislation sent to the president authorizes millions to shore up defenses at ports such as the Los Angeles-Long Beach complex.

WASHINGTON — Congress early this morning approved and sent to President Bush a bill aimed at shoring up anti-terrorism defenses at U.S. ports.

The port security measure, which would bring millions of federal dollars to the Los Angeles-Long Beach port complex and other harbors, became a GOP priority after a political flap earlier this year over a Dubai company's ill-fated attempt to manage facilities at several U.S. ports.

The measure, which Bush is expected to sign, authorizes $400 million a year in federal grants to ports for the next five years, requires minimum security standards for the nearly 11 million cargo containers that enter U.S. ports each year and establishes a pilot program at three foreign ports to scan all U.S.-bound cargo.

It also sets up security training for waterfront workers and mandates radiation detectors at major ports by the end of next year. And it establishes deadlines for special identification cards to be issued to port workers after background checks.

The measure was approved by the Senate on a voice vote; the House approved it 409-2 early today.

Rep. Jane Harman (D-Venice), who along with Rep. Dan Lungren (R-Gold River) sponsored the House version of the legislation, said, "In a month that was supposed to be all about security, this measure is the only one we've considered that will actually make America more secure."

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairwoman of the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, called the bill "a major leap ahead in our efforts to strengthen our national security."

The measure was voted on in the final, hectic hours of the pre-election session, in which several security-related bills were sent to the president. The GOP is hoping to showcase its national security credentials before the November election.

As one of the last major bill moving through Congress before the election, it became a magnet for other Republican priorities, including a measure cracking down on online gambling that is a part of the party's election-year "values" agenda.

The port security bill is the only major legislation to emerge from the Dubai controversy, which triggered a debate about the vulnerability of ports. Another high-profile bill — one that would have subjected foreign investment in the U.S. to greater scrutiny — stalled because of a dispute between House and Senate Republicans.

Dubai Ports World's attempted takeover of some U.S. port facilities caused an embarrassing rift between Bush and congressional Republicans and gave Democrats an opportunity to attack the GOP as weak on national security. After the uproar, the Dubai company backed down from taking over the facilities.

Months after the brouhaha, Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez of New Jersey, locked in a tough campaign, is running a TV ad showing himself at the Port of Newark and declaring, "Five years after 9/11, President Bush just doesn't get it."

Democrats unsuccessfully sought to include in the bill a requirement for the screening of every cargo container. But business groups protested to Republicans that such a step would slow commerce and harm the U.S. economy.

Democrats also assailed Republicans for stripping funding for rail and transit security from the bill.

Separately, Congress approved the annual homeland security spending bill that would provide additional money for port security measures, including stationing more inspectors at foreign ports to check U.S.-bound cargo. It includes $210 million in port security grants, up from about $175 million this year.

U.S. Advises Charities On Terror Links (AP-Y)

By Jeannine Aversa, Ap Economics Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Risks facing charitable organizations not only include contributions being diverted to bankroll terror activities but also the use of charities' services to build grass-roots support for a terrorist organization, the Treasury Department said Friday.

The Bush administration examines these possibilities when it considers whether or not a charity should be put on a U.S. list that requires banks to freeze its assets and forbids Americans from doing business with it.

Charities should be on the lookout for such risks as well, the department suggested as it released updated best practices for charitable organizations to consider as they try to protect themselves from abuse from terrorist financiers. The best practices are voluntary.

"The risk of terrorist abuse facing charitable organizations is ongoing and significant and cannot be measured from the important but relatively narrow perspective of terrorist diversion of charitable funds," the department said. "Rather, terrorist abuse also includes the exploitation of charitable services and activities to radicalize vulnerable populations and cultivate support for terrorist organizations and activities."

As cases in point, the department, citing media reports, mentioned the role of Hamas-associated charities in building popular support in the Palestinian territories for the Hamas terror organization, and Hezbollah's control of charitable distribution networks in southern Lebanon.

The department also mentioned "exploitation" involving the Pakistani-based charity Jamaat-ud-Dawa, which is believed to be a front for Lashkar e Tayyiba, an Islamic militant group. The department did not elaborate. There have been media reports, however, that money raised for victims of last year's earthquake in South Asia was channeled through the charity to schemers of a foiled plot to blow up U.S.-bound passenger planes.

The United States since the 2001 terror attacks on New York and Washington has designated 43 charities worldwide and 29 people associated with them for providing support to terrorists, the department said.

Charities Receive Treasury Guidance In Antiterror Move (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the latest effort to combat terrorist financing, the U.S. Treasury Department issued revised guidelines to charities.

Under the voluntary guidelines, charities are being asked to search the Internet to determine whether recipients of charity funds have ever been accused of terrorist-related activities. In addition, the Treasury Department is recommending that charities collect the names and addresses of subcontracting organizations used by the recipients of charity donations. It also urged charities to check whether the government has labeled any recipient as a terrorist organization.

The latest guidelines update those issued in December 2005, taking into account changes suggested by charities over the last several months. The changes, for example, include a more flexible definition of what constitutes a governing board.

The guidelines provide a clearer road map for charities as the government tries to thwart inadvertent as well as intended financial support for organizations linked to terrorism.

Patrick O'Brien, assistant secretary for terrorist financing and financial crimes at the Treasury Department, said that making the guidelines voluntary allows charities to have some flexibility by not hamstringing them with rules that may not apply. "We don't really see a one size fits all," he said. "These are not legal requirements. They seek to provide information to structure their own affairs to help them avoid diversion of funds."

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, the federal government charged that some charities were being used as fronts to fund terrorist activities. Many charities were shut down, and a list of entities and individuals with terrorist ties was compiled to help keep legitimate charities from being duped.

Fear Grows Of Attack On Food Supply (CHIT)

By Jason George, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 30, 2006

Officials seek ways to safeguard agriculture

PLEASANT HILL, Mo. -- West Missouri farm country has no shortage of livestock and rolling hills, but terrorism targets seem few and far between. No tall buildings. No well-known landmarks.

The nearest Manhattan: It's in Kansas.

"Out here things are still pretty quiet," cattle rancher Rod Findley proudly declared this week as he finished feeding his Hereford heifers in an early-morning fog. "I would think a terrorist would be a little out of place around here."

While the threat of terrorism clearly hangs over urban areas, a growing concern about an attack on the U.S. food supply is bringing more attention from law enforcement to rural America and farms like Findley's.

This harvest season the U.S. Department of Agriculture has produced a list of recommended security steps for farmers, from protecting fence perimeters to safeguarding chirping chicks.

And the recent E. coli outbreak has underscored how quickly contaminated food can impact people's lives and shake America's faith in agriculture.

While food and agriculture account for 18 percent of U.S. employment and produce $140 billion in annual U.S. revenue, farm security has traditionally been quite lax. Typically, little more than making sure the corral gate is latched.

This year, the Illinois Department of Agriculture has spent $6.5 million to improve food safety--hardly a blip when compared to the billions of dollars directed toward airport and highway security, but it's a 25 percent increase from five years ago. The state also is creating a database of all the agriculture facilities in Illinois so authorities can notify farms in specific areas if a problem ever arose.

"The threat from agroterrorism may not be one you recognize," FBI Deputy Director John Pistole said at a symposium this week in Kansas City, where about 1,000 farmers, police officers, scientists and economists gathered to discuss better ways to protect agriculture.

"But the threat is real," he said. "And the impact could be devastating."

Offering a glimpse of impact

The recent E. coli outbreak from spinach, while not intentional, offers a glimpse of such devastation, Pistole said. Nearly 200 people have become sick and at least one person has died from the tainted spinach, and the negative economic impact could linger.

But imagine an outbreak that affects not only spinach but also such products as beef, chicken or corn. Then imagine terrorists are behind it. Such a massive attack not only would sicken more people, it could permanently rattle confidence here and abroad in American agriculture, said Greg Pompelli, a USDA economist.

Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks, agriculture's enormous importance to the economy undoubtedly makes it an appealing target to someone wanting to harm the United States, but the industry's significance and robustness creates plenty of good news for Americans, too, Pompelli said. For example, about 25 percent of food that makes it onto U.S. plates is not eaten, meaning there is plenty to go around if supply is cut because of a large mandatory destruction of livestock. And unlike in many other countries, there is great crop diversity.

"Staple crops--like corn, wheat, soybeans and oats--are grown in more than two-thirds of counties" of the United States, Pompelli said, explaining that this lessens the chance that one region's economy could be decimated.

"Even some fresh produce--apples, tomatoes and peaches--are spread broadly, with a third of all counties growing these."

There are numerous points on food's journey from field to fork that are vulnerable to a would-be terrorist. The pork supply, for example, could be harmed by driving a truck full of sick pigs past several farms, suggested David Kaplan, director of the USDA's emergency and domestic programs. Or terrorists might attempt something further down the food chain, such as poisoning apples at a grocery store.

Pistole pointed to U.S. agriculture information found in Afghanistan after the Sept. 11 attacks as proof that there is intent to disrupt the food supply.

"The bottom line is that agriculture, just like buildings, bridges and tunnels, is a critical infrastructure in need of defense," he said.

Ensuring food safety

Farmers and veterinarians, who because of their jobs can spot problems before they reach consumers, guard the front lines when it comes to America's food defense. Both groups have a part in the Illinois Food Systems Policy Council, which was created last year and has been tasked with developing a strategy to improve food and agricultural security.

"We need to do everything within our power to assure the safety and security of the food we supply for our families and for families across the world," Gov. Rod Blagojevich remarked this month at the state's first food security "tabletop exercise." There, public officials and private industry discussed ways to improve safety in agriculture, which contributes $14.4 billion annually to Illinois' economy.

Similarly, the Kansas City conference aimed to bring together representatives from the military, law enforcement, agriculture and academia, said Jamie Berlowitz, a USDA director in the Elk Grove Village office's smuggling interdiction and trade compliance division."There are a lot of different perspectives we can get here," Berlowitz said. "You want to meet these people now rather than when there is problem."

Back on the farm, Findley relegates the threat of such a problem occurring on his 68-acre spread somewhere out toward the horizon--it just seems too unlikely. Here the concerns are gas prices, the cost of feed grain and whether the high school football team can maintain its undefeated season.

Focus could of course change, he said, mentioning that the once rarely traveled road in front of his farm now handles regular traffic.

"Everything's changing in Pleasant Hill."

Man Arrested In Bomb Scare At Airport (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

By The Associated Press

A Vermont man was arrested yesterday on charges of putting a fake bomb in a bag at a parking lot at Kennedy International Airport, officials said.

The man's action caused traffic to be halted for hours on Thursday night. The man, Peter Gonick, 55, of Island Pond, Vt., was accused of reckless endangerment and putting a fake bomb at a transportation facility, said Pasquale DiFulco, a spokesman for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey.

Mr. DiFulco said Mr. Gonick was questioned after his vehicle was found parked near where the bag had been placed.

The bag contained a powdery substance, but a hazardous-materials team deemed it nonhazardous, Mr. DiFulco said.

Around 1 a.m., the authorities started to allow traffic to resume at Terminals 1, 2 and 3, opposite the parking lot. Public transportation also resumed service to the area. People who had been forced to remain in Terminal 1 were allowed to leave. Mr. DiFulco said airport operations returned to normal yesterday.

Putting Troops On The Beat (WP)

By Charles J. Dunlap Jr.

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

It's hurricane season again, which, along with recent reflections on the first anniversary of Hurricane Katrina, causes us to think about the complexities of dealing with disaster on a major scale. One stark lesson taught by last year's tragedy in New Orleans concerned the fragility of civilized societies. Scenes of chaos at the city's convention center and elsewhere illustrated how quickly the strong could exploit the weak.

Unfortunately, a chunk of the New Orleans police force was nowhere to be found. Scores of officers left the city, and a few were alleged to have joined in the looting. Distraught victims begged for help on national television.

The appearance of a no-nonsense professional soldier in Lt. Gen. Russell HonorÃ©, along with battle-tested units, including elements of the fabled 82nd Airborne Division, quickly improved the security and relief situation. With military leadership and resources in place, more than the weather brightened. The cool efficiency of full-time military professionals on the hot New Orleans streets was exactly what the people wanted to see.

And apparently they want to see more of it when the need arises -- and sooner. Indeed, few would debate the utility of a faster deployment of the active-duty military's rescue, logistics and engineering resources.

But security is another matter. The 1878 Posse Comitatus Act bars most direct military involvement in law enforcement, with several exceptions, including civil disturbances. Since Sept. 11, 2001, such threats as terrorist use of weapons of mass destruction have given the armed forces new legal authority. Should there be more?

Americans don't seem especially worried about increasing the full-time military's role. Despite troubles in Iraq and detainee abuse scandals, polls show that the armed forces are the most trusted institution in American society. Nevertheless, few models exist around the world in which the recurring use of militaries in law enforcement furthers democratic values.

Yes, it's true that military troops, unlike civilian police, can't quit their posts. But it's dangerous to think veterans of the mean streets of Fallujah would necessarily approach a task the way Big Easy cops on the beat would. In this respect, the military's versatility can be misunderstood.

Most conventionally trained soldiers advance on potential threats with a view toward destroying them, not arresting them. They don't expect to reason with "the enemy." A soldier's authority is his weapon and his willingness to use it.

Typically, police rely on public respect for the rule of law, expressed in the authority of the badge. They exercise the studied restraint the judicial process requires. Suspects are not "enemies" but citizens, innocent until proven guilty. The elimination of "threats" is the job of the courts. Weapons are defensive last resorts.

Converting the war-fighting mind-set of the professional military to one that readily accepts the risks -- and delays -- inherent in policing under our Constitution can be extremely challenging and confusing to those wielding the guns and attempting to establish order.

Nonetheless, some military officers welcome domestic law enforcement roles. In a world where hijacked airliners, anthrax-infested envelopes and other serious threats arise close to home, there is a certain appeal to their thinking. And praise for the better-late-than-never Katrina effort has created an attitude friendly to domestic security duties among many in uniform.

What are they missing? Appreciation for the erosion that law enforcement duties could cause in the public affection and admiration the military wants -- and needs -- to sustain itself as an all-volunteer force. Americans in the end do not like heavy-handed security efforts, regardless of how well-intended they are, and typically react quite negatively to them. Think Kent State, Waco and Ruby Ridge.

Midnight searches by well-armed troops might fly in Baghdad (though perhaps not even there anymore), but certainly not in Baltimore. Once the military loses the respect of ordinary Americans, what kind of person will want to enlist?

Is there another way? Yes. Getting together to organize the country's nearly 800,000 civilian police could provide governors nationwide with experienced law enforcement resources in times of crisis. Preparing the 400,000 citizen-soldiers of the National Guard for police duties is another option. Meanwhile, the uniformed regulars have plenty to do facing down threats beyond our borders.

America's full-time military will do whatever is asked of it, but America must carefully consider what it asks. Otherwise, Katrina's legacy could take yet another tragic twist.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Cites Progress In Pakistan, Afghanistan (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

In Speech, President Tries to Mend Relations

President Bush highlighted anti-terrorism efforts of Afghanistan and Pakistan yesterday, calling the nations invaluable allies despite a surge of violence in southern Afghanistan that has provoked deep suspicions about their ability -- and appetite -- to battle extremists.

Speaking before a Washington audience that included members of the Reserve Officers Association and both countries' ambassadors to the United States, Bush said that 41,000 American and NATO troops in Afghanistan are making progress toward securing and rebuilding the war-torn nation, although significant hurdles remain. While more than 30,000 newly trained

Afghan soldiers are working alongside Western troops to secure the country, Bush said, Afghan police "have faced problems with corruption and substandard leadership."

Those difficulties have undermined confidence in the police, "and we've made our concerns known to our friends in the Afghan government," Bush said, adding that the police now have new leadership.

Bush made his remarks as a resurgent Taliban is leading a spike in violence in southern Afghanistan, a development that has resulted in increasing friction between Afghanistan and Pakistan. Afghan President Hamid Karzai has accused his Pakistani counterpart, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, of tolerating the presence of extremists in Pakistan's remote western regions, from where they launch attacks into southern Afghanistan. Musharraf, in turn, has accused Karzai of being an ineffective leader whose policies create sympathy for the Taliban and other extremists.

Meanwhile, Musharraf has been dogged by accusations that his nation's intelligence service has ties to the Taliban -- something he has forcefully denied.

In his remarks, Bush praised Pakistan's efforts to track down some notorious terrorists, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Khalid Sheik Mohammed. Bush said Pakistan also has been instrumental in preventing terrorism since 2001.

"Were it not for the information gained from the terrorists captured with the help of Pakistan, our intelligence community believes that al-Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," he said.

Bush has attempted to broker a verbal truce between the two leaders. Wednesday evening, he hosted a White House dinner with the two leaders in an effort to clear the air.

Meanwhile, he said, U.S. and NATO forces have mounted an offensive to clear Taliban fighters from the treacherous mountainous region in southern Afghanistan. Also, he said, the United States is helping Pakistan with development aid and high-tech equipment to help it gain better control of its borders.

After the speech yesterday, Bush met with Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbayev, whose government has been criticized for skirting democratic norms by banning opposition parties, harassing advocacy groups and closing newspapers. The Bush administration has offered only mild criticism of that record as it works to gain greater influence with the oil-rich nation. Nazarbayev's visit to the White House -- his third since becoming president of Kazakhstan in 1990 -- followed a visit to the Bush family compound in Maine, where he met with former president George H.W. Bush.

"We discussed our desire to defeat extremism and our mutual desire to support the forces of moderation throughout the world," the current President Bush said after the meeting.

In conjunction with the visit, the Energy Department and the Nuclear Threat Initiative, a nonprofit organization dedicated to reducing the threat from nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, announced an anti-proliferation agreement with Kazakhstan. Among other things, it calls for a Kazakh research reactor that runs on highly enriched uranium, which can be used in nuclear weapons, to switch to low-enriched uranium.

"This nonproliferation cooperative project with Kazakhstan is critical to our efforts to eliminate excess amounts of potentially dangerous material around the world," said Linton F. Brooks, administrator of the Energy Department's National Nuclear Security Administration.

Bush Tackles Critics On Afghan Policy (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

President George W. Bush moved to address mounting Democratic criticism of his policy in Afghanistan on Friday, conceding the need for more legal reform and the existence of “corruption and sub-standard leadership” in the Afghan police but defending the nation’s “liberation” as “a great achievement”.

Mr Bush’s speech marks a renewed focus on Afghanistan, which has seen a steep rise in violence and a renewed Taliban insurgency. In the past week he has met President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan and President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan, culminating in an effort to mediate by hosting a dinner for the two leaders on Wednesday.

“We had a long and we had a frank conversation about the challenges we face in defeating the extremists and the terrorists in their countries,” he said.

The two-and-a-half-hour dinner appears to have led to new ideas on intelligence- sharing and on how to deal with the border tribal areas that lie outside their control and provide a refuge for Taliban and al-Qaeda fugitives. Mr Karzai proposed that he and Gen Musharraf host two jirgas, or councils of tribal elders, one on each side of the border, with the two presidents and leaders from each country attending both. Gen Musharraf accepted.

"The main concept is to empower tribal leaders and elders to fight extremism in Pakistan and Afghanistan," Said Tayeb Jawad, Afghanistan's ambassador to Washington, told the Financial Times. He said it was unlikely that US officials would attend the councils but that this had not yet been discussed. Mr Karzai is to visit Pakistan soon, and details of where and when the councils will take place will also be worked out in Washington, the ambassador said. He described the atmosphere at dinner as "friendly, with a few tense moments" but constructive. A Pakistan's embassy spokes-man said the mood was "sometimes tense, mostly soft".

"They agreed to tone down the rhetoric," he said, referring to the harsh language that surfaced in separate interviews given by the presidents before the dinner.

Democrats have argued that the Iraq war has been a distraction from Afghanistan. John Kerry, the 2004 Democrat presidential nominee, has called for 5,000 more troops. In a rare rebuke, Bill Clinton, the former president, told Fox News: "If I were still president we'd have more than 20,000 troops there . . . But you know, we do have a government that thinks Afghanistan is only one-seventh as important as Iraq."

Mr Bush appeared to play down the idea of sending more troops, noting that critics "claim that the country is in danger of failing because we don't have enough American troops there", but instead stressed the need to tackle the "ideology of hate".

Bush Admits To Setbacks In Afghanistan (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, September 30, 2006

President Bush asserted Friday that critics who claim the Iraq war has made America less safe embrace "the enemy's propaganda." He acknowledged setbacks in Afghanistan against a Taliban resurgence but predicted eventual victory.

"You do not create terrorism by fighting terrorism," he told a receptive military audience. "If that ever becomes the mind-set of the policymakers in Washington, it means we'll go back to the old days of waiting to be attacked — and then respond."

It was the latest in Bush's series of speeches defending his Iraq and anti-terrorism policies against heightened attacks from Democrats, who now are citing a government intelligence assessment to bolster their criticism. The classified National Intelligence Estimate, parts of which Bush declassified earlier this week, suggests the Iraq war has helped recruit more terrorists.

"Some have selectively quoted from this document to make the case that by fighting the terrorists — by fighting them in Iraq — we are making our people less secure here at home," Bush told the Reserve Officers Association. "This argument buys into the enemy's propaganda that the terrorists attack us because we're provoking them."

With just over five weeks left before congressional elections, Democrats were quick to react. "President Bush's election-year attacks are the product of a desperate White House with no credibility left with the American people," said Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

"It was yet another example of how he is in denial over what is happening in the war on terror," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

Meanwhile, Bush spoke by phone for about 15 minutes on Friday with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said White House spokesman Tony Snow. They discussed efforts to bring greater security to Baghdad and "the need for further progress in political reconciliation," Snow said.

Bush spent most of his speech talking about the conflict in Afghanistan, where militant violence, particularly in the southern part of the country, has spiked in the worst outbreak since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban government.

"The training of the Afghan police has not gone as smoothly as that of the army," Bush said. "The police have faced problems with corruption and substandard leadership. And we've made our concerns known to our friends in the Afghan government."

Bush noted that Afghan President Hamid Karzai has named a new team to lead the national police. "As the police become more capable and better led and more disciplined, they will gain legitimacy and they will earn the respect of the Afghan people," Bush said. He met with Karzai on Tuesday and Wednesday.

Bush said he welcomed NATO's decision this week to take the lead in providing security and reconstruction assistance throughout Afghanistan.

"Under the plan, the U.S. will transfer 12,000 of our troops that are now serving in the country to the NATO force, while the rest will remain under coalition command and continue anti-terrorist operations across the country," Bush said.

The president also discussed Afghanistan in an Oval Office meeting with President Nursultan Nazarbayev of Kazakhstan, a Central Asian ally and important oil supplier. The former Soviet republic borders Afghanistan.

Bush thanked Nazarbayev for supporting the war in Iraq and for helping Afghanistan become a stable democracy.

"I have watched very carefully the development of this important country from one that was in the Soviet sphere to one that now is a free nation," Bush said as the two sat side by side. Bush offered support for Kazakhstan's desire to join the World Trade Organization.

No mention was made of criticism of Kazakhstan for human rights abuses, corruption and heavily restricted political and civil freedoms.

During their private meeting, however, "there was encouragement for the government of Kazakhstan to pursue a democratic path," said Bush spokesman Snow.

Nazarbayev said his country would not have enjoyed its recent economic growth if the Taliban had still been in power in Afghanistan.

"Nobody in Central Asia will feel safe and in peace if we'd be surrounded by countries populated with terrorist people, and if we'd be surrounded by countries where some people crave to put their hands on nuclear weapons, which Kazakhstan renounced," said Nazarbayev.

Bush's speech to the military group followed one he gave the day before at a GOP fundraiser in Alabama, where he accused Democrats of "obstruction and endless second-guessing" and not having the stomach to persist in Iraq.

He said Friday that unauthorized disclosure of the National Intelligence Estimate had "set off a heated debate here in the United States, particularly in Washington. ... It's an indication that we're getting close to an election."

Bush was greeted warmly by the military audience. "We're safer because you stand ready to put on the uniform," he told the reservists.

Bush Hails Liberation Of Afghanistan As A `great Achievement' (MCT)

By William Douglas And Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Amid signs that the Taliban insurgency is regaining strength, President Bush on Friday defended his efforts to stabilize war-savaged Afghanistan and blasted critics who charge that his policies there are failing.

Afghanistan is reeling from its worst bloodshed since the 2001 U.S.-led intervention as the Taliban and allied warlords tie down 42,000 American and NATO-led troops and President Hamid Karzai struggles with colossal corruption, record opium production and nose-diving popularity.

In his most extensive remarks on Afghanistan recently, Bush sought to accentuate the positive, praising Karzai's democratic government, hailing the training of the Afghan National Army and noting the multinational contributions to the anti-Taliban fight.

"The liberation of Afghanistan was a great achievement," Bush told the Reserve Officers Association, which represents the interests of military reservists in Washington.

The president acknowledged setbacks, such as faltering police reform.

But he made no mention of the key reasons for the Taliban's resurgence: the diversion of U.S. troops to Iraq; America's failure to make good on a promise of a reconstruction program akin to the rebuilding of post-World War II Europe; endemic corruption; and the support the Taliban receive from Pakistan. Bush instead praised Pakistan as a strong ally in fighting terrorism.

Several of the president's statements about Afghanistan's judicial and legal reforms were misleading:

-He praised Karzai for naming new Supreme Court judges. But he failed to mention that the Afghan parliament rejected Karzai's nominee for chief justice, a conservative cleric blamed for stalling reform, who favored Islamic laws mandating that adulterers be stoned to death and thieves have their hands amputated.

-He praised Italy for helping to train Afghan judges and prosecutors. Many Western officials and experts say the effort is seriously flawed and that Afghanistan's legal system is in a state of collapse.

-He said the Afghan National Police "have faced problems with corruption and substandard leadership." He contended that Karzai's government began tackling the problem after appointing a new leadership team this summer. But he didn't mention that Karzai named to his team 14 senior police generals whom U.S., European and U.N. officials opposed because of their alleged involvement in human-rights abuses and corruption.

Bush's comments were the latest in a series of talks that he's been making to counter Democratic charges that his policies in Iraq and Afghanistan have fanned violent Islamic extremism.

He praised the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force for beating back a major Taliban offensive earlier this month near Afghanistan's southern city of Kandahar and said multinational reconstruction teams were helping to restore electricity, build roads and improve water, irrigation and sanitation.

He noted that the United States has approved more than $4.5 billion in reconstruction money.

"The critics warned that we were heading towards a `quagmire,' " the president said. "And then the Taliban fell, and operations began in Iraq, the critics held up the multinational coalition in Afghanistan as a model and said it showed that everything in Iraq was wrong. And now some of the critics who praised the multinational coalition we built in Afghanistan claim that the country is in danger of failing because we don't have enough American troops there."

More than a dozen current and former U.S., European and Afghan officials and commanders agreed in recent interviews that there aren't enough foreign forces to provide the security required to rebuild one of the most devastated nations on Earth.

There are 5,000 American combat troops for the 27,000 square miles of eastern Afghanistan and only 8,000 NATO soldiers in the Taliban's vast southern heartland.

More foreign and Afghan soldiers and civilians have died this year than in any year since 2001, and suicide bombings have risen from two in 2002 to about one every five days. Karzai has called for a change in U.S. tactics because of the rising civilian casualties, a major factor behind the plunge in his popularity.

The problems with the American-led police reform program, a key part of Bush's exit strategy, go beyond those that the president outlined.

For instance, he put the size of the force at 45,000 officers.

But police Gen. Gullam Jan, who's in charge of police recruiting, and three U.S. officials involved in the program told McClatchy Newspapers earlier this month that no one knows how many officers are on the force.

Jan and the American officials, who requested anonymity because they weren't authorized to speak publicly, described the reform effort as paralyzed by immense corruption, nepotism, desertions, low pay, incompetence, massive pilfering of equipment and Taliban infiltration.

Bush praised Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf for making a "courageous choice" to end his country's support for the Taliban after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and to back the war on terrorism.

Bush noted that despite attempts on the Pakistani president's life, Musharraf has helped capture senior al-Qaida operatives whose information foiled terrorist plots and "saved American lives."

But Musharraf hasn't ordered the arrests of any of the Taliban leaders who fled to Pakistan in 2001 and who senior Afghan, U.S. and NATO officials say are directing the insurgency in Afghanistan from the Pakistani city of Quetta.

The United States has strong evidence that Pakistani intelligence officers are providing arms, training, money and protection to the Taliban as part of a long-held goal of installing a pro-Pakistan regime in Afghanistan's capital, according to U.S. officials and experts.

The insurgency will continue as long as the Taliban are given refuge in Pakistan, they warn.

Bush hosted Karzai and Musharraf at a White House dinner Wednesday in an effort to persuade them to put aside their differences and cooperate more closely.

In his speech Friday, Bush noted that Musharraf, who seized power in a 1999 military coup, plans to hold presidential elections next year.

Musharraf is expected to run, but he's refused say whether he'll relinquish the post of army chief of staff beforehand.

Bush And Kazakh Leader Play Up Partnership (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29 — President Bush took another step in his delicate foreign policy waltz with the authoritarian government of Kazakhstan on Friday, praising the oil-rich Central Asian country as “a free nation” while welcoming its president, Nursultan A. Nazarbayev, to the White House for lunch.

During a brief joint appearance in the Oval Office, Mr. Bush said the two presidents pledged to “support the forces of moderation throughout the world,” while Mr. Nazarbayev, speaking through a translator, reiterated his commitment to ridding his country of nuclear weapons and said the two nations had “truly become close partners.”

Neither man mentioned the sore points in that partnership: the absence of free elections in Kazakhstan, which became an independent state in 1991; state restrictions on the news media; and its recent decision to shut down two prominent American democracy organizations — a move that American officials are trying to reverse.

"We talked about our commitment to institutions that will enable liberty to flourish," Mr. Bush said. "I have watched very carefully the development of this important country from one that was in the Soviet sphere to one that is now a free nation."

Despite that transition, Kazakhstan also poses a diplomatic challenge for President Bush, who has made promoting democracy a central component of his foreign policy. On Friday morning, in his latest speech on fighting terrorism, Mr. Bush touted his efforts to build a free nation in Afghanistan and to push Pakistan toward free elections.

The White House views Kazakhstan, a state that has abundant oil and gas reserves and whose population is predominately Muslim, as a critical ally in promoting economic stability and security in that region. One-third of all foreign investment in Kazakhstan comes from the United States, and administration officials say the country has also been a strategic partner in Iraq and Afghanistan. It has a small ordnance removal team working in Iraq, and has given the United States fly-over rights so that military planes can take equipment to Afghanistan.

An administration official, granted anonymity to talk about the meeting, said "the issue of democracy was raised" during the visit. The leaders later put out a joint statement in which they agreed to "reaffirm the importance of democratic development" in institutions such as an independent news media and free and fair elections.

"They're moving in the right direction," the official said, "and we think that bringing them in close will give us greater prospects of expecting quicker progress."

Mr. Bush invited Mr. Nazarbayev to a small lunch rather than holding a state dinner — a sign that Kazakhstan's leader is working his way into the president's inner foreign policy circle, but is not all the way there.

Bush Hits Vacillating Critics Of Terror War (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 30, 2006

For the second straight day, President Bush yesterday took aim at Democrats who he said have flip-flopped on the global war against terrorism, and urged Americans to support his strategy and oppose "critics who change their positions."

"From the beginning, the American people have heard the critics say we're failing -- but their reasons keep changing," the president said in a speech.

"In the first days of Operation Enduring Freedom, the critics warned that we were heading toward a 'quagmire.' And then when the Taliban fell, and operations began in Iraq, the critics held up the multinational coalition in Afghanistan as a model, and said it showed that everything we were doing in Iraq was wrong.

"And now some of the critics who praised the multinational coalition we built in Afghanistan claim that the country is in danger of failing because we don't have enough American troops there."

Mr. Bush said to win the ideological struggle of the 21st century leaders need to change tactics to meet conditions on the ground -- not in response to the constantly changing positions of critics.

Democrats, however, rejected Mr. Bush's criticism.

"President Bush's election-year attacks are the product of a desperate White House with no credibility left with the American people," said Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, of California said, "It was yet another example of how he is in denial over what is happening in the war on terror."

But Mr. Bush quoted British Prime Minister Tony Blair when he said terrorism "is not our fault. You do not create terrorism by fighting terrorism."

"If that ever becomes the mind-set of the policy-makers in Washington, it means we'll go back to the old days of waiting to be attacked -- and then respond," Mr. Bush, apparently referring to former President Bill Clinton.

During his speech to the Reserve Officers Association that focused on U.S. efforts to spur Pakistan and Afghanistan toward greater freedom, the president acknowledged setbacks in both countries but called on Americans to be patient.

"The training of the Afghan police has not gone as smoothly as the army," Mr. Bush said, citing "corruption and substandard leadership." But he said, "We've made our concerns known ... When we see a problem, we adjust, we change."

The president, who met earlier in the week with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, also applauded NATO's decision this week to take over command of all peacekeeping operations in Afghanistan.

Mr. Bush also met last week in the White House with Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf, who he praised yesterday for helping to hunt down terrorists along the remote Pakistani-Afghan border. Mr. Bush said a major offensive in five eastern Afghan provinces was putting the Taliban on the defensive.

Australian Premier Defends Troop Pullout From Afghanistan (WT/AFP)

The Washington Times/AFP, September 30, 2006

AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE

SYDNEY, Australia -- Prime Minister John Howard this week defended his decision to withdraw special forces from Afghanistan during an increasingly bloody insurgency.

About 200 Special Air Services troops and commandos are expected to return to Australia soon after spending a year conducting operations in southern Afghanistan's Uruzgan province.

Mr. Howard defended pulling out the troops at a time when the insurgency was intensifying and the commander of NATO's mission in Afghanistan, U.S. Marine Gen. James Jones, appealed for 2,000 more soldiers. The prime minister said it would be a mistake to put too much pressure on Australia's special forces.

"The design of our force commitment always was that special forces would be there for a period of time, and then there would be a replacement by other forces," he told reporters.

"We think the current force composition is right and we have to be careful that we don't ask our special forces to carry all of the burden all of the time.

"I think you have to be very careful you don't overburden those people with all of the responsibilities."

Australia is in the process of deploying a 400-member reconstruction team backed by infantry troops to work with a Dutch-led reconstruction task force in Uruzgan.

Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said he met with NATO officials in Brussels to discuss the situation in Afghanistan.

He said more troops would be desirable, but there was also scope for some European troops to remove conditions on their existing deployments so they could be reassigned from the relatively quiet north to hot spots elsewhere in the country.

"The real challenge is that a larger number of countries in Afghanistan need to abandon the sort of caveats there are on their involvement and be prepared to support the countries that are shouldering the burden in the south of the country," Mr. Downer told Australian Broadcasting Corporation.

"I focus particularly on Canada. They've had 36 soldiers killed and they've been doing an enormous amount of work in the south of the country. "We'd like to feel that some of the other countries in the north of Afghanistan would be prepared to come in and provide backup support when it was needed in the south."

Suicide Blast At Afghan Interior Ministry Kills 12 (LAT)

By Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — A suicide bomber strapped with explosives detonated in front of the Afghan Interior Ministry as staffers arrived for work today, killing at least 12 people and wounding 42.

The bomber blew up in a crowd of people passing through a security gate on a narrow dirt road just before 8 a.m. Emarai Basheri, an Interior Ministry spokesman, blamed the attack on "the enemies of the nation and peace in Afghanistan."

The Interior Ministry is in charge of Afghanistan's police, including units responsible for counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics operations.

Mohammed Saddiq, a local photographer, was taking pictures of a customer near the ministry when police started shouting and ran toward a person in the crowd.

"As soon as the Interior Ministry officers got close to him, he exploded," Saddiq said. "There was flesh and blood and bones of people all around the area. A lot of people have been killed."

Suicide bombers, once rare in Afghanistan, have carried out at least 50 attacks this year in the worst wave of insurgent violence since U.S.-led forces toppled the Taliban regime five years ago.

This month, the U.S. military said a suicide cell in Kabul, the Afghan capital, was targeting American and other international troops. The warning followed a suicide car bombing near the U.S. Embassy, which killed two American soldiers and 14 Afghan civilians. That was the worst such attack in Kabul since the fall of the Taliban.

Insurgent attacks began to surge early this year as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization gradually took over more responsibility for security in southern Afghanistan from U.S. forces. NATO is in now command of military operations in the south, where Taliban and allied fighters have fought fierce battles in recent weeks.

The alliance says it doesn't have enough troops in Afghanistan to fight insurgents, who have surprised commanders with their tenacity. NATO has asked its members, which include the U.S., to send an additional 2,500 soldiers, but so far, European nations have failed to meet that request.

NATO announced this week that it would soon assume command from U.S. forces in eastern Afghanistan, where insurgent attacks are also on the rise following a treaty between Pakistan's government and Pashtun tribesmen in North Waziristan, on the Afghan border.

Under the treaty, the tribes are supposed to expel foreign fighters and end attacks in Afghanistan in exchange for a reduction in Pakistani security forces in the largely autonomous tribal areas.

During a recent visit to the U.S., Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf defended the treaty, arguing that it was the best solution, but Afghan and U.S. officials doubt it will prevent Taliban and allied militants from moving into Afghanistan.

Musharraf contends that Afghan President Hamid Karzai is to blame for the rising violence, which the Pakistani president calls a "popular uprising" by Pashtuns, Afghanistan's largest ethnic group, from which the Taliban were born.

U.S. Envoy Says Iraqi Premier Has Short Time To Quell Violence (WP)

By Amit R. Paley And Sudarsan Raghavan, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 29 -- The U.S. ambassador to Iraq warned on Friday that time is running out for Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to contain the burgeoning sectarian bloodshed that threatens to plunge the country into civil war.

"He has a window of a couple months," said the ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad. "If the perception is that this unity government is not able to deal with this issue, then a big opportunity would have been lost and it would take a long time to address this issue."

His remarks, which came during a surge in reprisal killings across Baghdad, reinforced comments by several senior U.S. military officials this week that Maliki's government must move urgently to tackle the militias and death squads wreaking havoc across the country.

Unlike the military commanders, however, Khalilzad said he and President Bush still have full confidence in Maliki and were "cautiously optimistic" that his government has the political will to rein in the bloodletting.

In a wide-ranging 45-minute interview at the ambassador's residence, Khalilzad also acknowledged that the U.S.-led invasion in 2003 was partly responsible for the violence engulfing Iraq, creating a "moral responsibility" for the United States to remain in the country to help solve the Sunni-Shiite bloodletting.

"They need our help," he said. "These circumstances have, in part, to do with the fact that we came in here."

After months of accusing Iran of fomenting violence in Iraq, Khalilzad on Friday also accused Syria of destabilizing the country. He said the Syrian government had harbored insurgents and allowed them to pour across the border into Iraq, adding that Iraqi President Jalal Talabani recently raised concerns with Syrian officials. "It's an issue for both the Iraqis and us to deal with," Khalilzad said.

The ambassador said sectarian violence had replaced the insurgency as the single biggest threat facing Iraq and called on the government to disarm unauthorized militias. He cited two armed groups: the Mahdi Army, controlled by anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, and the Badr Organization, run by the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a major Shiite party.

"They need to be brought under control," Khalilzad said. "They both need to be brought down."

Maliki's focus on political rather than military solutions to the militia problem has shown some signs of success, Khalilzad said, pointing to a recent statement by Sadr that "he wants only peaceful resistance and he doesn't want violence against the coalition."

"That's progress compared to where he was. . . . Now we want to see, on the ground, that actions are consistent with that," Khalilzad said.

Senior U.S. military commanders have recently raised serious concerns that Maliki's government is not moving quickly enough to control militias. That goal is complicated by the fact that the militias are controlled by major political parties that make up the fragile unity government.

"There is corruption and problems in some of these ministries, but it's got to be dealt with and it ought to be dealt with by the prime minister and the folks that are inside this government," said one of the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity during a briefing this week for reporters. "And I think the time is short for them to deal with that over time because this can't go on like that."

On Friday, the top American commander in Iraq said in a statement that Maliki "is very capable and he's doing a good job in a tough environment."

"He has an awful lot of challenges facing him," said Gen. George W. Casey Jr., "and I do believe he is very much up to the task."

Khalilzad said he was satisfied with Maliki's pace in dealing with the militia issue and did not agree with the assessment of many Iraqis that the government is paralyzed.

"But you can always raise questions: Will it be done? Will it be done on time? Those are issues," he said. "Terrible things are happening. People are dying. Sectarian violence is there."

Last week, the top American commander for the Middle East, Gen. John P. Abizaid, said the military was unlikely to draw down the 140,000 troops in Iraq before next spring. Khalilzad declined to comment on specific troop levels or when the United States should withdraw. But he warned that a premature departure could make Iraq an even worse breeding ground for terrorists than Afghanistan was after the decade-long Soviet occupation ended.

"Abandoning Iraq, I think, would have the most serious potential negative consequences of al-Qaeda taking a part of Iraq," he said. Because Iraq is in the heart of the Middle East and has vast oil wealth, he said, terrorism could be fostered on a scale that would make the Afghanistan of the 1990s, where Osama bin Laden sought refuge, seem like "child's play."

Violence across Iraq claimed dozens of lives on Friday. At least 35 people were killed or found dead, police said, including the brother-in-law of the new chief judge in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial.

Late Friday night, the prime minister's office announced an immediate ban on vehicle and pedestrian traffic that was scheduled to last until early Sunday morning. No explanation was provided.

Top U.S. Commander Defends Iraq's Premier (LAT)

By Doug Smith And Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. says Nouri Maliki is up to the task and criticisms by senior officers don't reflect the working relationship.

BAGHDAD — The highest-ranking U.S. military officer in Iraq on Friday disavowed criticism leveled by several senior officers at Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki for failing to rein in Shiite militias.

Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. said in a sharply written statement that Maliki was doing a good job in bad circumstances. "These unattributed comments do not reflect the close partnership between the government of Iraq … and Multi-National Force," he said.

The about-face came as violence continued to rack the capital. The brother-in-law of the judge presiding over former President Saddam Hussein's current trial was slain late Thursday, and authorities on Friday said the bodies of 61 victims of execution and assassination had been found the previous day.

During a briefing Wednesday, military officials who spoke on condition of anonymity voiced impatience with Maliki's Shiite-led government for being lax on the militias of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr. They said time was running out to curtail sectarian violence linked to Sadr's Al Mahdi militia.

Every day dozens of bodies, usually showing signs of torture, are dumped in the city. Sadr followers, who hold 30 of the parliament's 275 seats, say they are legitimately defending Shiites against the largely Sunni insurgency that plants bombs in parts of the capital almost daily.

The military officials said Maliki has stood in the way of plans to clear death squads from the sprawling Sadr City slum where Sadr's militia is based.

Since beefing up its Baghdad force with 4,000 troops, the U.S. military has conducted only light patrols in Sadr City, while clamping down on other, mostly Sunni, areas with sweeps and raids targeting nearly 100,000 buildings.

A Defense Department official who has discussed the comments about Maliki with U.S. officials in Baghdad said Friday that there was no pressure from the Pentagon to back down. Instead, the official said, officers in Baghdad felt that media reports overstated the level of frustration with Maliki.

A senior Pentagon official directly involved in Iraq policy, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said the Bush administration still supported Maliki but felt the challenges he was facing were increasingly difficult.

"He is stronger than his predecessor, he is well positioned, he is a moderate Shiite, he is reaching out to the Sunnis, he is in the right place politically," the Pentagon official said. "We think he is a really good guy. But the security situation is daunting."

The official said the Pentagon was also watching closely how Maliki handled corruption in the Interior Ministry.

The ministry is widely believed to be under the control of officials loyal to a number of Shiite militias, even though the minister, Jawad Bolani, is thought to be independent of such groups.

"The new minister of Interior we think is a decent guy. He is an improvement on his predecessor. The problem is, beneath him the ministry is bad," said the Pentagon official. "Maliki will have to decide. There are rumors he will have to replace [Bolani]."

At the earlier briefing, military officials said that Maliki had refused to authorize full-scale sweeps of Sadr City and that the effort to control the death squads had been hobbled by lists of Sadr followers who couldn't be arrested without the government's approval.

Officials in Washington also have expressed frustration with the Iraqi government's inability to control the militias.

But in the statement released Friday, Casey praised Maliki as "a determined, courageous leader taking on some very difficult issues."

"He has an awful lot of challenges facing him, and I do believe he is very much up to the task," Casey said.

The statement ended on a note of soaring optimism, saying, "Iraqis are taking control of their streets and their future and will soon serve as a model for democracy and freedom in the Middle East."

An Army spokesman declined to elaborate, but he said the language was common in statements "primarily intended for an Arab audience."

Authorities reported Friday that gunmen had killed the brother-in-law of Hussein trial judge Mohammed Orabi Khalefa in Ghazaliya, one of nine Baghdad neighborhoods the U.S. Army has designated as being cleared of insurgents. The assailants opened fire on the car carrying Kadhum Abdul-Hussein and his 10-year-old son. The boy was injured in the attack.

Khalefa was appointed less than two weeks ago after his predecessor said in court that Hussein was not a dictator.

Though it was not clear that the attack was related to the trial, the proceedings have been marred by assassinations in the past. Three of Hussein's lawyers have been killed.

Early Friday a march coursed through Sadr City in memory of Abdula Karim Abdul Wahid, an official in the Sadr organization who was shot and killed by Iraqi troops on the road between Najaf and Sadr City on Thursday when his car failed to stop at a checkpoint.

In the afternoon, Sadr City rang with denunciations of the U.S. military as an imam speaking for Sadr used the first Friday prayer of Ramadan to respond to the calls for a crackdown. Imam Sheik Abdul Zahraa Asowaiidi accused the U.S. of trying to incite Sadr's followers, and castigated the Americans for the arrest last week in Najaf of Sheik Salah Ubaidi, one of the radical cleric's assistants.

Commander: Iraq Insurgents Losing Ground (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, September 30, 2006

It is still possible to defeat the entrenched insurgency in Iraq's western Anbar province but probably not until U.S. troops leave, the American commander of forces in the provincial capital said Friday.

The insurgents are losing ground, and Iraqi security forces are gaining, said Army Col. Sean B. MacFarland, commander of 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division. He also said his soldiers' goal is not to destroy the insurgency but to build up the Iraqi army and police to a point where they can fight the insurgents on their own.

In an interview with reporters at the Pentagon from his headquarters in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province, MacFarland was asked if it would be fair to say his mission is not to actually win or to defeat the insurgency.

"I think so," he replied.

"You know, an insurgency is a very difficult thing to defeat in a finite period of time. It takes a lot of persistence — perseverance is the actual term that we like to use. Who knows how long this is going to actually last? But if we get the level of violence down to a point where the Iraqi security forces are more than capable of dealing with it, the insurgency's days will eventually come to an end. And they will come to an end at the hands of the Iraqis who, by definition, will always be perceived as more legitimate than an external force like our own."

He did not say point-blank that the insurgency could be defeated only if U.S. forces left, but he emphasized that the security force best suited to deal with anti-government elements eventually will be the Iraqi police.

His comments were the latest to suggest that progress this year against the insurgency has been spotty and that conditions are too fragile to permit any sizeable decrease in the U.S. military presence. Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of all U.S. forces in the Middle East, said last week it is unlikely that any troop reductions will be made until next spring at the earliest.

There are now 141,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, 30,000 of them in Anbar province.

MacFarland described himself as optimistic but acknowledged there are reasons to see the situation in Anbar as grim. He was asked about an apparent disconnect between the often-upbeat assessments of Iraq offered by U.S. commanders and the more negative impressions conveyed by the American news media.

"It all depends on if you're a glass-half-empty or a glass-half-full kind of a person," he said. "Right now, you know, the glass is maybe three-quarters empty, a quarter full. But we're pouring more water in all the time."

MacFarland's brigade is fighting in Ramadi, a predominantly Sunni Arab city of about 400,000 people where the insurgency has become so entrenched and feared by residents that the city has no Iraqi mayor. Recently, he said, the tide has begun to turn against al-Qaida in Iraq, the insurgent group comprised mainly of Iraqis.

"It's a situation that's beginning to spiral in our favor," he said.

Local Sunni tribal leaders are increasingly coming forward to side with the Iraqi security forces against al-Qaida, he said. "I think al-Qaida has been pushed up against the ropes by this," MacFarland said, suggesting that some intimidation tactics have grown less effective.

MacFarland painted a largely upbeat picture of the battle for Ramadi. He said attacks against U.S. and Iraqi forces have dropped from about 20 per day to about 15 per day in the last couple of months, and the attacks have become less effective.

He would not discuss casualty trends in his brigade, saying that would assist the insurgents by telling them how effective they have been. This month alone, the Pentagon has announced that five soldiers from MacFarland's brigade were killed in action in Ramadi, four by roadside bombs, the other by small arms fire.

On Monday the Pentagon announced that MacFarland's brigade has been ordered to remain in Anbar for 46 days beyond its previously scheduled departure in mid-January. That means the nearly 4,000 soldiers there will exceed the 12-month tour of duty that the Army has said should be the maximum for all units in Iraq.

MacFarland described his soldiers as disappointed but greeting the news "with a collective shrug."

Iraqi Journalists Add Laws To List Of Dangers (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, September 29, 2006

BAGHDAD — Ahmed al-Karbouli, a reporter for Baghdadiya TV in the violent city of Ramadi, did his best to ignore the death threats, right up until six armed men drilled him with bullets after midday prayers.

He was the fourth journalist killed in Iraq in September alone, out of a total of more than 130 since the 2003 invasion, the vast majority of them Iraqis. But these days, men with guns are not Iraqi reporters' only threat. Men with gavels are, too.

Under a broad new set of laws criminalizing speech that ridicules the government or its officials, some resurrected verbatim from Saddam Hussein's penal code, roughly a dozen Iraqi journalists have been charged with offending public officials in the past year.

Currently, three journalists for a small newspaper in southeastern Iraq are being tried here for articles last year that accused a provincial governor, local judges and police officials of corruption. The journalists are accused of violating Paragraph 226 of the penal code, which makes anyone who "publicly insults" the government or public officials subject to up to seven years in prison.

On Sept. 7, the police sealed the offices of Al Arabiya, a Dubai-based satellite news channel, for what the government said was inflammatory reporting. And the Committee to Protect Journalists says that at least three Iraqi journalists have served time in prison for writing articles deemed criminally offensive.

The office of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has lately refused to speak with news organizations that report on sectarian violence in ways that the government considers inflammatory; some outlets have been shut down.

In addition to coping with government pressures, dozens of Iraqi journalists have been kidnapped by criminal gangs or detained by the American military, on suspicion that they are helping Sunni insurgents or Shiite militias. One, Bilal Hussein, who photographed insurgents in Anbar Province for The Associated Press, has been in American custody without charges since April.

And all Iraqi journalists have to live with the fear of death, which often dictates extreme security measures. Abdel Karim Hamadie, the news manager for Al Iraqiya Television, said he sometimes went months without leaving the station's compound.

"The last time I went home was three weeks ago," he said, showing off a small room adjacent to his office where he sleeps each night. "Before that, I spent three months at work. I used to hit my chair because I was so angry. But then I got a new chair."

American diplomats here say they admire the dedication of Iraqi reporters in covering the war and the government's efforts to create a democracy.

"Journalists here work under very, very difficult conditions," said a United States Embassy official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "They are taking fire from every direction. They've got the defamation law hanging over their heads. They've got their political opponents gunning for them. They are trying very hard, and we want to encourage them."

Under Mr. Hussein, reporters and editors were licensed and carefully watched. Even typewriters had to be registered with the government. During that time, some reporters got by on the conviction that their articles, about the government's glorious new water projects or certain victory in the war with Iran, were at least patriotic.

"I never praised Saddam himself, never," said Shihab al-Tamimi, 73, who runs the Iraqi Journalists Union from a battered old mansion here. "But I praised the project, for the good of the country."

Now, Iraqi journalists still operate with considerable freedoms, at least compared with those in Saudi Arabia and other neighboring countries, and many Iraqis have achieved a new level of professionalism by working closely with Western journalists. So despite the growing government pressure, the news media have become increasingly aggressive.

Ethical boundaries, though, often remain murky. It was disclosed last year that the Lincoln Group, an American public relations firm hired by the Pentagon, paid Iraqi news outlets to print positive articles on the American presence here and provided stipends to Iraqi journalists in exchange for favorable treatment.

Even though the Iraqi news media have made strides, the journalists themselves are being killed at an extraordinary rate.

Since the Iraq war began, more than 130 journalists — most of them Iraqi — have been fatally shot, beaten or tortured to death, according to the Journalistic Freedoms Observatory, the most prominent domestic advocacy group for journalists to emerge since the invasion. (The Committee to Protect Journalists, which requires more evidence to verify reported killings, lists 79 journalists and 28 news workers.)

Most of the victims — reporters, photographers and editors — were working for local newspapers and television stations.

"Don't be surprised if you wake up one day to find that I have also been killed," said Habib al-Sadr, the chief executive of the government-financed Iraqi Media Network, the nation's largest media organization. In the network's office lobby, a display case holds the photographs of 13 reporters and editors killed on the job since 2003, including Amjad Hameed, the head of the network's television channel, Al Iraqiya.

"The road to democracy is not smoothly paved," Mr. Sadr said during a recent interview in his office, cigarette smoke curling around his face. "It is filled with bombs."

Despite the danger, Falah al-Mishaal, the editor of Al Sabah, the government-run newspaper in Baghdad, said he enjoyed his job now because he felt like a real journalist.

"Now, we are free," he said in an interview in late July. "We can write whatever we want."

Three weeks after the interview, a man drove a minibus filled with explosives into Al Sabah's rear parking lot and blew it up, killing two people and wounding 20 others.

September has been particularly deadly for journalists.

Safa Ismael Enad, a freelance news photographer, was buying film at his favorite print shop in eastern Baghdad on Sept. 13 when two men with guns walked in, fired two shots into his chest and dragged his bleeding body away.

Three days earlier, gunmen blocked Abdul-Kareem al-Rubaie, a designer for Al Sabah, as he traveled to work one sunny morning, and they shot him through the windshield. Last month, Mohammad Abbas Mohammad, a newspaper editor, was shot to death in western Baghdad, and Ismail Amin Ali, a blunt-spoken columnist, was killed on the street across town on the same day.

The disdain for truly free expression cuts across sectarian lines. The men who killed Mr. Karbouli after warning him to stop his critical reporting on the insurgency were almost certainly Sunni. The former governor of Wasit Province, and the judges and police officials who brought charges against the three journalists for questioning their ethics, were all Shiites.

In April, Mastura Mahmood, a young journalist for the women's weekly paper Rewan, was charged with defamation for an article that quoted an anti-government demonstrator in Halabja comparing the Iraqi police there with the Baathists who once ran the country. She was arrested and then released on bail.

In May, a court in Sulaimaniya, in Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region, sentenced two journalists, Twana Osman and Asos Hardi, to six-month suspended jail terms for an article claiming that a Kurdish official had two telephone company employees fired after they cut his phone service for failing to pay his bill.

"These cases show that Iraqi officials are quick to use the same kinds of onerous legal tools as their neighbors to punish outspoken media," said Joel Campagna, the Middle East program director for the Committee to Protect Journalists.

Last month, more than 70 news organizations signed a nine-point pledge supporting the national reconciliation plan of Prime Minister Maliki, promising not to use inflammatory statements or images of people killed in attacks, and vowing to "disseminate news in a way that harmonizes with Iraq's interests." Days later, the police barred journalists from photographing corpses at the scenes of bombings and mortar attacks. Since then, policemen have smashed several photographers' cameras and digital memory cards.

At Al Arabiya, the Baghdad station shuttered by the Iraqi authorities earlier this month, the studio door handle is sealed in red wax and bound in police tape. (The door is adorned with a photo of Atwar Bahjat, who was kidnapped, tortured and killed in Samarra in February while reporting on the bombing of a Shiite shrine.)

Some news executives express support for Al Arabiya's closing.

"It is the right of the Iraqi government, as it combats terrorism, to silence any voice that tries to harm the national unity," said Mr. Sadr, of the Iraqi Media Network.

Muqtada Al Sadr Orders Followers To Put Down Their Weapons (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, September 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Muqtada al Sadr, the firebrand Shiite Muslim cleric whose Mahdi Army is arguably Iraq's most powerful armed group, has ordered his followers to put down their weapons temporarily, three of his aides told McClatchy Newspapers on Friday.

Analysts differed on the significance of the directive, which Sadr delivered in secret to his commanders two weeks ago in the southern city of Kufa. Some saw it as Sadr's way of distancing himself from rising sectarian violence, most of which has been blamed on his followers.

Others said the order was little more than an effort by Sadr to head off an offensive by American and Iraqi forces against his militia, which increasingly is seen as a shadow sectarian security force. Controlling many of Iraq's larger cities, the Mahdi Army uses its political hold on several government ministries to win new supporters.

"The American and the Iraqi governments are starting to feel how powerful he is getting. It's obvious that both of them are fed up," said Mithal Alusi, a secular Shiite member of parliament. "That's why the Sadrists are playing a tactical game: to quiet the attacks and buy time."

Whichever view is correct, Sadr's directives suggest that his organization is feeling pressure to curb the violence between Shiites and their Sunni Muslim rivals. U.S. officials have blamed Sadr for much of the killing and have pledged to move against his forces.

Iraqi army troops clashed with Mahdi Army members last month in Diwaniya, and tensions have been rising with U.S. troops, who earlier this month detained Sadr supporters meeting in Najaf. American troops fought pitched battles with Sadr's forces twice in 2004. Both times, Sadr's forces took heavy casualties but the cleric survived, and his militia grew stronger.

Now many think the Mahdi Army controls security in much of Iraq through death squads and its infiltration and intimidation of Iraqi security forces. Sadr's political supporters are influential with Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki, who won his post through the backing of Sadr, who controls the largest voting bloc in the parliament.

Analysts also think that Sadr is having trouble controlling his organization. Some militant members have criticized him for joining the political process last year, accusing him of straying from his pledge to reject the American-created government and rid Iraq of foreign forces. A senior U.S. military official said earlier this week that at least six former Mahdi Army leaders no longer answered to Sadr.

Those leaders now are members of rival groups that are competing for power, popularity and funding from the same sources as Sadr.

"What you do see over time is that you'll see guys, who, for whatever reason, become motivated to become more militant, and the militant elements find the political framework confining," the U.S. military official said, speaking only on condition of anonymity because he was giving confidential information. "I'll tell you as time goes on, you're going to continue to see elements break off the organization and become sort of these semi-independent or independent players, but none of them remain independent for long. They all find a sponsor."

Regaining control may be one reason that Sadr issued his four-point mandate orally to his commanders. According to three top Sadr aides, who agreed to discuss the meeting only if they weren't identified because it had been secret, Sadr told the commanders to:

-Reduce the size of units to 75 fighters from as many as 400, to make the units more manageable.

-Issue new identification cards to Mahdi Army members to replace IDs that have been forged.

-Send every member to an orientation course that would outline the group's mission.

-Lay down weapons temporarily.

The last directive is intended to flush out armed groups who say they're part of the Mahdi Army but in fact don't answer to Sadr. No armed operation is to be undertaken, the aides said, without Sadr's permission.

DOJ_NMG_0072012

"As long as we don't have orders, we can't do anything. The Mahdi Army will be known as only fighting the Americans," a top Mahdi Army leader in Kufa said Friday.

It remains to be seen whether Sadr's directive will be followed.

There's been no drop in sectarian killings in the days since Sadr supposedly issued his orders.

Clerics aligned with him offered little moderation in their sermons Friday.

In remarks aimed at Prime Minister Maliki on Friday, Sheik Mouad al Khazraji, a Sadr supporter, told worshippers: "The arms that fight the tyrants are still alive. The weapons, which helped you become prime minister, are still full with powder and we are ready to teach you and your master" - referring to the Americans - "a lesson in endurance. Our patience has limits."

Iraqi Linked To Sunni Bloc Is Held In Plot, Military Says (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 29 — American forces detained an Iraqi working for one of Iraq's most prominent Sunni Arab political leaders on Friday on suspicion that the man was helping to plan a multiple-car suicide bombing inside the Green Zone, the military said.

Shortly after Iraqi television channels began Friday night to broadcast news of the detention, the Iraqi prime minister's office took the unusual step of banning all vehicle and pedestrian traffic in Baghdad until Sunday morning.

The government declined to give a reason for the curfew and did not say whether it was linked to the detention. Authorities had never before banned walking in Baghdad, and the order may indicate fears that Sunni radicals might respond violently.

The military did not identify the man it detained, but said he had been at a compound near the house of Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of the Iraqi Consensus Front, the largest bloc of Sunni parties in Iraq, which holds about a sixth of the seats in Parliament.

Mr. Dulaimi confirmed that one of his guards was taken Friday, but he said he did not know the reason.

"Credible intelligence indicates that the individual and seven members of his cell were in the final stages of launching a series of vehicle-borne improvised device attacks inside the international zone, possibly involving suicide vests," a military spokesman said.

Mr. Dulaimi identified the man as Khodar Farhan Ghargan. He said the raid of his compound was the third by American troops. He denied Iraqi television reports that troops had also found bomb-making equipment.

"They told me that they wanted some information about one of my guys," Mr. Dulaimi said. "They searched all the bedrooms of the guards. They found nothing."

News of the detention was likely to embarrass Sunni Arab political leaders, who have long dismissed accusations among rival Shiites that their guards and staff belong to the insurgency.

Mr. Dulaimi, a hard-line Sunni, has long been at the center of the Sunni political elite, helping to found the largest bloc of Sunni parties and then acting as its leader. He was nominated but not chosen as speaker of Parliament this spring.

Also on Friday, Iraqi authorities announced the killing of the brother-in-law of the judge who is presiding over the trial of Saddam Hussein. It was not clear whether the shooting was sectarian in nature or tied to the family's relation to the judge.

Iraqi Police Cited In Abuses May Lose Aid (NYT)

BAGHDAD, Sept. 29 — American officials have warned Iraqi leaders that they might have to curtail aid to the Interior Ministry police because of a United States law that prohibits the financing of foreign security forces that commit "gross violations of human rights" and are not brought to justice.

The Interior Ministry, dominated by Shiites, has long been accused by Sunni Arabs of complicity in torture and killings.

The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said in an interview on Friday that "at this point" Iraq had not been formally notified that its national police were in violation of the legislation, known as the Leahy Law. He said he remained optimistic that Iraqi officials would "do the right thing" and resolve the matter. Nonetheless, he said American officials had begun reviewing programs that might have to be ended.

The issue centers on one of the most sensitive subjects within the Iraqi government: the joint Iraqi-American inspection in May and subsequent investigation of a prison in eastern Baghdad known as Site 4.

Within the prison there was clear evidence of systematic abuse and torture, including victims who had "lesions resulting from torture" as well as "equipment used for this purpose," according to a human rights report later published by the United Nations mission in Iraq.

The prison, run by an Interior Ministry national police unit, had more than 1,400 prisoners crowded into a small area. An American officer said some had been beaten or bound and hung by their arms. At least 37 teenagers or children were in the prison.

In another sign of Iraq's security problems, the Iraqi government late on Friday banned all vehicle and pedestrian traffic in Baghdad until Sunday. No reason was given, but the decision followed news that the United States military had arrested an Iraqi employee of a leading Sunni politician on suspicion that he was helping to plan an attack inside the Green Zone. [Page A6.]

The controversy over Site 4 has become emblematic of the problem of militia members infiltrating the Interior Ministry's security forces and fears that Iraqi leaders are unwilling to take action against rogue groups.

A number of high-ranking officials have been implicated, including one division commander, an American official said. According to United Nations officials, as many as 52 arrest warrants have been issued, though none have been carried out. And shortly after the Site 4 inspection, the government stopped allowing joint Iraqi-American prison inspections.

American officials have long warned about the dangers of militia influence, and had hoped the new government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki would crack down on the groups.

Lately, though, senior American military officials have been voicing increasing concerns about the government's reluctance to take action against militia members. One senior American military official acknowledged last week, "There's a political piece to this to see if they deal with these guys."

The Leahy Law, named for its author, Senator Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, requires that assistance to foreign military and police forces stop if the secretary of state has "credible evidence" implicating them in human rights abuses — unless effective measures are taken to bring offenders to justice. The law covers money in the foreign operations budget and Defense Department training programs.

"There is abundant evidence that Iraqi government forces are committing atrocities with impunity, yet the Pentagon has refused to even report on its procedures for monitoring U.S. aid to these forces," Mr. Leahy said through an aide on Friday night. "Their controls on the weapons we provide have been lax to nonexistent, and so has been their adherence to the law. This avoids accountability, it taints us to be connected to these abuses, and it needs to change."

In an interview, Mr. Khalilzad said that the Site 4 investigation was continuing and that he had discussed it several times recently with the new Iraqi interior minister, Jawad al-Bolani.

"There is a Leahy Law that affects support if the terms of the law are not observed and implemented, and he has assured us that he will do so," Mr. Khalilzad said. "And we are still in discussions with him." Mr. Khalilzad did not specify how long Iraqi leaders have to take action.

In the past, Western officials in Baghdad have described Mr. Bolani, a Shiite engineer, as committed to removing militia members and other offenders from the ministry. But they have also said his independence from Shiite political parties — the very thing that won him support for the job from a wide range of political parties — also meant that he had little muscle to dislodge politically connected officials.

Mr. Bolani has expressed a willingness to take action on the Site 4 abuses even without pressure from the United States, Mr. Khalilzad said, and he emphasized that American officials had not "threatened" him over the issue.

"He wants to do the right thing," he said. "Not because of us, but because that's what Iraqi law would require him to do as well. That's a much better reason for him to do the right thing than for the U.S. pressing him or the U.S. threatening with some sort of a sanction."

However, the ambassador also said American officials were examining what programs might be cut if the law were applied. "We're looking at the potential implications of that, what will be affected, what won't be affected," he said.

One reason Mr. Bolani has not taken action in the Site 4 case is that he has not received written confirmation that indictments have been handed up, Mr. Khalilzad said. He said he believed that the number of Interior Ministry officials involved might be closer to a dozen than to the 52 cited by the United Nations. A senior American official said he understood that indictments had been issued.

In an interview on Friday night, Brig. Abdul Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, did not directly address whether the ministry was at risk of losing American aid. He said allegations that ministry officials were involved in torture were overblown.

But United Nations officials, who have repeatedly called attention to Site 4, warn that the failure to bring those accused of abuse to justice risks fueling sectarian violence by leading the Iraqi people to believe that militiamen and government employees are exempt from the rule of law.

"It can further the violence and counterviolence and revenge killings, because people may seek justice outside the judicial system," said Gianni Magazzeni, chief of the United Nations human rights office in Iraq. "Any action against impunity would be a step in the right direction."

In recent interviews, senior American military officials have said time is growing short for Iraqi leaders to take action against militias and corrupt officials, who they say are diverting money from the ministries to political parties.

In a statement on Friday, the commander of United States forces in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., distanced himself from such comments, which he said "do not reflect the close partnership" between the American military and Iraqi leaders. General Casey described Prime Minister Maliki as a "determined, courageous leader" who is "doing a good job in a tough environment."

Al-Zawahri: Bush A Liar In War On Terror (AP)

By Bassem Mroue, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Al-Qaida No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahri called President Bush a failure and a liar in the war on terror in a video statement released Friday, and he compared Pope Benedict XVI to the 11th century pontiff who launched the First Crusade.

"Can't you be honest at least once in your life, and admit that you are a deceitful liar who intentionally deceived your nation when you drove them to war in Iraq?" Osama bin Laden's deputy said, appearing in front of a standing lamp and a small, decorative cannon.

Al-Zawahri also criticized Bush for continuing to imprison al-Qaida leaders in prisons, including al-Qaida No. 3 Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged Sept. 11 mastermind who was captured in Pakistan in March 2003.

"Bush, you deceitful charlatan, 3 1/2 years have passed since your capture of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, so how have you found us during this time? Losing and surrendering? Or are we launching attacks with God's help and becoming martyrs?" he said.

"What you have perpetrated against Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and the other Muslim captives in your prisons and the prisons of your slaves in Egypt, Jordan, Pakistan and elsewhere is not hidden from anyone, and we are a people who do not sleep under oppression and who do not abandon our revenge until our chests have been healed of those who have committed aggression against us," he said.

"And we, by the grace of Allah, are seeking to exact revenge on behalf of Islam and Muslims from you and your soldiers and allies."

Al-Zawahri accused the United States and its agents of torturing Muslim prisoners seized across the Middle East.

"Your agents in the Arabian Peninsula, Yemen, Egypt, Jordan, Iraq, Pakistan and Afghanistan have captured thousands of the youth and soldiers of Islam whom you made to taste at your hands and the hands of your agents various types of punishment and torture," al-Zawahri said.

Ben Venzke, head of the Virginia-based IntelCenter, which monitors terrorism communications, said al-Zawahri essentially gave al-Qaida's spin on the arrests and detentions of its leaders.

"They are countering arguments that individuals have been able to provide useful information," he said. "And they are continuing to reinforce their intentions for revenge."

Al-Zawahri said Benedict is reminiscent of Pope Urban II, who in 1095 ordered the First Crusade to establish Christian control in the Holy Land.

"This charlatan Benedict brings back to our memories the speech of his predecessor charlatan Urban II in the 11th century ... in which he instigated Europeans to fight Muslims and launch the Crusades because he (Urban) claimed 'atheist Muslims, the enemies of Christ' are attacking the tomb of Jesus Christ, peace be upon him," al-Zawahri said.

Al-Zawahri's remarks about Benedict were a clear response to the pontiff's comments this month that sparked outrage across the Muslim world. In that speech, Benedict cited a Byzantine emperor who characterized some of the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad as "evil and inhuman," particularly "his command to spread by the sword the faith."

"If Benedict attacked us, we will respond to his insults with good things. We will call upon him and all of the Christians to become Muslims who do not recognize the Trinity or the crucifixion," al-Zawahri said.

Al-Zawahri also called a U.N. resolution to send peacekeepers into Sudan's war-torn Darfur region a "Crusader plan" and implored the Muslims of Darfur to defend themselves.

"There is a Crusader plan to send Crusaders forces to Darfur that is about to become a new field of the Crusades war. Oh, nation of Islam, rise up to defend your land from the Crusaders aggression who are coming wearing United Nations masks," he said. "No one will defend you (Darfur) but a popular holy war."

The nearly 18-minute statement, titled "Bush, the Pope, Darfur and the Crusades," was produced by al-Qaida's media arm, as-Sahab, and made available by the IntelCenter. An initial segment shows al-Zawahri in an office-type setting, while in the second part he is in front of a brown backdrop. The first segment also has English subtitles.

After conducting a technical analysis of the videotape, the CIA concluded "with confidence" that the speaker is in fact Ayman al-Zawahri, said a CIA spokesperson who spoke on condition of anonymity

An intelligence official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity, said U.S. experts view the latest video as a typical propaganda message, whose main thrust is a call for more people to join the jihad, or holy war.

It wasn't immediately clear when the message was recorded, the official said, but al-Zawahri's reference to the pope indicated the message was produced sometime after Benedict's Sept. 12 comments about Islam.

Al-Qaida has released a string of videos to coincide with the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, showing increasingly sophisticated production techniques in a likely effort to demonstrate that it remains a powerful, confident force despite the U.S.-led war on terror.

The IntelCenter said Friday's video was the 48th released by the al-Qaida Web site this year, three times more than last year's number — which had been the highest. It said al-Zawahri has appeared in 14 of the 2006 videos.

Congress Approves $70 Billion For Wars In Iraq, Afghanistan (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Congress yesterday authorized an additional $70 billion in emergency funds to pay for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan through early next year, including nearly $24 billion for the Army and Marine Corps to repair and replace worn-out equipment.

The new funding provides more than $2 billion for the military's efforts to defeat the road bombs, or "improvised explosive devices," that are the leading cause of deaths among U.S. troops in Iraq.

Senate and House conferees also agreed yesterday on $463 billion in overall defense spending for fiscal 2007, a 3.6 percent increase over 2006. To ease the strain on U.S. ground forces, the conference report called for an increase of 30,000 soldiers and 5,000 Marines in 2007, with additional increases authorized through 2009.

The new funding brings to $507 billion the total amount authorized by Congress for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as for extra security for military bases and embassies, since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Rising sectarian and insurgent violence is delaying troop cuts until well into next year, and U.S. commanders are increasingly asserting that military power alone is not sufficient to stabilize Iraq.

Yesterday, one U.S. commander in Iraq's volatile Anbar province said the job of American forces in his region is not to defeat the insurgency but to drive the violence down to a point at which it can be handled by Iraqi forces.

"Who knows how long this [insurgency] is going to actually last?" said Army Col. Sean MacFarland, who oversees thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops fighting in Anbar's troubled capital, Ramadi. "But if we get the level of violence down to a point where the Iraqi security forces are more than capable of dealing with it, the insurgency's days will eventually come to an end. And they'll come to an end at the hands of the Iraqis," he said in a videoconference with reporters.

There are about 142,000 U.S. troops in Iraq and more than 20,000 in Afghanistan, and military officials say those levels will be necessary through next spring. Earlier this year, commanders had thought that those numbers would be lower by several thousand by now.

The higher-than-anticipated troop levels are further straining U.S. ground forces, as the Pentagon has had to keep thousands of soldiers in Iraq beyond the standard year-long tour. This week, the Pentagon extended for more than six weeks the tours of nearly 4,000 soldiers in MacFarland's unit, the 1st Brigade of the 1st Armored Division.

The extension will allow an incoming brigade from the Army's 3rd Infantry Division to have a full year at home before deploying back to Iraq for the third time.

MacFarland said attacks have decreased 25 percent in Ramadi recently, falling from about 20 to about 15 a day, as local tribes have thrown their support behind Iraqi police recruiting efforts. However, he declined to say what impact this decline in attacks was having on U.S. troop casualties in Ramadi, where dozens of soldiers and Marines have died since the beginning of summer.

Senior Pentagon officials have stated emphatically that the U.S. military alone cannot win the war in Iraq, and that political and economic progress is vital to success there. In Anbar province, for example, a Marine intelligence report concluded last month that U.S. forces there faced a military stalemate as insurgents took advantage of weaknesses in the local government and economy. MacFarland acknowledged such problems in Ramadi, where there is no mayor or effective municipal council.

Separately, a senior Pentagon official faulted the U.S. effort in Iraq yesterday, saying that authorities are "struggling" to coordinate various projects and operations there.

"We don't sufficiently have unity of effort yet," said Eric S. Edelman, the undersecretary of defense for policy. Speaking at a State Department conference on how the U.S. government should better conduct counterinsurgency campaigns, he added that he believes it would "take an ongoing adaptive effort" to do better. Specifically, he said, he would like to see more coordination of reconstruction work with military operations.

After Edelman spoke, Meghan O'Sullivan, the deputy national security adviser for Iraqi affairs, stood to say that "the White House sees this as a conference of consequence. We really are in need of new tools."

Some experts on counterinsurgency have criticized the U.S. effort in Iraq for violating the military principle of unity of command, which posits that one person should be in charge of any overall effort. The U.S. presence in Iraq has always been divided, with separate chains of command for the military and for civilians.

Officials from the Pentagon and the State Department said after the Edelman speech that they were not aware of any plans to restructure the U.S. presence in Iraq to create a unified chain of command for the military and civilians.

Record Defense-Spending Plan Of $447.6 Billion Goes To Bush (WSJ)

By DAVID ROGERS And SARAH LUECK

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress sent a $447.6 billion Pentagon budget to President Bush, as lawmakers sought to clear the path for homeland and port bills tailored to burnish Republican security credentials going into November's midterm elections.

The record Pentagon measure is laden with emergency funds to restore the readiness levels and equipment of Marine and Army units worn down by the war in Iraq. The $34.8 billion Homeland Security budget also relies on emergency funds to tighten border security in the wake of Congress's failure to pass comprehensive legislation to address illegal immigration. The Senate also was expected to approve a House-passed bill authorizing, but not paying for, 700 miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Anxious to go home this weekend to campaign for the midterm elections, lawmakers were scrambling to complete negotiations on a bill addressing port security. Labor unions appeared to have successfully softened restrictions targeted at longshoremen with criminal records. Rail and transit security provisions were largely dropped to expedite matters, but attempts were being made to attach restrictions on Internet gambling.

The White House and top Republicans were frustrated in their effort to add a provision shielding telephone companies from privacy lawsuits because they shared their customers' records with the government as part of the Bush administration's warrantless wiretap program. The provision had the support of Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R., Alaska), and active help from Vice President Dick Cheney and the office of House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.). But Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada raised objections and Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine), chairwoman of the Senate homeland committee, was leery of adding the provision to the port bill at this time.

"I do believe as chairman of Commerce, that the entities that cooperated with our government -- particularly in the period of extreme stress that they did it following 9/11 -- deserve to have immunity from suit for having complied with the request from the government," said Mr. Stevens. He said William Barr, executive vice president and general counsel for Verizon Communications Inc., had raised the issue with him.

In recessing this weekend, Congress is leaving behind a huge backlog of work at a time when public-opinion polls show voters are unhappy with lawmakers' performance. Republicans and the White House have sought to emphasize security issues this fall, but the result has been to postpone final action on major education and domestic-spending bills. Even an effort to salvage bipartisan legislation to encourage greater use of health-information technology has been stymied by fighting among Republicans. Barring a major turnaround, the House expected no agreement with the Senate on a bill to encourage offshore oil-and-gas exploration.

The greatest activity on the domestic front has been on social issues. An effort that anti-abortion groups called a "do-or-die vote" was headed for failure in the Senate. The House-passed measure was designed to prevent minors from getting around states' parental-notification laws by traveling to other states for abortions. The House passed legislation making it easier for property owners to challenge zoning decisions in federal court, bypassing state courts.

More than any issue, perhaps, Iraq hangs over the political landscape. But despite the divide over the war, the Pentagon budget cleared the Senate easily Friday morning, bringing the total U.S. commitment since the war began in 2003 to $379 billion, according to updated estimates by the Congressional Research Service. From an historic standpoint, overall defense outlays in the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1 are projected to surpass -- in real dollars -- defense spending at the height of the Vietnam War in 1968.

The added $70 billion in emergency funds will finance U.S. military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. But under pressure from the Army and Marines, an estimated $23 billion would be set aside to help the services begin to rebuild units strained by the war. The Army has had to struggle just to meet its payroll at the end of the fiscal year.

Congress OKs Funds For War, Detainee Trials (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 30, 2006

Congress approved a series of war-related measures yesterday, including $70 billion more for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and a plan for trying detainees in the war on terrorism.

The United States is "safer, stronger and more prosperous" because of the legislation, congressional Republicans told reporters before leaving town to campaign for November's midterm elections.

The Senate failed, however, to provide President Bush with the authority he wants to continue a wiretapping program that allows listening to international communications between suspected terrorists without a court order. That legislation was never taken up after House Republicans approved the measure earlier in the week.

Republicans focused instead on the passage of other security-related bills.

"The war against terror has been given incalculable support thanks to the recent enactment of legislation to clarify America's authority to hold and try enemy terrorists," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, said yesterday. "We have begun the process of securing our national borders and bringing our immigration system back under control, with three major border security bills passed in recent weeks."

With yesterday's 250-170 vote in the House, the terror-detainee legislation can be sent directly to Mr. Bush for his signature.

The Senate yesterday unanimously cleared the military funding bill, providing $448 billion to the Defense Department, including a 2.2 percent pay raise for military personnel.

Since lawmakers failed to pass the bulk of the annual spending bills, however, they included language in the defense bill that funds the rest of the government agencies through Nov. 17.

The House voted 412-6 for a $34.8 billion spending bill to fund the Department of Homeland Security, and the Senate later followed suit, clearing it by voice vote. The measure includes $21.3 billion for border protection and immigration enforcement. It will help pay for 1,500 new Border Patrol agents, border fencing, vehicles and technology, and 6,700 new detention beds for illegal aliens.

Final legislation to bolster the nation's port security programs in order to prevent terrorist attacks was heading toward passage in the House last night. The Senate earlier OK'd a motion that will automatically approve the bill once the House passes it.

Republicans included in the ports legislation a provision that cracks down on Internet gambling by banning credit card companies from processing these transactions.

The House also voted 398-23 to approve a massive defense authorization bill, but the Senate had not passed a measure by late last night. Besides laying out a military budget, the bill would have rolled back recent Navy and Air Force rules that House Republicans say wrongly pressure military chaplains to pray vague public prayers instead of praying in Jesus' name or using other specifics of their faiths.

Conservatives received another disappointment late last night when most Senate Democrats and a handful of Republicans blocked final approval of House-passed legislation that would have punished anyone who skirts a state's parental involvement law by taking a pregnant minor to another state to obtain an abortion without her parents' knowledge. The measure, which fell short of the 60 votes it needed, also would have punished doctors who perform abortions on out-of-state minors without first contacting at least one of the parents.

Meanwhile, Senate and House Democrats held separate press conferences yesterday to criticize Republicans and Mr. Bush for refusing to acknowledge that the war in Iraq has encouraged terrorism and made America less safe. They cited the much-discussed April National Intelligence Estimate and Washington Post editor Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," which strongly criticizes the administration.

"He has become Mr. Rosy Scenario," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said of Mr. Bush. "The fact is his actions have not made us safer."

The California Democrat said Mr. Bush is in "denial" about the level of violence in Iraq and the mistakes his administration has made. "What he says is not in touch with reality," she said, insisting Democrats "can protect America in a way that will ... uphold the Constitution."

Senate Democrats renewed their calls to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, especially in light of Mr. Woodward's critical new book. "This secretary of defense has made deadly mistakes from the start," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat.

Republicans countered by saying that the economy is strong and the country has not been attacked within its borders since September 11, 2001.

"Jobs are being created, and new investments are pouring into our economy," Mr. Hastert said. "As we continue to help win the war abroad, protect our borders and homeland, and make positive reforms here at home, we have not lost sight of the ever-present fact that much more must be done."

Defense Spending Bill Includes More Pay, More Ships (VAPILOT)

By Dale Eisman

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Congress moved toward approval late Friday of a record $533 billion defense spending program for 2007, including a 2.2 percent pay raise for most service members and $70 billion to offset the spiraling cost of the war in Iraq.

While the House passed the measure in the evening, Senate action was expected later Friday or early Saturday.

Approval was all but assured after a conference committee resolved differences between House and Senate versions of the legislation.

The bill adds 30,000 soldiers and 5,000 Marines to the active-duty force while trimming 12,000 sailors from the Navy - a cut requested by the service as part of an ongoing drive to reduce personnel costs.

It permits construction of seven new ships, including an attack submarine to be built in part at the Northrop Grumman Newport News shipyard, and sets aside $739 million toward a new-design aircraft carrier to be built in Newport News beginning in 2008.

While pushing ahead with the new carrier, the Navy also won approval for plans to reduce the aircraft carrier fleet to 11, retiring the Florida-based carrier John F. Kennedy.

The Kennedy's departure could have long-term implications for Hampton Roads, as Florida lawmakers want a Norfolk-based carrier shifted to the Navy's base in Mayport, Fla., to replace the Kennedy.

Five carriers currently are based in Norfolk, but one, the George Washington, already is slated for transfer to a base in Japan in 2008.

Losing a carrier would drain 3,000 jobs and $225 million per year from the Hampton Roads economy, according to preliminary estimates by the Hampton Roads Planning District Commission.

The defense spending bill requires the service to offer the Kennedy to the NATO alliance or the Department of Homeland Security and to maintain the 38-year-old carrier so that it could be reactivated during a national emergency.

Congress voted last year to retain the Kennedy, over the objections of Navy leaders who say that changes in the way the service deploys and maintains other carriers permit it to trim the carrier force without reducing its overall strength.

Yet after the service announced that repairs needed to keep the ship in service would cost about $1 billion, the Kennedy's fate was sealed.

Of particular interest to Hampton Roads, the bill also:

Allows the Navy to fully retire the battleship Wisconsin and turn it over to Virginia and Norfolk authorities for use as a floating museum. The deck of the World War II-era dreadnought, moored alongside Nauticus in downtown Norfolk, has been open to public tours for several years.

A Navy spokesman, who spoke on background, said the legislation allows some portions of the interior to be opened as well. Under pressure from Marine veterans, who argue that battleships are unmatched in providing firepower to cover an amphibious landing, Congress ordered that the Wisconsin be preserved in a way that would allow it to be reactivated if needed.

At least temporarily rolls back Navy and Air Force regulations that some evangelical chaplains complain could restrict their right to pray as their faith dictates. The chaplains want to be able to offer sectarian prayers at public events, including ship christenings or change of command ceremonies. Military leaders say prayer at such events should be ecumenical.

Chaplains know they represent everybody and deserve to be trusted to offer prayers without a commanding officer's involvement, said Rep.

J. Randy Forbes, R-4th District, founder of the Congressional Prayer Caucus.

DOJ_NMG_0072019

"Chaplains not only have tremendous wisdom in those situations, but they have exemplified that for a long period of time," he added.

The prayer issue is expected to be the subject of c ongressional hearings next year.

Sets a 36 percent limit on the interest rates that can be charged on "payday loans" taken out by many young service members and their families. Lenders now commonly charge 500 percent or more for such loans, which quickly leave many borrowers buried in debt.

Provides $2.9 billion for the purchase of 20 more F-22A Raptor fighter-bombers for the Air Force. The radar-evading Raptors are gradually replacing F-15

Eagles at Langley Air Force Base in Hampton. At more than $130 million each, they are the most expensive fighter aircraft ever.

The defense bill, passed annually to set guidelines for spending on thousands of military programs, typically tracks spending requests by the services and the president.

Lawmakers, however, broke sharply with the administration and uniformed leaders this year to block plans to double or triple health insurance premiums for more than 1 million retired troops and their families.

The administration sought the increases, as well as higher charges for prescription drugs; the two proposals sparked an intense and ultimately successful lobbying campaign by military service organizations.

Staff writers Kate Wiltrout and Jack Dorsey contributed to this report.

Lawmakers Agree To Limit Interest Rates For Payday Loans (SDUT/AP)

By Sam Hananel

The San Diego Union-Tribune/AP, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON – Interest rates on payday loans to military service members would be limited under an agreement reached Friday by House and Senate Republicans.

The measure imposing a 36 percent cap on the annual interest rate for payday loans to service members or their spouses will be included in the defense authorization bill, which Congress was expected to approve later Friday.

“We need to enact these new protections for our troops and their families because a growing predatory lending problem has impacted our operational readiness,” said Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., who pushed the measure in the Senate.

Talent and other lawmakers charged that payday lenders target military personnel, offering quick cash advances at outrageously high interest rates that trap unsavvy borrowers in a cycle of debt.

Payday lenders offer short-term loans against borrowers' paychecks and charge fees. Borrowers who cannot repay the loan by the next payday often “roll over” the loan repeatedly, leading to more charges.

The average annual percentage rate for payday loans is about 390 percent. As lending fees pile up, borrowers can end up paying an annual percentage rate of 800 percent or more.

The Defense Department strongly supported the rate cap measure after issuing a report earlier this year finding many payday lenders are clustered around military bases.

“This will help get the message out about the importance of preserving the financial health or our sailors and Marines,” said Navy Capt. Mark Patton, commanding officer for San Diego's Naval Base Point Loma, who headed a military task force campaigning against high-interest loans.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger welcome the news. Earlier this month, he said he would seek state legislation for a 36 percent cap on loans to troops after such a measure failed in the state Legislature.

“The governor is pleased that Congress is placing additional safeguards for service members and their families,” said Schwarzenegger spokesman Bill Maile.

Industry officials say payday loans provide financial assistance to soldiers in need and claim military personnel will be forced to seek high-cost loans from unregulated Internet lenders.

“We are extremely disappointed that the conferees have chosen to take away valuable financial choices from service members,” said Darrin Andersen, president of Community Financial Services Association of America, which represents more than half of the estimated 22,000 payday industry outlets.

Andersen said military personnel make up only 1.3 percent of revenue across the industry.

Pentagon officials said the problem was becoming an issue of military readiness, with spiraling debt causing service members to lose security clearances or become distracted from their missions.

Consumer protection advocates, who have long criticized payday lenders for preying on poor communities, also backed the measure.

"It's important for this to be in federal law because it will provide a base line of protection regardless of where you're stationed and regardless of what form of loan you're getting," said Jean Ann Fox, director of consumer protection for Consumer Federation of America.

When Soldiers Go To War, Flat Daddies Hold Their Place At Home (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

HERMON, Me. — It was the first day of school, and distance not withstanding, 9-year-old Baylee Smith wanted to take a picture with her father, Mark, who is stationed with a National Guard unit in Afghanistan. Real daddy was not available, but Sergeant Smith's doppelgänger was.

"Where's Flat Daddy?" an excited Baylee asked as her stepmother, Jennifer Smith, pulled a large cardboard picture of Sergeant Smith, in his uniform, out of her Chevy Blazer and propped him on the bumper. The two, along with Ms. Smith's young sons, Alec and Derek, posed for a picture with their Flat Daddy, who promptly fell down.

"Stop it Dad, that's not funny. It's not a joke," Baylee said with a laugh.

The Maine National Guard is giving life-size from-the-waist-up pictures of soldiers to the families of deployed guard members. Guard officials and families say the cutouts, known as Flat Daddies or Flat Soldiers, connect families with a relative who is thousands of miles away. The Flat Daddies are toted everywhere from soccer practice to coffee shops to weddings.

"The response has been unbelievable," said Sgt. First Class Barbara Claudel, director of the Maine National Guard's family unit. "The families just miss people so much when they're gone that they try to bring their soldier everywhere."

The Maine National Guard has given out more than 200 Flat Soldiers since January. While other guard units are recommending Flat Soldiers, and families around the country are using them, officials here say Maine's National Guard is the only one giving one to each family that asks.

Flat Daddies have been used by military families since at least 2003, when Cindy Sorenson of Bismarck, N.D., ordered a life-size photo of her former husband, Capt. Dave Bruschwein, on a piece of foam board when he was stationed in Iraq with the North Dakota National Guard.

Ms. Sorenson heard that the children of local guard members made small cutouts of themselves modeled on the children's book "Flat Stanley," where the character is flattened and can travel by envelope, and then mailed the images to Iraq.

She wanted to make a similar, life-size version of Captain Bruschwein for their daughter, Sarah, who was 13 months old when her father was deployed. She took a picture of him and his jacket measurements to a local printer, who charged her $75 for Flat Dave, as he was called.

Ms. Sorenson said it helped Sarah, now 4, recognize her father when he came home on leave. "She saw him on the jetway and said, 'Daddy, Daddy,' " Ms. Sorenson said. "There was no anxiety."

Ms. Sorenson shared the idea with Elaine Dumler, a Colorado motivational speaker, who included it in a book on coping with deployment.

Ms. Dumler said National Guard families were receptive to the idea because many had never dealt with a long overseas deployment.

"It affects these families a little more," Ms. Dumler said, "because they're not living on a base or a post, surrounded by families who know what they're going through. They tend to feel a little more isolated."

That is especially true here in Maine, whose National Guard members are randomly assigned to bases throughout that large state. The National Guard tries to have parties where Flat Soldiers are invited, and family members sometimes take them to support meetings.

Cristin Gardner of Ellsworth, whose husband, Troy, is stationed in Iraq, said she often caught her 6-year-old son, Ashton, including Flat Daddy when he played with soldiers.

Rachel Austin of Colorado Springs paid $50 for a flat version of her husband, Toby, in February after hearing about them through the Colorado National Guard. Ms. Austin said Toby was at the dinner table every night with their sons, Ayden, 20 months, and Ryan, 5. Flat Toby also has been to pre-kindergarten graduation, an uncle's 50th birthday party in Cheyenne, Wyo., and a Denver Broncos game, although he sat in the car because it was raining.

Ms. Austin said Ayden, who was 13 months old when she brought Flat Toby home, recognized his father, often taking the image off its usual chair and kissing it. Flat Toby is a real person in their house, she said.

"It's nice to see him each day, just to remember that he's still with us," Ms. Austin said. "It's one of the best things I've done during this deployment. I really think it's helped us stay connected, to remember that he's still with us."

Angela Williams, 27, of Anchorage, got a flat version of her husband, who she married three months before he was deployed to Afghanistan, through the Alaska National Guard.

Her flat husband spends most of his time in their bedroom closet, but she will occasionally take him out to show to friends or to look at herself.

"He went away so recently after we got married that sometimes I look at it and say, 'Oh, I'm married, and he's real and he's gorgeous,'" Ms. Williams said.

Parents of young deployed soldiers are also using flat soldiers. Carol Campbell of Anson, Me., got a flat version of her 24-year-old daughter, Jessica, who now sits at the family's kitchen table. Ms. Campbell writes all of the places Jessica has visited on the back of the cutout. In June, Flat Jessica even chaperoned an after-prom party that her younger sister attended.

Ms. Campbell said that her youngest daughter thought the idea was odd at first, and that their dog, Speckles, used to bark at the Flat Soldier, but that both are now used to it.

"At first, it can take you aback, but it never did for me," Ms. Campbell said. "I just felt like her presence is here. The Flat Soldier does provide comfort, and we'll take it any way we can."

Justice Department Appoints Assistant As Interim U.S. Attorney (AP)

AP, September 30, 2006

OMAHA — Joe Stecher, an assistant United States attorney, was appointed Friday as interim U.S. attorney for the District of Nebraska.

Stecher succeeds Mike Heavican, who is leaving the department to serve as chief justice of Nebraska's Supreme Court. Heavican had held the post since 2001.

The U.S. Department of Justice announced Stecher's appointment.

Before joining the justice department, Stecher served in the Dodge County attorney's office for 16 years, first as deputy county attorney, then as chief deputy county attorney, and from 1999-2002 as Dodge County attorney.

Stecher also served as director of the Nebraska County Attorney's Association from 1996-2002.

He received a law degree from the University of Nebraska College of Law, and his bachelor's degree from Wayne State College.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Odds Rise Congress Will Crack Down On 'Pretexting' (WSJ)

By John Godfrey, Rob Wells

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House could vote in the near future on legislation that would require telephone companies to better protect customer records, and crack down on data brokers who lie to get those records, House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (R., Texas) said Friday.

"The bill is alive and healthy," he said. Mr. Barton acknowledged that there are issues to iron out, including the question of whether phone records are the property of the customer or the corporation.

Mr. Barton spoke as his committee's investigations panel held the second day of hearings into phone-customer privacy. The bill has drawn renewed support after Thursday's hearing on investigative techniques used by Hewlett-Packard Co. to track down a boardroom leak. Those techniques included scam artists posing as phone customers to acquire phone-calling records, a practice known as "pretexting."

Complete coverage7

The bill, which would clamp down on pretexting, isn't likely to come to a House vote until the lame-duck session following the Nov. 7 election. The bill passed the Energy and Commerce Committee unanimously in March and was scheduled to be considered by the full House on May 2. But House Republican leaders pulled the bill from the House schedule without explanation.

Some lawmakers have questioned whether Republican leaders support it. Aides to House Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) said the delay was simply a matter of a jurisdictional conflict between committees.

Phone companies, which have considerable clout in Congress, oppose the bill, which would increase penalties on carriers for failing to adequately protect their customers' records. Fines could reach a maximum $300,000 per violation, up from $100,000. Multiple violations could result in a maximum fine of $3 million, according to a description of the bill supplied by the Energy and Commerce Committee.

Meanwhile, Joel Winston, the Federal Trade Commission's associate director in the privacy and identity-protection division, said at the Friday hearing that the FTC settled its case against data broker Integrity Security & Investigation Services Inc. The settlement blocks ISIS from obtaining or marketing consumer phone records, and requires the company and its principal, Edmund Edmister, to disgorge "ill-gotten gains derived from alleged violations," according to the FTC.

Congress Told Of Persistent Pretexting (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Someone impersonating journalist Christopher Byron called AT&T's customer service 46 times over 2 1/2 months until a company representative finally divulged details of his phone calls.

"This is known as dialing for dummies," an animated Byron told lawmakers yesterday, complaining that the 2002 disclosure led to the identification of two of his confidential sources.

Gaining unauthorized access to such records is far more common than the recent Hewlett-Packard Co. case suggests, members of a House subcommittee were told at a hearing yesterday, the day after HP executives, former executives and investigators were called to testify on the tactics used to spy on communications between journalists and members of the company's board of directors.

Representatives of a private investigation firm, six wireless companies, the Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Communications Commission testified yesterday. An investigator, Doug Atkin of Anglo-American Investigations Inc. of Playa Del Rey, Calif., invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and refused to answer questions.

Compared with the previous day's standing-room-only session, the hearing yesterday had far fewer spectators. Committee members focused their questions on the mechanics of how phone companies verify the identities of people with whom their customer service agents speak and tried to determine the frequency with which impostors seek private information.

Rep. Cliff Stearns (R-Fla.) wondered whether the questions carriers ask to verify their customer's identities -- addresses and passwords -- are enough to stop most prying private eyes. "Are the wireless companies doing their best to protect their customers?" Stearns asked.

Wireless company executives sad tricksters will always try to work around ever-changing security measures. Snoops sometimes try to gain unauthorized access to records by posing as phone company employees, they said. In some cases, hackers try to change passwords to gain access through online accounts, as was the case with at least one HP board member.

Private investigators who sell such records -- sometimes advertised on the Internet -- use methods that are as creative as they are persistent, they said. "Human ingenuity is limitless," Charles Wunsch, Sprint Nextel Corp. vice president, told members of House Energy and Commerce Committee's oversight and investigations subcommittee. "Most customers demand fast and efficient service," and companies are faced with the challenge of trying to protect private customer data against legitimate requests for information from customers about their bills, he said.

FCC Enforcement Bureau chief Kris Anne Monteith said the agency had asked some carriers whether their databases were compromised in the HP case. Joel Winston, the FTC's associate director of consumer protection, said Congress should permit the FTC to levy criminal fines against people trying to gain access to phone records under false pretenses, a practice known as pretexting.

Both government witnesses testifying yesterday voiced their support for a Commerce Committee-backed bill that would outlaw the practice. That bill has not yet reached the House floor. A separate bill, from the Judiciary Committee, would make pretexting a crime, and has passed in the full House. Two proposals to outlaw the practice are pending in the Senate.

Company representatives testifying yesterday also endorsed bills that would make pretexting a crime. Some said they had filed lawsuits against firms that allegedly accessed private records in violation of computer fraud laws.

Cingular Wireless and Verizon Wireless have sued investigative companies that they allege obtained records in connection with the HP scandal.

H.P., Red-Faced But Still Selling (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

DOJ_NMG_0072023

WHAT if the initials H.P. — as in Hewlett-Packard — enter the lexicon in the same manner that Google has? Google, of course, has become much more than a corporate name. It now doubles as a catch-all term for online search that has resulted in nifty little verbs like "Googled," "Googles" and "Googling."

If H.P. undergoes the same sort of metamorphosis and becomes shorthand for illicit snooping, you might be telling your friends that a stalking ex-boyfriend is "so H.P." or that your office mate, who snoops through the stuff on your desk and listens a little too closely to your calls, has "gone H.P."

But the prospect of children hurtling the epithet "H.P.'er" at parents who monitor their Web surfing is just one of the minor worries for Hewlett-Packard, which, as the world's largest technology company, has its brand name on millions of computers, printers, ink cartridges and corporate data servers. Revelations that the company's detectives and lawyers planned and supervised an extensive investigation of some of its directors, journalists who covered the company, a few employees and others have blemished its reputation.

The question is whether the scandal will more seriously damage one of the most storied names in corporate America. Mark V. Hurd, the chairman and chief executive, is the person shouldering the responsibility for managing the scandal's fallout and, for the time being, it appears that he has guided Hewlett-Packard through the crisis with the same skill he has been using to turn around this once-stumbling technology giant.

By many measures, the company so far has escaped any serious damage. Its stock, about the only visible barometer of public perception other than retail sales and late-night talk-show jokes, is as strong as it was before the spying operation was revealed in early September. The stock closed on Friday at $36.69, close to its 52-week high of $37.25, almost unchanged during a month of unrelenting reports of detectives obtaining personal phone records, rooting through garbage, following directors and journalists — spying on one while at Disneyland — and planning to infiltrate newsrooms with spies masquerading as janitors or clerks.

Nor would it seem that the outlandish plots concocted by the company's Clouseaus have convinced customers that a Dell notebook or a Sun server makes more sense these days. Kurt Francis, a Century 21 real estate agent in Escondido, Calif., said that Hewlett-Packard's woes did not change his view of the company and that it would not affect his willingness to buy H.P. products.

"H.P. is a lot bigger than one or two people," said Mr. Francis, who uses an H.P. financial calculator, an H.P. notebook computer and even an H.P. personal digital assistant. "It's very sad what's happened, but it will blow over — the average consumer is going to forget this in two months."

H.P. certainly does not appear to be paralyzed by the imbroglio. Last Thursday evening, the same day that Mr. Hurd testified before a Congressional subcommittee examining his company's investigative methods, the company's personal computer division announced the acquisition of Voodoo Computers, a maker of high-powered computers for hard-core gamers.

Ravi Sood, a co-founder of Voodoo, said the spying scandal did not make him or his fellow founder — and brother — Rahul Sood, waver in selling their operations to H.P. "It makes a statement that we closed the deal during this thing," he said. "Business goes on."

Rahul Sood, Voodoo's president, said that one reason he wanted to sell the company to Hewlett-Packard was his high regard for Mr. Hurd. He said Hewlett-Packard executives flirted with Voodoo in the past about a merger, but that nothing had happened. When Rahul Sood sent an e-mail message directly to Mr. Hurd in July 2005 outlining the rationale for a merger, "he moved mountains," Mr. Sood said. (He gave another reason for wanting to link with H.P.: "Getting a ticket into H.P. Labs would be like Charlie getting a ticket to Willy Wonka's chocolate factory.")

Reassuring customers about the sale, Mr. Sood wrote on his blog that Mr. Hurd "is quick to make business decisions, but understated when it comes to 'glory.' " He recounted how Mr. Hurd has said that he did not want his photograph hanging in the lobby of the company headquarters near those of the company founders William R. Hewlett and David Packard.

Mr. Hurd's decision not to memorialize himself next to the famous founders is often cited by Hewlett-Packard and others as an example of his modesty. It is also no accident that the anecdote offers a contrast between Mr. Hurd and his predecessor as chief executive, Carleton S. Fiorina, who made sure that her picture was hung in the corporate lobby next to the founders.

Even so, analysts and others believe that Mr. Hurd's modesty has been an important factor in the company's comeback. When asked in a recent interview to comment on his critics' contention that Ms. Fiorina deserves the credit for the company's turnaround, he did not disparage her strategy. Instead, he said that her efforts "just needed a bit of crystallization."

Mr. Hurd's modest demeanor came into play again at the Congressional hearing on Thursday when he deployed it to defuse anger about privacy invasions by company-hired detectives, all of whom refused to testify and invoked their Fifth Amendment right against self incrimination.

Mr. Hurd took a big risk by volunteering to appear at the Congressional inquiry — any missteps at the hearing could haunt him personally, professionally and legally — but his advisers said he figured that owning up to well-publicized mistakes was a better path to follow than hiding. He also asked to appear alone at the witness table, something that the company's crisis consultants counseled against because it meant that he would probably be hit with more questions.

"It was Mark's decision; he's taken the position that he needs to take responsibility for what went wrong," said Michael J. Holston, a lawyer with Morgan, Lewis & Bockius, which is representing the company before the various state and federal investigators. "He concluded that he didn't have anything to hide so he got up there and answered all their questions."

Mr. Hurd also was not represented by a personal lawyer, a point he made sure that members of Congress — and the throng of reporters covering the event — noted.

As it turned out, Mr. Hurd never encountered a fusillade of hostile questions from the committee. Congressional ire was aimed, instead, at Patricia C. Dunn, who as Hewlett-Packard's chairwoman had instigated the investigation and tracked its details, according to documents given to investigators. (Ms. Dunn recently resigned from the board, and Mr. Hurd assumed her duties.) But Ms. Dunn did not accept any responsibility for the company's actions and repeatedly said she could not recall or could not remember meetings, e-mail messages and memos related to H.P.'s wide-ranging snooping. Some members of Congress were less than impressed by her.

"It showed that she was not credible," said Representative Edward Whitfield, the Kentucky Republican who is chairman of the House subcommittee.

Yet Mr. Hurd was fuzzy on the details, too, raising the classic questions that arise in any scandal, corporate or political: What did he know and when did he know it? Despite the lingering ambiguity surrounding Mr. Hurd's role in H.P.'s snooping, his name appears on only eight of some 20,000 pages of documents that the company has turned over to Congress, the California attorney general, and the United States Attorney's Office so far, , according to people who have examined most of those documents.

One of the stronger pieces of evidence that linked Mr. Hurd to the spying project was a March 10 draft report of the operations that Hewlett-Packard's investigators prepared for certain company executives. Mr. Hurd acknowledged receiving the report, but said he never read it. "It was not my finest hour, Mr. Chairman," he replied to Mr. Whitfield's questions about how he could have missed references to such things as surveillance, obtaining a reporter's cellphone records and installing tracer software on a reporter's computer.

Those references appear on the third and fourth pages of the 18-page report. While the reference to the legality of obtaining cellphone records was noted only in a footnote, a reference in the text of the report to a "covert intelligence gathering operation" would seem harder to miss. Mr. Hurd testified that he did not approve the use of the tracer software, which covertly pinpoints the Internet address of anyone who opens the document online. He said he had not ruled out the future use of such software in possible criminal investigations of fraud or theft perpetrated against the company. But according to people close to him, Mr. Hurd has forbidden its use on reporters.

For all of the apparent goodwill surrounding him, Mr. Hurd still has some tricky issues to juggle. Potential criminal charges still loom against H.P. and three employees who were deeply involved in the spying operations. As is always the case in corporate investigations, they may end up implicating their bosses as legal pressures mount. The three employees are Ann O. Baskins, the company's former general counsel (whose office was only several feet from Mr. Hurd's); Anthony R. Gentilucci, the company's manager of global investigations, who resigned; and Kevin T. Hunsaker, a senior counsel who reported to Ms. Baskins and led the investigation, who refused to resign and was fired.

Even with those employees — and Ms. Dunn — out of the company, it is still possible that William Lockyer, the California attorney general, could bring felony or misdemeanor charges against Hewlett-Packard. And it may be harder for Mr. Hurd to charm Mr. Lockyer than it was for him to charm members of Congress. Mr. Holston, the company's lawyer, said H.P. continued to supply documents to authorities. "We don't think a crime was committed," he said. "But we understand their argument and want to talk it through."

Mr. Hurd faces another challenge. The spy operation has led to the removal of three board members. Finding replacements will be a distraction. But it is also an opportunity to rebuild a board with members who are not at one another's throats, according to analysts.

"They've bled a ton of blood," said Robert Enderle, an analyst at Enderle Group, a technology market research firm in San Jose, Calif., who said the board needed people with a better understanding of the Internet and younger consumers. "It would be good to have someone on the board who understands consumer electronics — and not the way it was 10 or 20 years ago."

HOWEVER the scandal shakes out, one thing is clear: H.P. is now widely linked in the public mind with the invasion of privacy, and that perception strikes at the core of the company's identity and its marketing mojo.

"Privacy is a core H.P. value," said Scott Taylor, the company's chief privacy officer, in a Congressional hearing last June. "We firmly believe that our ability to succeed in the marketplace depends on earning and keeping our customer's trust."

Anyone who has an H.P. computer may have noticed the messages that pop up from time to time on the screen that are sent directly from the company. They were perceived before as innocuous, maybe bothersome. But now they may serve to remind customers of the spying episode, which Mr. Hurd described as a "breakdown at multiple levels."

In other words, whenever one of those Hewlett Packard pop-ups appear on users' computer screens, they may feel that they are being "H.P.'ed."

H.P. Read Messages Of Reporter (NYT)

By Miguel Helft

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29 — Hewlett-Packard's effort to plug news leaks included monitoring at least one employee's instant-messaging exchanges with a reporter, according to documents provided to Congressional investigators.

The documents also provide other new details of the operation, including the company's payments for the services of investigators, and they shed light on a feud that simmered for months between Patricia C. Dunn, the chairwoman, and Thomas J. Perkins, a board member who resigned in protest over the inquiry.

They are included in the voluminous files made available to lawmakers in preparation for the House subcommittee hearing held Thursday on the Hewlett-Packard case.

In a March 2 e-mail message, Kevin T. Hunsaker, the senior lawyer in charge of the investigation, asked Fred Adler, the company's information security investigator, to "do some monitoring on incoming and outgoing calls to Pui-Wing Tam," a reporter at The Wall Street Journal, "and keep a really close eye on her I.M. traffic with Moeller," Mr. Hunsaker wrote, presumably referring to Michael Moeller of Hewlett-Packard's media relations team.

An e-mail message sent by Mr. Adler some two weeks earlier appears to celebrate what was a new investigative tool for the team. "New monitoring system that captures AOL Instant Messaging is now up and running and deployed on Moeller's computer," Mr. Adler wrote to Mr. Hunsaker and others on the investigative team. "It instantly began to pay results."

The rest of the message shows the text of close to 70 instant-messaging exchanges between Ms. Tam and Mr. Moeller, mostly discussing the company's earnings in what appears a fairly routine exchange between a reporter and a company spokesman.

Experts say it is not clear whether the monitoring of an employee's instant messages would raise any new legal issues for Hewlett-Packard or those involved.

If the employee is using the company's service as an Internet service provider, "then the company can monitor lawfully anything that the person sends or receives," said Clifford S. Fishman, a professor of law at Catholic University of America in Washington. But if the employee is using a third-party communications system, "it is less clear whether the company can monitor that."

As far as the monitoring of calls referred to in the message, the form was not specified. Hewlett-Packard has acknowledged that its operation included inspection of company phone records as well as acquiring private phone records through subterfuge, in a practice known as pretexting. But it has said no wiretapping was involved.

"I was aware that the company was monitoring instant messaging," Mr. Moeller said on Friday night, adding that Ms. Dunn and Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive, had both already apologized to him for the operation's scrutiny of him. Mr. Moeller was previously identified as a target of the pretexting efforts, along with board members and journalists, including Ms. Tam.

A spokesman for The Wall Street Journal declined to comment.

The documents also give an account of a daylong tracking of the activities of Mr. Moeller during a technology conference in Los Angeles, including reports on overheard snippets of his conversations.

Other documents provided to Congressional investigators revealed that Hewlett-Packard was billed a total of $325,641.65 for various services related to the leak investigation's second phase from January to April. That included $83,597.42 for surveillance, which was described as "Multiple Surv. And Sting Activity Palo Alto, Piedmont, SF, LA, CA & Denver CO." A parenthetical note clarifies that the surveillance included "trash re-con of all areas."

Background investigations on several board members and their relatives, as well as reporters for The Wall Street Journal and the online service CNet, did not come cheap. The bill was $66,688. There were also background checks on employees of Hewlett-Packard's media relations department, costing $6,435.

And locating, identifying, charting and cataloguing records of interested parties — the part of the investigation that apparently included pretexting — cost $44,875.

Invoices from the Action Research Group, the Florida company that is reported to have arranged the pretexting, are also among the more than 100 documents obtained by Congressional investigators. Many of them run in the vicinity of $100, but a

2005 invoice for call records of Carleton S. Fiorina, around the time of her dismissal as chairwoman and chief executive, shows a price tag of $500.

The invoices conclude with the line "Thank you for using our services!!!", all in capital letters, followed by a black-and-white rendition of Hello Kitty, a popular Japanese cartoon character.

The documents also illuminate the bitter conflict that developed over months between Ms. Dunn and Mr. Perkins, whose attacks on Ms. Dunn have been well publicized. They include an outburst at the board meeting in May, when Mr. Perkins resigned. But the animosity, according to Ms. Dunn, who resigned as chairwoman last week, had been building up earlier.

"I did not share details of my interactions with Tom during the year prior to his resignation," Ms. Dunn wrote to other Hewlett-Packard board members in an Aug. 17 e-mail message. "Tom's behavior to me in our one-on-one interactions was often so over the top that the simple facts would have seemed like exaggeration. I won't indulge in a chronology of the intimidation, pressure, rudeness and criticism that Tom directed at me, but will simply say that I have never had remotely similar experiences with anyone."

The investigation subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which held Thursday's hearing, continued its examination of pretexting on Friday with a hearing at which representatives of six cellular carriers testified. The officials said they thought pretexting should be against the law, but did not specifically endorse a pending bill approved by the House committee.

The committee's chairman, Representative Joe Barton, Republican of Texas, said Friday that the long-stalled legislation might come up for a House vote soon.

Two of the carriers have also initiated legal action against detective agencies identified as having played a role in pretexting in the Hewlett-Packard case.

On Friday, Cingular Wireless filed a lawsuit against CAS Agency Inc. of Carrollton, Ga., and Charles Kelly, the company's registered agent. Cingular contends that CAS illegally obtained the telephone records of Dawn Kawamoto, a reporter for the online technology news service CNet, as part of the Hewlett-Packard operation.

The lawsuit, filed in United States District Court in Atlanta, also names 100 "John Doe" defendants and 100 unidentified companies that Cingular says conspired with CAS Agency.

The move came one day after Verizon Wireless filed a similar lawsuit against unidentified individuals for illegally obtaining phone records of its customers in the Hewlett-Packard effort.

Cingular Files Suit In Case Related To H-P Probe (WSJ)

By Amol Sharma

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

Cingular Wireless filed suit Friday against a company it says fraudulently accessed the records of one of its customers, a CNET News.com reporter, as part of the Hewlett-Packard Co. boardroom-leak investigation.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S District Court in Atlanta, names CAS Agency Inc. and one of its employees, Charles Kelly, as defendants. The cellphone operator says the agency illegally obtained the records of CNET reporter Dawn Kawamoto, who reported on internal discussions within H-P's board.

Cingular learned that CAS had accessed the records of Ms. Kawamoto at a congressional hearing Thursday. Cingular also listed as defendants 100 unidentified "John Does" and 100 unidentified companies that it says have attempted to obtain and sell its customers' records. Neither CAS nor Mr. Kelly could be reached for comment.

Cingular, a joint venture of AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp., is the second cellphone operator to take legal action against firms that participated in the H-P investigation. On Thursday, Verizon Wireless, a joint venture of Verizon Communications Inc. and Vodafone Group PLC, filed a lawsuit in New Jersey federal court against 20 unidentified individuals who it says obtained its customers' cellphone records as part of the H-P probe.

Prior to the unfolding of the H-P scandal, cellphone operators were already taking aggressive action against companies that gain access to their customers' phone records through deceit or fraud -- a practice known as "pretexting."

Verizon and Cingular say the investigators working for H-P dishonestly posed as customers or as employees at the carriers in order to convince customer service agents to grant them access to accounts. Both companies are suing for, among other things, unspecified financial damages and a halt to further pretexting activity.

In the past year, Verizon Wireless, Cingular Wireless, Sprint Nextel Corp., and T-Mobile USA, a unit of Deutsche Telekom AG, have all taken pretexters to court.

Electronic Privacy Information Center associate director Lillie Coney9 says that despite H-P's expressed surprise, there are plenty of federal and state laws that protect consumers from having their records pretexted.

Sprint and T-Mobile haven't filed lawsuits against pretexters specific to the H-P case. H-P General Counsel Ann Baskins, who resigned from the company Thursday, referred specifically to Sprint and Nextel in handwritten notes dated June 15, 2005. In the notes, which were circulated at the congressional hearing Thursday, Ms. Baskins wrote: "Call carriers (Nextel/Sprint) via pretext to extract info." It remains unclear whether Sprint Nextel customers were actually targeted.

Sprint spokeswoman Jennifer Walsh said the company would pursue "anyone found to have victimized Sprint Nextel customers."

Fastow's Long Walk To Less Time (NYT)

By Joe Nocera

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

In some deep part of his soul, Andrew S. Fastow, who was given a surprisingly light six-year sentence this week for his role in the Enron debacle, always knew he was guilty of crimes. Not the big crimes, mind you, like his role as Enron's chief financial officer in dreaming up those special-purpose entities he controlled — the ones that generated hundreds of millions of dollars in fake earnings, helping to create the illusion that Enron was a prosperous company.

At Enron, that was something to be proud of. That was how they gamed the system. As Mr. Fastow testified during the trial of his former bosses, Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, when he set up his first special-purpose entity, called LJM, "I thought I was being a hero for Enron."

It was the petty crimes, the skimming operations, the secret guarantees that his partnerships wouldn't lose money: that's where Mr. Fastow knew he was vulnerable. Not long after Enron filed for bankruptcy, he met with several advisers, one of whom recalls his response to a question about whether all the deals had been proper. Well, he replied, the Southampton deal was a problem.

The Southampton Place partnership originated in a 1999 deal in which Mr. Fastow and his right-hand man Michael Kopper conspired with three British bankers to defraud NatWest bank of Britain of $19 million. It wasn't one of those complicated Enron accounting scams that are impossible to explain. It was the kind of straightforward crime jurors understand.

So why then, knowing what he knew, did it take Mr. Fastow three years after the feds began circling Enron for him to agree to a plea bargain? And why did it take more time still for Mr. Fastow to morph into what the federal prosecutor John Hueston described to me as a man who gave the Enron task force "extraordinary cooperation, unprecedented in my 13 years as a prosecutor?" And why, oh, why, given how long it took him to get there, did he wind up getting a 40 percent reduction in the 10-year sentence he agreed to when he finally decided to help the government put away Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay?

LAWYERS who do white-collar work like to compare defendants facing the possibility of hard time to a patient learning he has a deadly disease. There are stages to go through: denial, depression, anger, acceptance and, finally, surrender. Mr. Fastow went through all of them.

In the beginning, he still acted as though he were the chief financial officer of Enron — arrogant and prone to hissy fits — but also unwilling to think ill of Mr. Skilling. Mr. Skilling had shepherded Mr. Fastow's career, brought him into the Enron inner circle, and gave him a high-paying job for which he was supremely unqualified; as chief financial officer, he could barely dissect a balance sheet. (According to Mr. Fastow's testimony, Mr. Skilling is also the person who signed off on secret side deals ensuring that LJM would not lose money on its transactions with Enron.)

In addition, like many white-collar defendants, he thought that if he fought the charges with everything he had, then maybe — just maybe — he could wangle his way out of trouble. He felt sure that Mr. Kopper would not turn on him. His plan was to tough it out.

Then came the anger. There's no denying that Mr. Fastow was at the center of the Enron scandal. But the fact that he committed obvious crimes also make him an easy scapegoat for everyone else embroiled in the Enron scandal. Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lawyer, told me that "Fastow and Michael Kopper are the two people who brought Enron down and deserve the stiffest sentences." Mr. Skilling has long insisted that had Mr. Fastow not been committing criminal acts behind his back, Enron would be alive today.

But that wasn't remotely true, and no one knew that better than Mr. Fastow. Though he was making millions on the side, his partnerships were critical for Enron. They created a Potemkin village that made everybody at Enron rich, as the stock rose and their stock options became worth millions. In Mr. Fastow's view, all the Enron executives owed their wealth to him.

Mr. Fastow bitterly resented being the scapegoat. He told people that he had tried to explain to Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay how bad things were, and that they knew much more about Enron's problems than they were letting on.

In August 2002, Mr. Fastow's chief ally, Mr. Kopper, became the first former Enron executive to plead guilty and agree to cooperate with the government. If anything should have caused Mr. Fastow to realize that the jig was up, that was it; virtually everything Mr. Kopper pleaded to involved Mr. Fastow. And yet, for the next year and a half, he continued to resist.

Meanwhile, a frustrated prosecution was homing in on his wife, Lea Fastow, for filing a false income tax return — a charge also related to the Enron scandal. It is hard to know what happened next. Mr. Fastow's supporters say that Mr. Fastow tried desperately to cut a deal that would allow her to remain unindicted. People in the prosecution insist that it was only after her indictment in March 2003 that Mr. Fastow finally realized, however grudgingly, that he had to start cooperating. Ultimately, under a joint plea agreement, Ms. Fastow served a year in jail — and Mr. Fastow agreed to a 10-year-sentence in return for his cooperation.

Even then, though, he didn't come willingly. In the beginning, said Mr. Hueston, the prosecutor who spent the most time with Mr. Fastow, "I saw a bitter, distant arrogant man who showed virtually no remorse." Sometimes Mr. Hueston would be asking him a question, and he would say, "I'm bored and I'm tired."

But over time, that began to change. "You wake up and look at yourself in the mirror, and say, 'I'm a convicted felon,' " said Craig Smyser, one of Mr. Fastow's Houston lawyers. "It is extremely difficult, but it can give you a kind of strength."

Mr. Hueston said that at first Mr. Fastow would become extremely angry whenever his wife's plea agreement came up, but he eventually accepted the fact that "his wrong decisions had dragged his wife into the case." (During the trial, Mr. Fastow testified that he had lied to his wife about the source of the money that was central to the tax return case — and that is why she had filed a false return.)

Mr. Hueston also said that the prosecution "had begun to conclude that if he didn't change he would make a terrible witness at trial."

"But," Mr. Hueston added, "over the course of the two years, he made a remarkable change." Mr. Fastow accepted responsibility for what he did. He acknowledged his crimes. He stopped rationalizing his behavior at Enron. He had reached the final stage: surrender.

Mr. Fastow turned out, of course, to be a terrific witness in the Enron trial. In his opening statement, Mr. Petrocelli had said that he would "destroy" Mr. Fastow's testimony, but that never happened. Mr. Fastow's contrition, remorse and acceptance of his wrongdoing trumped Mr. Petrocelli's every effort to cast him as the ultimate Enron villain. "He had the strength of a humbled man," Mr. Smyser said.

Mr. Petrocelli said that after the verdict at least one juror said that no one had paid any attention to Mr. Fastow's testimony. But even if that's true — and I have my doubts — Mr. Fastow's cooperation was critical in giving the government the deep understanding it gained of how Enron became a house of cards — and the role of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay in perpetuating the Enron fraud.

Which still poses the question: did Mr. Fastow deserve a 40 percent reduction in his sentence? Although he didn't say so directly — either in court or in our conversation — it seems clear that Mr. Hueston believed the reduced sentence was deserved.

But there are many people in Houston who are outraged. When Loren Steffy, a columnist at The Houston Chronicle, wrote a sympathetic article about Mr. Fastow's sentencing, he was bombarded with reader complaints. "What a travesty!" wrote one.

Others pointed to the notorious case of James Olis, a mid-level Dynegy executive who was originally sentenced to 24 years in prison for his role in one deal — one deal! — that tried to make a $300 million loan look like cash flow. Recently, his sentence was reduced to six years — that is, the same as Mr. Fastow's, who was involved in dozens of such deals, on a much broader scale, with a more much devastating outcome.

It is good that the judicial system has become tougher on white-collar crime. It's overdue, actually. When Mr. Skilling is sentenced next month, he is likely to be facing 20 to 30 years in prison. Bernard J. Ebbers, the 65-year-old former WorldCom chief executive, began serving a 25-year sentence this week.

Mr. Fastow gave the government incalculable assistance, and does indeed seem to be a changed man. Give him credit for both. But it took him a very long time to get to that place.

In the end, he did the crime. And he should have served the time — all 10 years.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Report Says Rove Aide Accepted Abramoff Gifts (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi And Susan Schmidt, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

A top aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove passed along inside White House information to superlobbyist Jack Abramoff at a time when she was also accepting his tickets to nine sports and entertainment events, according to e-mails released yesterday in a bipartisan congressional report.

DOJ_NMG_0072029

The e-mails, released by the House Government Reform Committee, show that Susan Ralston also on occasion discussed possible business ventures with Abramoff. Ralston had worked for Abramoff before joining Rove in the White House in 2001.

White House contacts with Abramoff have been the focus of heated interest in Washington since he pleaded guilty to fraud and conspiracy charges earlier this year. Although the committee report documents that Abramoff's lobbying team billed their clients for more than 400 contacts with White House officials over three years, it remains unclear what results Abramoff obtained.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) seized on the report yesterday: "A disgraced lobbyist traded perks and campaign contributions for special access to the Bush White House."

But White House press secretary Tony Snow disagreed.

"Jack Abramoff was an exuberant practitioner of sleaze to the point that it's very difficult within the report itself to figure out how many actual contacts there are," Snow said.

The report identified 66 Abramoff contacts with the White House, more than half of them with Ralston. Members of Abramoff's lobbying team at Greenberg Traurig LLP contacted Ralston 69 times.

Ralston has declined to comment on the report.

The report indicates that Abramoff was largely ineffective at placing people in key positions in the administration, apparently failing to win any of the appointments he sought.

When Ralston came through for Abramoff, it often was in relatively minor ways. On Oct. 21, 2001, Ralston e-mailed Abramoff that Rove had read an Abramoff memo about a political endorsement in an obscure race in the Mariana Islands. Ralston reported back to Abramoff that Rove had agreed, writing in an e-mail the next day: "You win :)"

Ralston also informed the Abramoff team about possible political appointees. But there is no evidence that Rove knew or approved of Ralston's actions.

She told Abramoff and his associates that she passed messages and documents to Rove, but the committee report did not confirm that she had done so. On Feb. 21, 2001, Ralston e-mailed Abramoff lobbyist Todd A. Boulanger: "Thanks for breakfast. I showed KR the binder. . . . He gave the binder to Mehlman to read cover to cover and to be prepared." Ken Mehlman was then the White House political director.

Mehlman, now the chairman of the Republican National Committee, said yesterday that he talked on occasion with members of the Abramoff team but does not specifically recall the issues raised. "When they come to me with ideas and issues, I would let relevant policymakers know," he said. "The job of the political director is to meet with interested parties."

Mehlman said everything he engaged in "was aboveboard, all stuff that was appropriate."

Ralston also helped Rove get tickets from Abramoff for a game in the NCAA basketball tournament, but Ralston told Abramoff that he "has to pay." The White House confirmed yesterday that Rove paid for the tickets.

But Ralston apparently did not pay for tickets she accepted to MCI Center events -- including two concerts featuring rocker Bruce Springsteen and singer Andrea Bocelli, three Capitals hockey games and a Wizards basketball game -- and seats at a Baltimore Orioles baseball game at Camden Yards.

On seven occasions, Ralston requested tickets, the report said. "You got 'em," Abramoff e-mailed Ralston when she asked in December 2001 for four prime Wizards tickets valued at $1,300, the report said.

In 2004, Ralston e-mailed Abramoff that she was "willing to pay" for Capitals tickets, but he replied, "No problem, and you don't have to pay!" In 2003, she thanked him for his "generosity" in providing Orioles tickets.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the counsel's office is examining the report to determine whether ethics regulations were violated. Rules prohibit the acceptance of gifts worth more than $20 from anyone doing business with the government.

Ralston and Abramoff also discussed future business plans at least twice, the report said.

In February 2002, Ralston, Abramoff and Ben Waldman, an Abramoff business partner in his fraudulent purchase of a casino cruise line in Florida, exchanged e-mails about an aircraft leasing venture. In November 2002, Ralston and Abramoff exchanged e-mails about an idea to form a defense or homeland security contracting company.

Ralston expressed interest but said she thought it would take a lot of research to get the company off the ground. But she was committed to the White House, she said. "It would take a serious amount of money for me to be lured away so unless you're really serious and can make it worth my while, let's wait until 2005." Abramoff agreed, writing, "I am not in a position to offer you serious money for this right now."

Too Close For Comfort In The Abramoff Scandal (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, September 30, 2006

Speed Read: The White House has tried hard to distance itself from the congressional lobbying scandal. But a new report suggests that Jack Abramoff wasn't always exaggerating his contacts with the Bush Administration

Disgraced Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff used to be a problem for the White House primarily because his illegal lobbying activities got G.O.P. members of Congress in legal and political hot water and helped fuel Democrats' campaign message that congressional Republicans were a corrupt bunch that should be thrown out of power. Both Ohio Rep. Bob Ney and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas announced they were stepping down from Congress this year after being dogged by questions about their relationships with the disgraced lobbyist, who has plead guilty to mail fraud and bribery; Ney has already pleaded guilty to bribery charges, while DeLay has continued to insist he did nothing wrong. But a bipartisan report by the House Committee on Government Reform released Thursday puts the White House at the center of questions about whether the lobbyist improperly influenced its decisions on policy matters, just as he did on Capitol Hill. Here's what we learned from the report report on Abramoff's contacts with the White House:

1. Abramoff had much more extensive contact with the White House than it has admitted in the past.

In January, after he was indicted and there were rumors —which turned out to be correct—that Abramoff was in several photos at the White House, Bush said at a news conference, "I, frankly, don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy... I don't know him." At the time, White House officials also suggested that Abramoff had little influence or contact with them. The report cites more than 400 instances of Abramoff's team lobbying the White House. This is a one-sided account though, as it relies on e-mails from Abramoff and his fellow lobbyists; in many instances he discusses meals with White House senior advisers like Karl Rove, and it' s unclear if those ever actually took place. The White House has long maintained that Abramoff has exaggerated his ties and contacts to the Bush Administration.

But the report makes clear that Abramoff was in frequent communication with White House officials, particularly Susan Ralston, who was an assistant to Abramoff before becoming Rove's assistant early in Bush's first term. Abramoff's clients, mainly Indian tribes, paid for skyboxes and tickets to events that the lobbyist used to host congressional aides and others, and in the e-mails, Ralston treats Abramoff like her own personal Ticketmaster, frequently asking him if he has tickets to games and leaving the impression in some messages that she occasionally didn't pay for them. White House officials are banned from taking gifts of more than $20, which would barely get you a cheap seat at any of these events, let alone a luxury box seat. Other Rove aides were shown to be in e-mail contact with lobbyists on Abramoff's staff, and Rove himself e-mailed Abramoff a few days before the 2000 elections, responding to a message from Abramoff noting that "Governor Bush is winning" by saying "Jack - I will rest much easier..." Abramoff relied on Ralston, who remains in the White House as an aide to Rove, and Ralph Reed, an advisor to the 2004 campaign who was close to Rove, to communicate his wishes.

To be sure, the messages make it clear Abramoff desperately wanted to have more personal time with Rove, and couldn't get it, often having his calls returned by Rove aides rather than the powerful aide himself. In Dec. 2000, he sent a message trying to ingratiate himself with Rove, noting "I am sure you well covered with everything, but just in case, please do not hesitate to ask me for anything you might need." Sounding like a high school nerd with a crush on the captain of the cheerleading team, he brags about and overstates his few actual interactions with Rove. A March 2002 e-mail says "I was sitting yesterday with Karl Rove, Bush's top adviser, at the NCAA basketball game discussing Israel when this e-mail came in. I showed it to him." And White House officials dispute this account, saying Rove didn't sit with Abramoff at the game but merely stopped by and said hello to him. Ralston seemed to know Abramoff needed the affection, writing in a message with the subject line "Diet" that "Karl said you looked great. He'd love to know your secret."

2. The access didn't get him much.

Abramoff was looking to fund projects for his Indian clients, so he focused most of his energy in the right place, on Capitol Hill and in the agencies like the Department of the Interior that dole out federal dollars and oversee them much closer than the White House. But his efforts to get his friends hired in key administration posts, such as chief of staff to Secretary of the Interior Gail Norton, were largely unsuccessful. His biggest coup was getting the White House to back some candidates he liked and at one point to deny support to someone he opposed, but those races were in Guam and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands. Abramoff got nothing like the results he had on Capitol Hill, where Ney inserted comments in the Congressional Record attacking one of Abramoff's business rivals and other members inserted money into billls for tribal schools and other pet projects.

3. There is someone in Washington who has ethical standards.

The most angry exchange in the hundreds of e-mails isn't about Abramoff's clients not getting what they want from the White House. In 2003, administration officials had an ethics advisor talk to the Intergovernmental Affairs Office at the White House, which usually dealt with the tribes and their lobbyist, Abramoff. The advisor suggested that the White House officials should talk to the tribes directly, rather than the lobbyists, and that the lobbyists shouldn't even be in the room during these meetings. Abramoff's deputies were furious. And Abramoff knew these strict standards, which it doesn't appear were enforced, would endanger his job security. "This is horrible," he wrote." Why would they f--- us like this?"

Judge May Have Stymied Abramoff Probe (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

The bribery investigation involving influence-peddler Jack Abramoff may have been stymied by a federal judge in Florida just as prosecutors began asking questions about the lobbyist's ties to the White House.

U.S. District Judge Paul Huck refused to delay Abramoff's prison sentence for fraud charges Thursday, rejecting a plea by the Justice Department's top corruption prosecutor, who said Abramoff was providing information about officials whose names hadn't yet surfaced in the case.

In the past month, the FBI has been pursuing leads about Abramoff's access to the White House and whether he was able to help lawmakers get Bush administration backing for their bills, according to someone familiar with the direction of the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity because of its secrecy.

A congressional report released Friday showed that Abramoff had hundreds of contacts with White House officials over three years, including 10 with top Bush aide Karl Rove. While Abramoff provided officials with meals or tickets to sporting events, the report said his efforts to influence presidential appointments and nominations "were often not successful."

During Thursday's court hearing in Miami, Ed Nucci, acting chief of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, did not mention any targets of the Abramoff case. He told the judge, however, that with the disgraced former lobbyist behind bars, "what we need from Mr. Abramoff will be impossible to get."

Huck ordered Abramoff to report for his nearly six-year prison sentence Nov. 15. Justice Department officials had asked for at least an extra month and could have returned to court then for another extension.

"There are so many areas that have to be explored and so many pockets," Nucci said during Thursday's hearing.

Huck, who was appointed to the bench by President Clinton, said Abramoff should not receive special treatment. Abramoff pleaded guilty in Florida to concocting a fake wire transfer to buy an offshore gambling fleet.

"My main concern is, there comes a time when people have to pay the piper, so to speak. I think that time has come," Huck said.

Abramoff pleaded in the Florida case on Jan. 3. Hours later, he flew to Washington to plead guilty to bribing members of Congress.

Since then, Abramoff and others have provided information that helped prosecutors win guilty pleas from Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and several congressional aides. In recent weeks, discussion has also turned to the White House.

The Justice Department had no comment Friday evening about how it would continue debriefing Abramoff on the newly shortened timeline.

Officials also declined to say whether they would ask Huck to reconsider his ruling. Prosecutors had told Huck they would be willing to file sealed documents describing Abramoff's help, but as of Friday evening they had not.

Prosecutors have already won guilty pleas from Abramoff, Ney's former chief of staff and two aides to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. Former Bush White House official David Safavian was found guilty in June of covering up his dealings with Abramoff while in the General Services Administration.

Abramoff and the House aides are cooperating in the bribery investigations.

Others under scrutiny who have not been charged and maintain their innocence include DeLay and Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., who received about $150,000 in donations from Abramoff and his associates and whose aides traveled on the lobbyist's jet to the 2001 Super Bowl.

Rep. John Doolittle, R-Calif., also used Abramoff's luxury sports box for a fundraiser without initially reporting it. Doolittle's wife and one of his former aides worked for Abramoff.

Steven Griles, a former deputy Interior Department secretary, is also under scrutiny, as is Italia Federici, former Interior Secretary Gale Norton's political fundraiser.

Pirro Beauty To Be Quizzed (NYDN)

By Greg Wilson, Greg B. Smith And Kathleen Lucadamo

New York Daily News, September 30, 2006

The pretty housewife Jeanine Pirro feared was having a fling with her philandering husband will be subpoenaed by federal prosecutors, the Daily News has learned - yet the stunner's spouse insisted yesterday that "nothing happened."

"I know my wife. We've been married 13 years, and I have the utmost confidence that nothing went wrong, nothing happened here," Michael Santangelo said outside his house in Westchester.

His wife, Lisa Santangelo, a raven-haired beauty who is 20 years younger than Jeanine Pirro, was a "good friend to him [Albert Pirro], there is no question," admitted her husband, who represented Albert Pirro at his federal tax evasion trial.

After Pirro was convicted, both Santangelos visited him while he served his 11-month sentence in a federal prison in Florida.

When asked if he ever worried his wife's friendship with Albert had flowered into an affair, Santangelo said no way.

"I'm more certain of that than I am of my clients' innocence when I defend a case. I stand by her 100%," he said before leaving his Harrison property with a friend in a black Cadillac Escalade.

His wife was not available for comment yesterday. Santangelo said she and their two kids have fled the home until the Pirro frenzy calms down.

Federal prosecutors plan to call Santangelo's 35-year-old wife as a witness in their eavesdropping investigation, The News has learned.

She has been notified that she will be asked to testify before a sitting grand jury, said a source familiar with the matter.

Anthony Mangone, an attorney representing the Santangelos, said, "If a grand jury is convened, we're going to cooperate."

Pirro apparently suspected that her husband was having an affair with Lisa Santangelo and contacted ex-NYPD Commissioner Bernard Kerik last summer to have the family boat bugged and Albert Pirro tailed.

The wiretapping never happened, she claims, and the surveillance was a bust. But federal prosecutors deemed Pirro's conversation - which they found out about because Bronx prosecutors were taping Kerik as part of a different probe - compelling enough to launch an eavesdropping investigation.

A grand jury already has subpoenaed a former investigator who worked for a subsidiary of Giuliani Partners.

Sources say Kerik used several Giuliani Partners investigators to follow Pirro's husband, Albert, hoping to catch him with Santangelo.

Sources said federal investigators are looking for evidence that goes beyond Jeanine Pirro and Kerik merely talking about planting a bug in the Pirro family boat.

One source said prosecutors were checking if Pirro and Kerik discussed bugging a phone used by Albert Pirro to capture his conversations with Santangelo.

Prosecutors are interested in Lisa Santangelo because she can say she did not consent to being recorded - bolstering the case that Pirro sought to make illegal secret recordings.

Kerik's lawyer, Joseph Tacopina, said the investigation began because of a mistaken interpretation of remarks made on tape.

Pressed by Pirro, then the Westchester County district attorney, Kerik agrees to look into the feasibility of planting such a device, but later is heard disparaging the idea.

Subsequently Kerik was heard on tape asking a Giuliani investigator, "Are you guys done?" The investigator replied yes.

On a request to continue the wiretap of Kerik, the Bronx district attorney wrote to the judge, "It appears from this conversation that the eavesdropping device was actually placed on the boat."

However, sources say the investigator was talking about another matter, and that the Giuliani Partners investigators working for Kerik balked at installing the bug because the boat was registered under the name of Albert Pirro - not his wife.

In July, believing the bug had been planted, Bronx prosecutors turned the Pirro/Kerik conversations over to Westchester District Attorney Janet DiFiore. She then contacted the FBI.

The bureau opened its probe shortly after Kerik pleaded guilty to misdemeanors in the Bronx.

"I know that the Bronx DA was operating under a misimpression that there was a completed act when there wasn't," said Tacopina. "I think this misimpression carried over to whatever agency initiated this investigation."

Jeanine Pirro is demanding U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales investigate how the information was leaked to the press. She also urged him to remove Assistant U.S. Attorney Elliott Jacobson, who investigated her husband for tax fraud, from the current case.

Asked yesterday if Lisa Santangelo was a friend of hers, Jeanine Pirro acknowledged for the first time that she was.

"Yea, yea, definitely," Pirro said during a taping of WABC-TV's "Up Close with Diana Williams," which airs Sunday at 11 a.m. "But that's all personal, and I am not going to go into it."

Pirro also conceded she had "several conversations" with former NYPD top cop Bernard Kerik about bugging her husband's boat in the summer of 2005 - at a time when she knew Kerik was under investigation for taking gifts he didn't disclose.

"You know, that was all a matter of public record," she said of Kerik's legal troubles. "But Bernie was a friend."

Pirro Says "Other Woman" Pictures Not For Public Eye (NSDY)

By John Riley

Long Island Newsday, September 30, 2006

For everyone else, the pictures of the "other woman" in Albert Pirro's life that graced New York City's tabloid covers Friday were the talk of the town. But not for his wife Jeanine, or so she said.

"I have no reaction," the embattled attorney general candidate asserted during a Channel 4 news showtaping Friday. "... This salacious stuff that we see on the front pages of the newspapers is just that. It doesn't belong in the public eye, it doesn't belong in federal offices. It is, you know, just fodder for people to talk about."

It certainly was.

Two days after Pirro admitted she had tried to get former New York City police commissioner Bernard Kerik to bug the family boat in 2005, sources familiar with the situation confirmed that she suspected he was having an affair with Lisa Santangelo, the wife of Al Pirro's lawyer and a mother of two.

Michael Santangelo, one of Pirro's defense lawyers when the one-time GOP power broker was convicted of tax fraud in 2000, told reporters in the driveway outside his Harrison mansion that he and his wife were longtime friends of the Pirros. But he said the relationship between his 35-year-old wife and Albert Pirro, 59, never went beyond friendship.

"People are friends, people have relationships, and people may look at the relationships as something other than they are," Santangelo, 59, said. "If you people had any evidence of it, you'd be publishing it. You wouldn't just be saying this innuendo. I know my wife. We're married 13 years and I have the utmost confidence that nothing went wrong. Nothing happened here."

Santangelo, in broadcast remarks, said his wife couldn't talk to reporters because of the ongoing FBI probe of whether Jeanine Pirro's bugging plan violated federal law. But he insisted that despite the unwanted publicity, the couple didn't hold it against Pirro, 55.

"I'm not angry at Jeanine Pirro at all," he said. "Jeanine Pirro is the subject of an investigation. She's a friend of mine. Whatever happens, happens. We'll cooperate in any way we can."

As the suburban soap opera played itself out, Pirro, the former Westchester County district attorney, got some mixed but sobering early returns on her effort to put her campaign against Democrat Andrew Cuomo back on track.

A Marist College poll -- the first since leaked wiretaps from her conversations with Kerik forced Pirro on Wednesday to admit that she was a target of a federal investigation -- said she trailed Cuomo 54-31 percent.That's the same margin as a Marist poll from early this month, but suggests the scandal has stripped away any gains from a costly ad campaign she has been running.

In the poll, 72 percent of voters had heard about the bugging questions. A majority rejected her claims that the probe focuses on private matters that are none of the public's business, while 42 percent thought she acted unethically and 11 percent thought she acted illegally. Sixty-one percent said they were not troubled by what she did.

"The good news is that a lot of people are not terribly troubled by this, and most don't think she broke the law," said pollster Lee Miringoff. "But the bad news is that her argument that this is a private concern is not convincing people. And talk about being off-message!"

In addition to taping Gabe Pressman's Sunday news show Friday, Pirro attended a fundraiser and campaigned in upstate Olean.

She has tried to take the political offensive by claiming -- contrary to most legal experts -- that it is legal to secretly eavesdrop on a spouse. She has also alleged that leaks about her are politically motivated, and asked the Justice Department for a fast-track investigation to clear her before election day. She made that request in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez released to the media Thursday. But in Washington Friday, a Justice Department spokesman had no comment.

"We still haven't received anything formal," said spokesman Bryan Sierra.

Experts Question Pirro's Legal Take On Taping (WINS Radio)

1010WINS, September 30, 2006

NEW YORK (1010 WINS) -- Republican attorney general candidate Jeanine Pirro would have violated federal wiretapping laws if she had carried out her plan to secretly tape her husband's conversations on a family boat, some legal experts said Friday.

The former Westchester County district attorney has said that the eavesdropping she considered was legal under established federal case law.

But some legal experts argue Pirro is wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0072034

"You can't tape record your spouse's conversations without his permission," said New York City matrimonial lawyer Alton Abramowitz. "It strikes me that Jeanine Pirro, a former district attorney, should know the law on wiretapping and tape recording conversations to which she is not a party. I'm sure she must have approved hundreds, if not thousands, of wiretaps while in office."

New York defense attorney John Pollok agreed.

"The statute specifically does not have a marital exemption," he said "The FBI should have better things to do than become involved in familial problems, but the statute is very clear."

Pirro, however, maintains she wouldn't have violated any law if she taped her husband Albert, a lobbyist and real estate developer who she suspected was having an affair. Paul Shechtman, her lawyer and chairman of the state Ethics Commission, backed Pirro's interpretation of three previous cases in which judges have ruled the taping of one spouse by another did not violate the federal wiretapping law.

Pirro has also said her plan — caught by authorities on a wiretap targeting disgraced former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik — shouldn't be a public concern.

"This is a personal marital situation that has no business in the United States Attorney's office," she said on Fox News Thursday night. "This is a scenario where I said that I wanted to do certain things that I never did and even if I did do them, they weren't improper in any event."

Most New York voters disagree, according to a poll released Friday.

The WNBC/Marist poll found 53 percent of those who had heard of the scandal said Pirro acted unethically or illegally. Thirty percent felt she did nothing wrong. The poll found 72 percent of registered voters heard or read about the investigation.

Pirro spokesman John Gallagher did not immediately return calls for comment Friday.

Pirro has asked U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez for a special prosecutor to find the leak of the investigative records that forced her to acknowledge Wednesday that she planned electronic and other surveillance of her husband.

Alex Bunin, the federal public defender for the Northern District of New York, said the leak of the information appears to be a violation of the federal wiretapping law, but noted the statute doesn't include any criminal penalties for leaking. It does include the possibility of disciplinary action by an agency or civil penalties.

The statute allows law enforcement agencies to freely share wiretap evidence and offers numerous ways for an official charged with breaking the law to avoid facing legal action.

"If an officer who legitimately had access to those wiretap transcripts went over to The New York Times and just handed them to the paper, yes they are probably in violation of the law and the court's orders, but there doesn't seem to be any criminal penalty for doing that," Bunin said. "I don't see an investigation going very far."

Albert Pirro has been a source of controversy throughout his wife's public life. He was convicted of tax fraud in 2000 and served 11 months in federal prison and embarrassed her by fathering an illegitimate daughter after they were married.

Pirro faces Democrat Andrew Cuomo, a former federal housing secretary and the eldest son of former Gov. Mario Cuomo, in the November election.

Experts Say Leak Is Not Criminal (NYJN)

By JORGE FITZ-GIBBON

New York Journal News, September 29, 2006

Any information leaked from a federal investigation into former Westchester District Attorney Jeanine Pirro should concern the Justice Department — but not as a criminal matter, legal experts said yesterday.

While Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez might want to know if federal investigations are being compromised by leaks from within, it is unlikely that release of any information from an investigation into Pirro would constitute a crime, the experts said.

"From a practical standpoint, from an administrative standpoint, from an internal standpoint, if I had someone working in my office who was leaking information concerning ongoing investigations, that would be a firing offense," said former federal prosecutor William Aronwald, now a practicing attorney in White Plains.

"It would be a violation of the internal agency rules of the department," said Aronwald, a frequent Pirro critic. "But it doesn't mean it's a violation of any criminal statute."

Pirro, who is running for state attorney general, maintained this week that investigators at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Manhattan were politically motivated in releasing transcripts in which she urged former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik to wiretap her husband's boat last year because she suspected he was having an affair.

The conversations, which surfaced as part of an unrelated corruption case against Kerik, are part of a local probe.

Yesterday, Pirro urged that Gonzalez appoint a special prosecutor to investigate her allegations of a leak and that Assistant U.S. Attorney Elliot Jacobson be removed from the case because, she asserts, he has a gripe against her family. Jacobson was among the federal prosecutors who won a tax evasion conviction against Pirro's husband, lobbyist Al Pirro.

Jeanine Pirro's taped phone conversations with Kerik were first reported Wednesday by WNBC-TV, and she angrily lashed out in a news conference later in the day.

But experts said any leak in the investigation would probably not be a crime, unless it violated federal wiretap laws or a release of grand jury evidence, and then only by citizens serving on the grand jury, court personnel or attorneys involved in the case.

"It's complicated by who had the data, who had the (transcribed) conversations, and how they came to get them," said defense attorney David L. Lewis. "The Justice Department should want to know the answer because it jeopardizes their ability to conduct their business. So her demand for an investigation, while perhaps for her own political and personal purposes, has a dual value to the Justice Department.

"Whether it's a criminal matter or not depends on so many different things," Lewis said. "But if someone was handed those tapes as part of discovery and there was no limiting court order ... then they're in the public domain."

Herb Haddad, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Manhattan, would not comment yesterday on whether a grand jury had been convened in the Pirro probe. Haddad would not discuss details of the investigation.

"It's not a crime to leak information concerning an investigation," Aronwald said. "It's only a crime to leak information concerning things that are before a grand jury. So, basically, it may be a violation of some administrative regulation or some internal regulation."

Imprisoned Democrat Aided A Researcher For Kean Campaign (NSL)

By Jeff Whelan And Josh Margolin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), September 30, 2006

Janiszewski offered a list to derail Menendez

A researcher working for Republican Tom Kean Jr.'s campaign became pen pals with a jailed Democratic political boss in an effort to dig up damaging information on Kean's opponent, U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez.

Former Hudson County Executive Robert Janiszewski, now serving time in a federal prison in Kentucky on corruption charges, offered political history and strategic advice to the Kean campaign in a chatty, friendly letter obtained by The Star-Ledger.

"Political intrigue is ... well ... intriguing," Janiszewski writes in the opening, summing up the unlikely alliance between himself and an agent for a Republican campaign. The letter, dated June 11, suggests an ongoing, secret correspondence.

"By the way, don't worry about the stamps -- the (Bureau of Prisons) rules prevent you from sending stamps anyway. And, I assure you that no one else is aware of our correspondence. You can imagine the position I would be in with a U.S. Senator breathing down my back -- I am a federal prisoner, after all," Janiszewski wrote.

Janiszewski, a sometime-ally, sometime-rival of Menendez's in Hudson County, offered a long list of local politicians who hold grudges against the senator and may be able to provide damaging information about him.

One of those people mentioned by Janiszewski -- Oscar Sandoval, a Union City psychiatrist and former FBI informant who helped land Janiszewski in prison -- rocked the U.S. Senate campaign this week by disclosing a secret recording he had made of Menendez's closest adviser.

"So ... Sandoval ... what a trip," Janiszewski wrote. "My read is that Sandoval cannot be trusted because he likely has several agendas to satisfy -- all having to do with advantaging himself -- so, be careful + seek proof. If he has it, then full speed ahead."

Sandoval, in an interview earlier this week, said the Kean researcher, Chris Lyon, approached him earlier this year. But Sandoval said he declined Lyon's request for an interview and that his public release of the tape was in no way connected to the Kean campaign.

Jill Hazelbaker, Kean's campaign spokeswoman, sought to downplay the significance of the letter. She said Kean was not aware of the correspondence and noted that Lyon is not on the campaign payroll. He is a subcontractor for Kean's chief political consultant, Matt Leonardo.

"Are you going to tell me that the Menendez campaign doesn't have a research operation? Let's get serious. This is nonsense," she said.

Asked if Lyon's reaching out to Janiszewski was appropriate, she said, "The campaign has heard from countless people who have firsthand experience of Bob Menendez's control over one of the most corrupt political organizations in New Jersey."

A 'SMEAR CAMPAIGN' The Menendez campaign, which has been reeling from this week's release of the recordings and a federal investigation of the senator's rental property, seized on the letter and called it evidence of a "smear campaign" by Kean.

"He's been working with disgraced felons like Bob Janiszewski and crooks like Oscar Sandoval since the beginning of this campaign to dig up sleaze and make up lies and now he's been caught red-handed," said Matt Miller, spokesman for the Menendez campaign.

Hazelbaker reiterated earlier denials that there was no collusion between Sandoval and the campaign.

"The notion that the Kean campaign was somehow involved in this story is absurd. The facts of this matter are very, very clear. There is a tape and the contents of that tape are indisputable," she said.

Kean has made ethics the cornerstone of his campaign and sought at every opportunity to highlight the fact that Menendez comes from Hudson County, a place legendary for its bareknuckled politics and history of corrupt public officials.

The most famous of those in recent years is Janiszewski, the former county executive who was caught in an FBI sting taking a bribe from Sandoval in 2000. He then cooperated with authorities to help nab others.

Janiszewski spent a year in hiding before emerging to plead guilty to extorting hundreds of thousands of dollars in exchange for his political influence. He testified that he took so many bribes that a filing cabinet in his home overflowed with cash stuffed envelopes.

He hasn't made any public statements since he was sent to prison, from which he is due to be released in April 2008.

In his letter, the jailed politician thanks Lyon for sending him court records regarding the lawsuit Sandoval filed earlier this year alleging he was a victim of extortion and racketeering by Menendez's closest adviser, Donald Scarinci, and other Hudson County political leaders. He flags Lyon to other records in the case, and suggests he take a look at them.

ADVICE FOR NEW PALS Janiszewski, a former Democratic powerbroker once considered one of the shrewdest political tacticians in the state, also offers general strategy for his new Republican friends.

"DO NOT -- I repeat -- DO NOT let Kean get trapped into the Bush/Cheney dragdown ... or some ridiculous votes in the NJ Legislature on his otherwise moderate record," Janiszewski wrote.

But most of the letter concerns itself with the Byzantine world of Hudson County politics. He talks about how he approached Menendez and encouraged him to run for Assembly on his ticket in 1987, but the relationship turned sour by the time Janiszewski considered running for governor in 1997.

"Menendez discerned that he couldn't control me. So in the 99 primary, he + Scarinci tried to generate opposition to my re-election. Typical, they tried to do this behind my back + got caught," he wrote. "I chose not to accuse Menendez. Within 90 days, I was the target of another FBI investigation."

Janiszewski, who as a cooperating witness worked closely with the FBI, goes on to suggest federal prosecutors have long had Scarinci and Menendez in their sights.

"I have no idea on how they enrich themselves, but I do know the feds have an interest -- just don't know why," he wrote.

Janiszewski's attorney, William Maderer, said he has not been in contact with the former Hudson County executive in the last year, so he could not comment.

Calls to the home of Janiszewski's wife, Beth, were not returned.

Lyon, who declined to comment on the letter, works in a field crucial to political campaigns, but one that rarely bubbles up into public view.

SKILLED RESEARCHER He has a reputation as a highly skilled and devastatingly effective researcher and has worked for political heavyweights such as U.S. Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

In previous elections, Lyon also dug into the backgrounds of former acting Gov. Donald DiFrancesco and former U.S. Sen. Robert Torricelli, both of whom dropped out of their respective campaigns amid scandals.

Lyon left former Jersey City Mayor Bret Schundler's 2001 gubernatorial campaign after he was accused by the New Hampshire attorney general of orchestrating a "dirty tricks" campaign. He was accused of using anonymous postcards and telephone calls against a rival candidate.

GOP Chief Wants Probe Of Sen. Menendez's Political Ties (APP)

By GREGORY J. VOLPE, GANNETT STATE BUREAU

Asbury Park Press, September 30, 2006

TRENTON — State Republicans called Friday for the attorney general to investigate the dealings of U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez, D-N.J., and his close political ally who was secretly recorded using Menendez's name to pressure a Hudson County psychiatrist to hire a doctor.

Though Menendez said this week his friend Donald Scarinci was not authorized to use his name in 1999 when he tried to pressure psychiatrist Oscar Sandoval to hire a doctor through a contract he had with Hudson County, New Jersey Republican

State Committee Chairman Tom Wilson questioned why Menendez waited until the story garnered large media attention before severing campaign ties with Scarinci. The recordings by an FBI informant were acknowledged in court filings and published reports in the spring.

"Mr. Menendez knew all of this six months ago, and the man who calls himself a reformer, who takes on corruption and stands up to do the right thing no matter what, did nothing at that time," Wilson said. "He did nothing until yesterday when this story threatened to end his already faltering campaign."

Menendez spokesman Matt Miller said while the existence of the tapes were reported in March, the actual recordings were not released until this week.

"That's a big difference," Miller said.

The spokesman called the request for an investigation another sleaze tactic by the campaign for Menendez's opponent, state Sen. Thomas H. Kean Jr., R-Union.

"Yesterday, Tom Kean Jr. rolled out his first sleazy attack dog, and today came the second one," Miller said. "Whether it's a crook like Oscar Sandoval, or a discredited hack like Tom Wilson, Tom Kean Jr. keeps running the gutter campaign because he has no credibility on the issues."

While the Kean campaign has made ethics a cornerstone of the campaign discourse, it maintains that it had no involvement with Sandoval releasing the recording. Sandoval has said the release was not campaign-related.

A spokesman for Attorney General Stuart Rabner, who was confirmed last week amid hopes he'll focus on corruption in New Jersey, declined comment. Scarinci did not return phone calls Friday.

Scarinci is the founding partner of Scarinci & Hollenbeck LLC, a Lyndhurst-based law firm with offices in Freehold Township and New York City.

One of the firm's clients is Monmouth County. Over the last 18 months, the firm has been paid $439,000 by the county for legal work, according to county billing records. Matthew Giacobbe, a lawyer with Scarinci & Hollenbeck, is Monmouth County's labor attorney.

In 2005, Scarinci contributed $3,800 to Monmouth County Republican candidates or organizations, according to Election Law Enforcement Commission filings. His partner, Kenneth Hollenbeck, also contributed $3,800 to Monmouth GOP candidates or organizations.

Meanwhile, the campaign of Menendez, the first Hispanic to represent New Jersey in the U.S. Senate, also faced allegations Friday that it is racist — against Hispanics.

On Thursday, when trying to discredit Oscar Sandoval, Miller, the Menendez spokesman, told reporters that he is the brother of Jose Sandoval, the Republican running for the 8th District congressional seat held by Rep. William J. Pascrell Jr., D-N.J.

The two are not related.

"I do not know Dr. Oscar Sandoval, and he is not related to me in any way, shape, or form," Jose Sandoval said in a statement. "This is blatant racism on behalf of the Menendez campaign. Just because we both have Hispanic surnames does not mean that we are related."

Added Assemblyman Eric Munoz, R-Union, who represents the same legislative district as Kean: "How dare he (Miller) make such racist assumptions? Just because two Hispanic individuals have the same name that does not mean they are related. Mr. Miller's statements are completely ignorant."

Miller called that "silly."

"I made the same factual mistake that several reporters and others made, nothing more," Miller said.

While Jose Sandoval's lawyers huddled Friday, saying they were exploring whether a defamation of character lawsuit ought to be filed, Munoz demanded an apology from Menendez and removal of Miller from the campaign.

MS-13 Member Convicted In Slaying (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Wilfredo Montoya Baires thought he smelled a rat. Or so he told fellow members of the Mara Salvatrucha street gang.

Actually, prosecutors told the jury at Baires's federal court trial in Alexandria, the 27-year-old gang member wanted to eliminate a rival. So he and three other MS-13 members went to a townhouse in Manassas, where Baires shot Jose Escobar, 22, before another gang member cut his throat.

Baires was convicted Thursday in the August 2004 slaying of Escobar, an MS-13 member who had been "greenlighted," or targeted for death, by the violent gang because of his alleged cooperation with law enforcement, prosecutors said yesterday. As it turned out, prosecutors told the jury, Escobar never did cooperate, and Baires made the accusation as a pretext for murder.

Baires became the 14th MS-13 member convicted in U.S. District Court in Alexandria on murder-related charges since 2002. Federal officials have been cracking down on the gang, considered the largest and most violent in Northern Virginia, by using racketeering statutes once employed against the Mafia. Jurors convicted Baires of murder in aid of racketeering and three other counts. Two other MS-13 members earlier pleaded guilty in Escobar's death.

The two-week trial revealed much about the inner workings of MS-13, which has its roots in El Salvador and Los Angeles, prosecutors said. Government witnesses, including several MS-13 members, testified that the Escobar killing resulted from a power struggle within the gang.

Los Angeles MS-13 members had come to Northern Virginia to impose order on the local gang, which was seen as riven by infighting and infested with cooperators, witnesses told the jury. Baires had allegedly allied himself with the Los Angeles gang members, a tactic that was opposed by Escobar.

The argument led to Baires, who viewed Escobar as a rival, telling fellow gang members that Escobar was a cooperator, according to evidence presented at the trial. The Los Angeles MS-13 members were arrested and were deported or have left Northern Virginia, prosecutors said.

Baires faces a mandatory life prison term when he is sentenced Dec. 15. The two MS-13 members who pleaded to charges related to Escobar's killing -- Wilfredo Lopez-Lopez, 29, and Fredy Escobar, 25 -- face up to 10 years in prison.

"Taking these guys off our streets and putting them in prison for a long, long time is good news for our community," said U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg, who vowed to "make Virginia a very inhospitable place for these violent gangs and their members."

Nina Ginsburg, an attorney for Baires, said she was "disappointed in the verdict because we did not believe this was conduct motivated by his desire to advance himself in the gang. This was an argument that got out of control."

The defense, which presented no witnesses, portrayed the killing as a heat-of-passion crime that Baires was provoked into committing by other gang members. Defense attorneys said Baires did not intend to harm anyone when he went to the townhouse.

Escobar, of Manassas Park, worked for a Loudoun construction company. He was shot about 9:30 p.m. Aug. 11, 2004, and died in surgery at Inova Fairfax Hospital. The killing was one of a series of gang-related homicides that led federal and state officials to pour money and manpower into fighting MS-13, which has been responsible for a series of killings, assaults and other crimes in Northern Virginia.

Charges in the case were initially filed in Prince William County, and state court testimony indicated that MS-13 members had spread throughout the townhouse and blocked the exits to prevent Escobar from escaping. But further investigation showed that the gang members were concentrated in the hallway where Escobar was shot, prosecutors said.

The federal racketeering statute, known as the RICO law, was enacted in 1970 to fight the Mafia but has increasingly been used in recent years against violent gangs.

The first conviction on federal racketeering charges of an MS-13 member in the region came last year in Alexandria, and two MS-13 members charged with racketeering are now on trial in Maryland.

Officials Seize Files In A.C. City Hall (PAC)

By Derek Harper

Press of Atlantic City, September 30, 2006

ATLANTIC CITY -- Mayor Bob Levy said federal and local investigators searched and took files from the city's Department of Neighborhood Services office Friday, as ordered by a federal subpoena.

Levy and other officials pledged complete cooperation with the investigation.

Investigators looked at records from about 9:30 a.m. to 2 p.m., Atlantic City police Chief John Mooney said.

It is unclear what records were sought. City Business Administrator Domenic Cappella said the records include files from 2002 to the present day.

Four computer towers were taken from the city's construction office Friday, workers in that office said.

Other Neighborhood Services Department workers said hard drives were taken from computers used by department Director David Tayoun and two others in his office. Investigators also took hard drives from computers in the mercantile office.

A copy of the subpoena could not be obtained. Michael Drewniak, spokesman for Newark-based U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie, said it came from a grand jury and was therefore confidential.

FBI spokesman Stephen Siegel did not return a call seeking comment.

The Neighborhood Services Department, with a $1.6 million budget, is responsible for enforcing building codes, overseeing construction and issuing mercantile licenses in the resort.

City Councilman Ramon Rosario, who oversees council's Neighborhood Services Committee, did not return repeated calls Friday. Federal officials have said he is under investigation, but the councilman has consistently denied it.

In a prepared statement Friday, Levy seemed to backtrack from an Aug. 30 statement made hours after City Council President Craig Callaway pleaded guilty to accepting $36,000 in bribes from area contractor Terry Jacobs in exchange for construction management positions.

â€œOn Aug. 30, in a press conference held in my office, I referenced that none of my key cabinet members were in any way connected to the issues at hand that day,â€ the statement read. â€œAt the time of the press conference, those statements were true. However, the FBI and Atlantic City Police Department recently informed me of this separate and unrelated investigation involving Neighborhood Services.â€

Tayoun, who remained in City Hall throughout the day, confirmed records had been taken from his department Friday. He referred other questions to City Solicitor Kim Baldwin, who declined comment.

Cappella did not say Tayoun, a retired city police officer, was a target. He said, â€œThe subpoena just asks for records throughout his department.â€

Tayoun helped deliver ultimately unnecessary absentee ballots in Levy's successful 2005 primary election campaign. He is also close socially with Callaway, who lists a Brooklyn Avenue home half-owned by Tayoun as his residence.

Tayoun raised eyebrows in June after City Council approved a lucrative Boardwalk vending machine contract for a company half-owned by Tayoun's wife over the conflict-of-interest concerns of two municipal attorneys. Levy later said he refused to sign the contract, which means it was not awarded.

Tayoun's father is James Tayoun, a former Philadelphia city councilman and restaurateur who pleaded guilty to corruption charges and began a 35-month federal prison term in 1991. While incarcerated, he wrote two books, including a guide for first-time offenders called â€œGoing to Prison?â€ He now edits the Philadelphia Public Record newspaper.

Other officials questioned the potential involvement of the previous director, Thomas Russo, who is in the midst of a re-election campaign for Atlantic County freeholder. He oversaw Neighborhood Services throughout most of former Mayor Lorenzo Langford's administration.

Langford did not return a call seeking comment.

County Democratic Chairman Ron Ruff said Russo should step aside. â€œWhenever the FBI takes records from where you were the director, it has to raise serious questions.â€

â€œWait a minute,â€ Russo said. â€œThat's really stretching things. First of all, I know there's nothing wrong as far as I'm concerned.â€ He also hoped law enforcement would issue a statement clearing officials who are not targets.

County Republican Chair Keith Davis said, â€œIf the voters of Atlantic County want to see the corruption move from Atlantic City to Atlantic County, they ought to vote Democratic. If they want to see it remain clean, they ought to vote for Tom Russo and the rest of the Republican slate this year.â€

Parts of the Neighborhood Services Department have had problems in recent years.

The mercantile office is responsible for licensing and inspecting a wide array of businesses interests in the city, including everything from taxicabs and hot dog stands to higher concerns.

In January 1992, a former hot-dog vendor said he had 60 tape recordings of mercantile inspectors and mercantile office workers accepting bribes.

Three months later, the head of the Mercantile Licensing Office resigned the day after State Police told city officials she and six other mercantile employees had engaged in corrupt activities.

A retired police detective replaced her.

More recently, city police Detective Sgt. Timothy Mooney took over the mercantile office when Levy took office in January. While Mooney declined comment Friday, in March he told a roomful of taxicab drivers â€œthe integrity issues have been addressed.â€

Judge Concludes Hearings On Lethal Injection (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein And Maura Dolan

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

SAN JOSE — The most detailed hearing ever held on lethal injection in California concluded Friday with a judge exploring a new drug protocol that could prolong condemned individuals' deaths but also reduce the risk of an inmate experiencing excruciating pain.

The current procedures call for a three-drug cocktail including a barbiturate anesthetic, a muscle-paralyzing drug and a heart-stopping chemical. Critics say the state does not properly administer enough anesthetic to deaden the pain of the final drug, whose effects are masked by the paralytic.

Introducing the possibility of a single-drug protocol, U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel asked an expert witness for the state to estimate the length of time it would take to "achieve a flat line" on an electrocardiogram — meaning someone was dead — just using "a massive dose of barbiturate."

"We are looking at 20 minutes at the low end and 40 minutes toward the upper end," said Dr. Robert Singler, a Napa anesthesiologist.

Fogel is considering a lawsuit brought by death row inmate Michael Morales, who contends that California's current lethal injection protocol presents an unnecessary risk of subjecting condemned inmates to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Constitution.

Morales was originally scheduled for execution Feb. 21 but state corrections officials postponed it after they were unable to meet conditions the judge imposed. Since then, the state has revised the protocol slightly, but has stuck by the three-drug cocktail.

The judge has conducted an extensive review of the issue, going so far as to visit the execution chamber at San Quentin State Prison in Marin County to familiarize himself with the process.

Santa Clara University law professor Ellen Kreitzberg, who attended portions of the four-day hearing, said Fogel was truly delving into "the machinery of death."

In response to a question from Fogel, Singler said Friday that the paralytic pancuronium bromide could serve a useful purpose by deepening oxygen deprivation to the brain.

Then the judge asked if an inmate were still conscious after the first drug was administered whether the effect of pancuronium bromide "would conceal that fact" from observers outside the sealed execution chamber. "Yes," Singler said.

Fogel continued to express concern, as he did earlier in the week, that some of the 11 people executed in California by lethal injection were still breathing for several minutes beyond what would be anticipated after the anesthetic was administered.

On Friday, Singler acknowledged that prison logs "raise the question" of whether convicted murderer Robert Lee Massie was awake when the final lethal drugs were injected in 2001. "I don't dispute that," Singler said.

The judge also asked Singler about an opinion issued by a federal judge earlier this month upholding Virginia's lethal injection procedures. In Virginia, according to the decision in Walker vs. Johnson, "the execution takes place in a one-room chamber," with the inmate strapped to a gurney in the front of the chamber, "and the executioner, IV team and the physician who pronounces death behind a curtain in the rear of the chamber. The curtain has two holes so the executioner and IV team can observe the inmate during the administration of the drugs."

"The IV team members have backgrounds in relevant medical fields and train on placing IV lines," the decision stated, and "the executioner has training to determine whether the IV line is flowing properly as he administers the drugs. Also, the executioner can see the inmate and the IV line to determine whether the drugs are entering the inmate's body properly. If the first IV line is not working properly, the executioner can switch to the second IV line."

In California, by contrast, the inmate is alone in a sealed chamber and the executioners administer the drugs from a dimly lighted anteroom through IV lines running into the chamber. During the hearing, there was considerable testimony questioning whether the executioners can see what is going on and attacking their capabilities.

Earlier this week Dr. Mark Heath, a Columbia University anesthesiologist who was the primary expert witness for Morales, characterized the team as "dysfunctional," based on prison records and statements that team members made in depositions.

After reading from the Virginia decision, Fogel asked Singler, "Do you have an opinion on whether what I read to you is of any value in assessing what you saw when you went to San Quentin" to observe the execution chamber and meet with team members a few days before Morales' execution was to take place?

"There are some improvements in what you read," Singler said. He also said the lighting in the execution area at San Quentin "is not optimal."

As he concluded the hearing, Fogel made it clear that the case will not turn solely on courtroom testimony but also on thousands of pages of depositions and 148 exhibits that he will review. He told the lawyers for both sides that he hoped to send them questions by the end of next week on issues that he would like them to focus on in closing briefs, which are due Oct. 27.

Fogel said he hoped to render a decision in early November, although it could take longer. "Let me stress, time is of the essence. I want to get this done so you can move on to the next level of review," the judge said, acknowledging that the losing side is likely to appeal his decision.

He also emphasized that "it is very important to focus on the issues in this case. There are a lot of issues that swirl around this case — how people feel about the death penalty, the rights of victims and victims' families, all of which are very important. But this court has a very specific job to do here and it will do that to the best of its ability."

Although those comments were similar to remarks the 57-year-old jurist made on the opening day of the hearing, they had added resonance Friday because of the presence of Barbara Christian, the mother of Morales' victim, Terri Winchell. Christian attended with several friends and her attorney Gloria Allred.

In a hallway after the hearing, Christian told reporters "I am very angry" that so much time is being spent on the issue of whether Morales, who murdered her daughter in 1981, "might be aware" of serious pain for "five to seven minutes."

Christian reminded reporters that Morales bashed in Winchell's skull with a claw hammer, stabbed her in the chest with a butcher knife, raped her and finally ran her over with a car. "I want to see him go meet God and let God judge him," Christian said of Morales.

Now 46, the convicted killer has been on death row for nearly a quarter-century.

Congress Passes Curbs On U.S. Payments To Online Gaming Sites (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

Bloomberg, September 30, 2006

Sept. 30 (Bloomberg) -- Congress passed legislation today that curbs financial payments from banks to offshore Internet casinos that are illegal under U.S. law.

``Basically we are shutting down the payment system for Internet gambling," said Representative James Leach, an Iowa Republican. ``It is has an enormous effect."

The measure, added to unrelated legislation providing $3.4 billion for U.S. port security, makes it unlawful for credit-card companies to collect payments for transactions with online-gaming sites. Congress passed the port security plan before recessing to campaign for the Nov. 7 elections.

Gambling on the Internet is a $12 billion-a-year business that is growing rapidly offshore. Internet-based casinos such as PartyGaming Plc and 888 Holdings Plc, operating in locations such as Gibraltar and Antigua, take in billions from U.S. gamblers.

The Justice Department has been pursuing wire fraud charges against executives and operators of online casinos.

Frist gave his support to the legislation at a hearing in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, with Leach on Sept. 1, saying Republicans in Congress had ``a responsibility to act." Frist, a Tennessee Republican, is weighing a run for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 and is courting Iowa voters.

``Internet gambling has been illegal since inception of the Internet, but there has been no way to enforce it," Leach said. By making it ``illegal to use a financial instrument to settle an Internet wager," Congress is ``putting responsibility on the financial community," Leach said.

Defense Measure

Earlier this month, Republican leaders considered attaching the anti-online gaming bill to a pending defense measure. That was blocked when Senate Armed Service Committee Chairman John Warner of Virginia objected to the addition of any non-defense measures to the legislation.

The American Gaming Association, which represents major U.S. casino operators based in Las Vegas and elsewhere, had asked Congress to fund a federal commission that would study whether online gambling can be regulated and taxed in the U.S. The lobby group's hope is a study may eventually let major casino operators such as MGM Mirage and Harrah's Entertainment Inc. enter the online business.

Credit Cards

``If someone goes out and runs up a big credit card debt on one of these online casinos, they can't come back and say you have to pay us now," said Senator Jon Kyl an Arizona Republican and co-sponsor of the measure with Leach. ``The bank says, `We can't pay you.' In fact it's illegal for the bank to pay."

The measure provides for fines and imprisonment up to five years for violations. A specific exemption of the prohibition is provided for online gambling on horse racing, which is legal under a separate federal statute, fantasy sports games and betting that takes place only within or between Indian tribal lands.

The legislation directs the Federal Reserve and Department of Justice to issue regulations within nine months to banks establishing policies and procedures for blocking online gaming transactions.

Adding the anti-gambling measure to the $3.4 billion port legislation helped ``grease the wheels," said Senator Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican.

The measure was supported by the NCAA, the NFL and other U.S. professional sports leagues, along with Christian church groups and state and federal law enforcement authorities.

Grand Jury To Study Claims (BSH)

By Anita Lee

Biloxi Sun Herald, September 30, 2006

JACKSON - A federal grand jury investigating post-Katrina insurance-industry claims practices plans a detailed study of an Oklahoma City case that ended with a $13 million verdict against State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., court records show.

Attorney Jeff Marr, who represents 71 State Farm policyholders in Oklahoma, has been ordered to produce a transcript of the trial, Watkins v. State Farm; sworn testimony taken outside court from 26 individuals, the policyholders' claims files and other records.

The grand jury wants the records delivered by Oct. 11 to the federal courthouse in Jackson.

They include testimony from State Farm's top officers: Company chairman and CEO Edward B. Rust Jr., president and vice chairman Vincent J. Trosino and claims vice president Susan Q. Hood.

The grand jury also has subpoenaed testimony given by engineers from Texas-based Haag Engineering Inc. and engineering reports from Haag.

State Farm officials declined comment Friday on the investigation, but have said in the past the company is cooperating with the U.S. Justice Department and state attorney general's office, which also is investigating insurers.

The Oklahoma jury found in May that State Farm "intentionally and with malice breached its duty to deal fairly and act in good faith" with policyholders who sued over damages from a 1999 tornado.

The jury found State Farm hired Haag knowing the company was predisposed to produce damage assessments that would allow the insurer to minimize or deny policyholder claims.

Shortly after Hurricane Katrina, Haag engineer Timothy Marshall completed a damage assessment of the Mississippi coastline that concluded, unlike later reports, that Katrina's surge preceded the wind. His report also listed peak wind gusts of 115 miles per hour in Bay St. Louis, found the hurricane to be below Category 3 strength and said there were no tornadoes.

State Farm adjusters have said management viewed Marshall's report as "The Bible." State Farm and Nationwide adjusters attended training seminars conducted by Haag, according to court records in Mississippi.

Haag engineers also assessed damaged property for insurance companies after Katrina. The company has denied any bias in its work and maintains it has been providing objective, professional services for 82 years.

But State Farm suspended work with the company after the Oklahoma verdict and launched its own investigation of Haag, according to the company executives forced to submit to sworn questioning in the Oklahoma case.

Detroit Reporter Fights Ex-prosecutor's Demand For Sources' Names (AP)

By Sarah Karush

AP, September 29, 2006

DETROIT (AP) — A Detroit Free Press reporter is asking a federal judge to declare the names of his sources off-limits for a former assistant U.S. attorney, who has demanded the information for his lawsuit against the government.

Lawyers for reporter David Ashenfelter filed a lawsuit Sept. 12 against Richard Convertino, who is facing criminal charges over his handling of a high-profile terrorism trial during his time as a federal prosecutor. They filed the suit in U.S. District Court in Detroit, the same court Ashenfelter covers for the Free Press and where Convertino once worked and is now a criminal defendant.

Convertino demanded in July that the owner of the Free Press, Gannett Co., reveal the identities of Ashenfelter's sources for a January 2004 article. That story detailed an internal Justice Department investigation into Convertino's conduct in the terrorism trial. Convertino has sued the Justice Department in Washington over the article, accusing officials of violating the federal Privacy Act by leaking information about him.

Detroit reporter fights ex-prosecutor's demand for sources' names

DETROIT (AP) — A Detroit Free Press reporter is asking a federal judge to declare the names of his sources off-limits for a former assistant U.S. attorney, who has demanded the information for his lawsuit against the government.

Lawyers for reporter David Ashenfelter filed a lawsuit Sept. 12 against Richard Convertino, who is facing criminal charges over his handling of a high-profile terrorism trial during his time as a federal prosecutor. They filed the suit in U.S. District Court in Detroit, the same court Ashenfelter covers for the Free Press and where Convertino once worked and is now a criminal defendant.

Convertino demanded in July that the owner of the Free Press, Gannett Co., reveal the identities of Ashenfelter's sources for a January 2004 article. That story detailed an internal Justice Department investigation into Convertino's conduct in the terrorism trial. Convertino has sued the Justice Department in Washington over the article, accusing officials of violating the federal Privacy Act by leaking information about him.

"The information concerning Ashenfelter's confidential source(s) is in his possession, in Detroit. Gannett does not possess any of this information," the reporter's lawyers wrote.

"A reporter's privilege shields the production of this information in civil discovery, and it belongs to Ashenfelter. He, and he alone, is the reporter who spoke with the confidential source(s), gave the promise of confidentiality, and wrote the article based on the confidential information."

Convertino's lawyer, Stephen Kohn, called Ashenfelter's lawsuit "frivolous and harassing and sanctionable." He said the reporter was acting prematurely, since Convertino has not subpoenaed him up to this point.

Kohn said he is first trying to determine whether Gannett has the information before seeking it from the Free Press or Ashenfelter. "The process is moving forward" with Gannett, he said.

Gannett spokeswoman Tara Connell said the company would not comment.

The newspaper group acquired the Free Press in August 2005, more than a year and a half after the paper ran Ashenfelter's article about the Convertino probe.

Convertino was the lead prosecutor in the nation's first post-Sept. 11 terrorism trial. He won convictions of three of the four defendants in 2003, but they were overturned the following year at the request of the government, which said the prosecutors had failed to turn over some documents that could have aided the defense.

The Justice Department had been investigating Convertino's handling of the terrorism case and two 1990s drug cases when he resigned last year. In March, he was indicted on charges of conspiracy, obstruction of justice and making false declarations.

Kohn maintains that the sources who provided the information about Convertino do not deserve to be protected. He says the information they shared was meant only to smear Convertino.

Ashenfelter's suit says the First Amendment protects a reporter from having to reveal the identity of sources.

"These protections reflect a paramount public interest in the existence and maintenance of a vigorous, aggressive and independent press capable of furthering a robust, unfettered debate over controversial matters and are based on the firm recognition that effective newsgathering depends significantly on journalists' ability to secure the confidence and trust of their sources," the lawyers wrote.

The Justice Department investigated the leak to the Free Press, but its December 2004 report was inconclusive. Investigators said they identified 30 people who had access to the information, but all of them denied giving the information to the paper.

CIVIL LAW:

Old Stone Will Ask Supreme Court To Hear Suit (PROJO)

By Neil Downing

The Providence Journal, September 30, 2006

Old Stone Corp. of Providence wants the U.S. Supreme Court to weigh in on the company's longstanding lawsuit against the federal government.

Old Stone's board of directors voted yesterday to petition the Supreme Court to hear the company's breach-of-contract lawsuit.

It would be the final avenue of appeal; Old Stone has exhausted all others -- including one last week.

Winfield W. Major, a member of Old Stone's board, acknowledged that the Supreme Court typically agrees to review only "a very small percentage" of cases.

Nevertheless, he said, "We feel that the merits of our case are strong, and just hope that the Supreme Court of the United States will agree."

Old Stone, which formerly owned Old Stone Bank, filed the lawsuit 14 years ago this month.

Old Stone alleged that the government had broken its promises involving Old Stone's acquisition of two ailing savings-and-loan institutions during the 1980s.

In effect, the government encouraged Old Stone to take over Rhode Island Federal Savings & Loan, of Providence, in 1984, and Citizens Federal Savings & Loan, of Seattle, Wash., in 1985.

As part of those transactions, the government allowed Old Stone to use some accounting maneuvers so that the acquisitions would not harm Old Stone's financial picture.

The government later disallowed the accounting maneuvers. That contributed to a decline in Old Stone's financial health, so Old Stone sued. (Dozens of other banking companies in similar situations also filed such lawsuits.)

The Old Stone case languished in the courts until November 2004, when a U.S. Court of Federal Claims judge scolded the government, agreed with Old Stone's claims, and ordered the government to pay the company $192.5 million in damages.

The government appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit in Washington, D.C. In May, a three-judge panel from that court reduced the award by $118 million, to $74.5 million.

Old Stone Corp. asked the appeals court to reconsider that decision. Last week, the court refused.

Old Stone was thus left with a choice: accept the reduced award of $74.5 million, or appeal to the Supreme Court to try to reinstate the full award of $192.5 million.

Yesterday, Old Stone's board voted to petition the Supreme Court. It is "the only course [of appeal] available to us now," Major said by phone.

In a statement issued yesterday, Old Stone's chairman, Bernard V. Buonanno Jr., said, "We believe that our damages claims are strong and should have been affirmed in full under established precedents. We will ask the Supreme Court to review the appellate panel decision and to reinstate [the] . . . full award."

A spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice, Charles Miller, declined yesterday to comment on the case. If the Supreme Court agrees to hear the case, the Justice Department will respond to the legal papers that Old Stone files with the court, according to the schedule established by the court, Miller said.

Major said, "Hopefully, we're getting near the time where we'll have some finality to this case."

Feds File Suit Against Lakewood Landlord, Citing Discrimination (OCO)

By Eddie Hollowell

Ocean County (NJ) Observer, September 30, 2006

LAKEWOOD — The U.S. Department of Justice filed a lawsuit yesterday against Triple H. Realty LLC and a current and former employee, alleging they gave preferential treatment to Orthodox Jewish tenants at the Cottage Manor Apartments, according to a department news release.

Neither person is named in the release and no one from the department could be reached for comment last night.

However, in July, the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development charged the company, managing agent Harry Kantor and former onsite supervisor Vincent Ortiz with violating the Fair Housing Act by trying to segregate tenants based on religion, race, color and national origin.

The Justice Department complaint, filed yesterday in federal district court in Newark, alleges the complex was marketed to Orthodox Jews in the local area beginning in 2002 by offering lower rents than current tenants paid for comparable apartments.

Non-Jewish black and Hispanic residents were allegedly pressured to move out of buildings that management reserved for incoming Jewish tenants and that were better maintained than other buildings in the complex. The com-plaint also alleges that management provided Jewish residents more favorable living conditions, such as a fenced, landscaped yard.

"It is inexcusable and illegal to deny equal access to housing based on one's race or ethnicity," Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement. "The Department of Justice will continue to vigorously protect the equal housing rights of all Americans."

The suit seeks monetary damages to compensate victims, civil penalties and a court order barring future discrimination.

Cottage Manor Apartments is a six-building, 104-unit garden complex located on Woehr Avenue. It is owned by Triple H. Realty, which is located at 227 Woehr Ave.

The allegations appear similar to ones that were detailed in a June HUD document, which refers to incidents between 2002 and 2004. It could not be determined last night whether the two documents were linked.

Those HUD allegations outlined a pattern of what they called "discrimination." As described in the HUD documents, in January 2002, Kantor started recruiting Orthodox Jews to fill vacancies after a housing assistance payments contract with the Lakewood Housing Authority was terminated.

Kantor claimed that Jewish tenants moving in expressed concerns that they did not mix well with non-Jewish families, according to HUD. To accommodate the new tenants, Hispanics and African-Americans already residing at the complex were asked to move to a building in the rear of the complex, HUD said.

Three complainants have said they refused, and were retaliated against, the HUD documents state.

Triple H. Realty and Kantor have denied the discrimination allegations, HUD said. The choice to reach out to the Orthodox Jewish community was "strictly a business decision," they claim in the document. Further, Kantor stated that neither he nor his employees refused to sign the complainants' lease, HUD asserts.

The story contains information from previous Ocean County Observer reports.

Euclid Reveals New Wards Plan (CLPD)

By Leila Atassi

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, September 30, 2006

Euclid -- City Council will decide on Monday whether it will act in time for the November 2007 election to adopt a redistricting plan that increases the number of black residents in two of the city's four wards.

Cleveland State University researchers, with suggestions from Council President Ed Gudenas, drafted the new districts to help settle a federal lawsuit that contends the city's election system prevents black candidates from winning council seats.

The plan would shuffle about 13 percent of Euclid's residents to increase Ward 4's black population from 51 percent to 54 percent and Ward 3's from 34 percent to 40 percent. But it maintains the four at-large seats that the U.S. Justice Department wanted replaced with an eight-ward system and a council president elected at-large.

City officials hope the changes will be enough to cut short the legal battle that erupted when a three-year investigation concluded that the city's broadly drawn districts and a system for electing at-large council members have diluted minority voting strength in a city with a population that is more than 30 percent black.

Some residents in the sections of town who would be recruited to help increase Ward 3's black population to 40 percent said that council was moving too fast to approve a plan that might not even satisfy the Justice Department or achieve its goal of getting a black candidate elected.

"You can make super-wards to reflect anything you want," said Pierce Jackson, who lives on Babbitt Road. "But isn't this plan really just rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic?"

Nearly 70 people attended a public hearing this week to discuss the proposal.

Most who stepped to the lectern during the televised meeting slammed the Justice Department for refusing to provide evidence of its claims and for implying that residents are incapable of electing the most competent candidates -- regardless of race.

But a few residents argued that the new districts would only further concentrate poverty in the city and that creating two wards with more black residents does not necessarily mean more black candidates will run for office.

Mayor Bill Cervenik, who added his name as a co-sponsor of the plan at the meeting, said that while the plan achieves the population balance that the Justice Department is looking for, he does not believe it will make a difference come election time.

"Adding my name as a sponsor does not negate for a minute my belief that this will not satisfy what the Justice Department is concerned about," Cervenik said in an interview Friday. "But what Justice is trying to do is much more harmful than the changes Council is proposing to our government. And in the end, changing wards won't change voting habits. We have a responsibility as the current elected officials to help that process."

Cervenik said he plans to spearhead a citizens committee, including one resident from each ward and three other residents selected by the administration, to provide feedback on the new ward boundaries, the federal lawsuit and ways the city can improve voter participation and education.

Feds To Watch Voting (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess And Patrick Courreges

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 30, 2006

Federal observers will be working the precincts in St. Landry Parish today when voters hit the machines for a variety of local and state elections and ballot issues.

Voting machines in the eight-parish Acadiana are awash today with candidates and propositions.

Even in areas without a particular local race or issue, two statewide races — insurance commissioner and secretary of state — and a baker's dozen of constitutional amendments.

In St. Landry, observers with the U.S. Department of Justice will keeping an eye on activity around those voting machines and asking some voters questions about the election, St. Landry Parish Clerk of Court Charles Jagneaux said.

"They came because there were some allegations of vote buying and because there's some contentious elections," he said.

Jagneaux noted that of specific interest is the election for St. Landry Parish Sheriff, where interim Sheriff Laura Balthazar faces challengers Lambert Castille and Bobby Guidroz.

Jagneaux said his staff met with Justice Department officials Friday, joined by representatives of the Louisiana secretary of state's elections fraud unit.

"I'm sure the allegations were racial in nature," Jagneaux said. "They said something about preventing the dilution of the black vote."

U.S. Attorney Donald Washington said federal officials heard rumors about the potential for voter irregularities, particularly in the sheriff's race.

"There were concerns about the potential for intimidation based on race," he said.

Washington said 12 election monitors will be working the parish — two teams of five with a captain and a co-captain.

Jagneaux said that some observers may want to ask voters questions about the election after they vote.

"I don't think the questions are going to be too contentious," Jagneaux said. "They're not trying to intimidate voters or the commissioners."

Poll observers will only ask questions of voters who have already cast their votes, Washington said.

"These are observers. They are not to take any action," he said. "We will not interfere in an election. We take reports, and we take any action after an election has occurred."

Jagneaux said the Justice Department will issue a report on its findings within a week and discuss them with elections officials.

Jagneaux said his office will also be reopening qualifications today for the Port Barre board of alderman race because one candidate — Democrat John E. Sylvester — died early Friday morning.

Jagneaux said the election for that seat will go forward today, with votes for Sylvester not being counted. He added that if no one qualifies for the post by 5 p.m. Monday, today's election results will stand.

If any new candidate, however, files for the race and pays the $80 qualifying fee before the deadline, today's results will be thrown out and another election will be held on Nov. 7.

Signs will be posted at the affected polls notifying voters of Sylvester's death, according to the Secretary of State's office.

Supreme Court A Busy Docket Of Touchy Topics (WSJ)

By Jacob M. Schlesinger

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

The Supreme Court comes back to work Monday to take up some hot-button new issues -- notably abortion and racial diversity in schools -- and thereby begin the first full measure of the impact of the nation's newest justice, Samuel Alito.

Justice Alito replaced Justice Sandra Day O'Connor partway through the last session, in February. She was a swing vote on both subjects on a divided court, taking different sides on the questions, depending on how they were shaded. Court watchers expect Justice Alito to be a more consistently conservative vote, against both abortion rights and school diversity plans.

The justices hear arguments in two abortion cases the day after midterm elections, on Nov. 8. Both involve the federal "Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act," passed by Congress and signed by President Bush after the Supreme Court struck down a similar Nebraska law in 2000.

Roe v. Wade -- the seminal 1973 court ruling upholding abortion rights -- isn't at stake. But the cases are central to the social conservatives' legal strategy of chipping away at Roe. The question is whether laws banning access to abortion procedures require an exception when the mother's health is at stake. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asked the high court to consider the matter after lower courts struck down the federal law because it failed to provide such a provision. The Supreme Court used a similar standard in its 2000 Nebraska ruling. That vote was 5 to 4, with Justice O'Connor joining the majority.

Some time later in the term -- arguments haven't yet been scheduled -- the court will take up racial-balancing plans in public-school districts in Jefferson County, Ky., and Seattle. Both districts have complex enrollment formulas designed to ensure school populations reflect the racial balance of the local community. In Seattle, parents of white students protested when their children were denied entrance to a popular, oversubscribed, high-school academy. One tie-breaking factor determining admission was race. The cases raise questions similar to those in the Court's 2003 ruling upholding the University of Michigan's use of race as a factor in law-school admissions. That vote also was 5 to 4, with Justice O'Connor writing the majority opinion.

While those are the term's marquee issues, the justices also have agreed to take up an unusually heavy docket of business concerns. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has filed briefs in at least 18 cases, hoping that the court under Chief Justice John Roberts, beginning his second term since succeeding William Rehnquist, will prove to be one of the most business friendly in decades.

The chamber's priorities include two cases it hopes will curb antitrust complaints, and one that could essentially affirm the Bush administration's decision to avoid setting global-warming regulations under the Clean Air Act. Another priority for companies: Philip Morris Inc.'s petition for relief from a 1999 $79.5 million Oregon jury award, which will be argued on Oct. 31.

While companies are hoping a conservative court will take their side against trial lawyers, the issue cuts across legal ideological lines. When the court ruled in 1995 to limit damages against BMW of North America Inc. , Justice O'Connor joined the 5-4 majority, while the bench's staunchest conservatives were in the minority. Justice Antonin Scalia mocked what he called the invention of the "Excessive Damages Clause of the Bill of Rights."

Abortion, Race, Environment On Supreme Court's Agenda (MCT)

By Stephen Henderson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court returns Monday to a docket that includes important cases on abortion, race and the environment, and by next spring, when the court adjourns, it should be much clearer how new Justices John G. Roberts and Samuel Alito have changed things.

The key cases in particular will test the principles the new justices swore allegiance to during their confirmation hearings: precedent, restraint and judicial modesty. Depending on how they and the other justices rule, the laws in those areas could be altered dramatically.

In the abortion case, the court could make it much more difficult to challenge restrictions on women's ability to terminate pregnancies.

The race cases, which involve whether school districts - like colleges and universities - should be able to consider ethnicity in their quest to foster diversity, could affect the reach of the landmark affirmative action cases from 2003.

The environmental case, which questions whether the Environmental Protection Agency may regulate so-called greenhouse gases, presents issues involving how to interpret congressional intent and the ability of individuals to sue in federal court over environmental issues.

Roberts and Alito gave clues during the last term, their first, as to how they might change the court.

Roberts, the court's 17th chief justice and a former clerk to the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, led the court through a record stretch of unanimous opinions early in the term, reflecting his belief that the justices speak loudest when they speak together. Roberts also wrote several opinions that captured his respect for precedent, the guidepost for court stability, and restraint, the idea that the court shouldn't tread on territory reserved for the government's more democratic branches.

Alito had less time to reveal himself because he wasn't confirmed to the bench until halfway through last term. Once he was there, he had little opportunity to have a big impact, which is typical of first-year justices. But when he did write, he revealed much of what he'd been in 15 years on a federal appellate court: a jurist who favors cautious and guarded opinions to thunderous or flashy ones.

In political terms, though, both men have established themselves as reliable votes for the court's conservative block. Both voted consistently with Justice Antonin Scalia, widely regarded as the court's most ardent conservative.

"I don't think there will be many surprises with either of them," said Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, a liberal group that focuses on legal issues. The group opposed both Roberts' and Alito's nominations.

"The right has been getting exactly what they need out of their judicial nominees."

Arguments start on Tuesday, after the justices observe Yom Kippur on Monday, with two cases that will decide whether immigrants can be deported for committing crimes that are felonies under state laws and misdemeanors under federal law.

The abortion cases, scheduled to be argued in early November, will test how strongly Roberts and Alito feel about preserving recent court precedents. The cases involve a challenge to a federal ban on late-term abortions; the court in 2000 struck down an identical ban by the state of Nebraska because it lacked an exception for cases that threatened the health of pregnant women.

Government lawyers say the federal ban's lack of a health exception doesn't matter because Congress made a "factual finding" that late-term abortion is never medically necessary.

But to uphold the federal ban, the court would need to back away from its stringent requirement of a health exception; that would mean significantly altering or undermining the 2000 ruling.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, now retired, was the key fifth vote in the 2000 ruling, but both Roberts and Alito wrote memos while working in the Reagan administration questioning the validity of Roe v. Wade, which recognized a constitutional right to abortion.

If the two hew to their thinking on abortion, they could overturn the previous ruling. But if they stick with precedent, they might be forced to uphold and apply it in the case involving the federal ban.

Late last term, Roberts made it even less likely, according to some observers, that he'd overrule court precedents by joining an opinion by Justice Stephen Breyer that was a virtual paean to the importance of precedent and its effect on court stability.

"Adherence to precedent is the norm; departure from it is exceptional," Breyer wrote, saying that principle is especially true where "circumstances have not changed."

The abortion case also confronts another substantive issue about how restrictions are challenged. Right now, it's easier to challenge abortion laws than it is to question other laws, thanks to the way courts have interpreted a 1992 abortion ruling. But a lower-court judge has crafted an opinion that debunks that interpretation and suggests that abortion laws can be challenged the same way other laws are. If the justices adopt that thinking, it would be harder to overturn laws that place restrictions on abortion.

The race cases involve efforts in Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to create diverse student bodies in public schools. Each district uses some form of racial consideration when assigning students to schools to ensure that each has certain percentages of minority and white children.

The school districts argue that they're no less entitled to this use of race than are colleges and universities, which were told in 2003 by the justices that limited use of racial preferences is fine.

Parent groups in both cities say the school districts are using race to an extent that violates the Constitution. The school districts are treating students as mere members of ethnic groups, rather than as individuals, they say.

The environmental cases involve whether the Environmental Protection Agency must regulate carbon dioxide emissions from new cars as part of its mandate to address any pollutant that might be "reasonably anticipated to endanger public health or welfare."

The case raises questions about the effects of global warming and whether greenhouse gases contribute to it. But legally, it challenges other important notions.

It questions how broadly an executive agency should be allowed to interpret a law passed by Congress, an issue that at least indirectly invokes the debate over the scope of executive power. And it raises questions about "standing," or the ability of individuals to sue in federal courts.

In some of the lower courts, judges have said individuals cannot show enough "particularized" injury from global warming to authorize them to sue in court.

Standing is an issue that Roberts in particular has found compelling. In a key opinion he wrote last term, he laid out a treatise on a relatively narrow interpretation of standing. In that case, he said taxpayers in Ohio and Michigan couldn't sue in federal court to stop legislators from granting tax incentives to businesses in their states.

The outcome of the case could significantly narrow the scope of the EPA's work - and the ability of private citizens to do much about it in court.

Gingrich Urges Overriding Supreme Court (AP-Y)

AP, September 30, 2006

Supreme Court decisions that are "so clearly at variance with the national will" should be overridden by the other branches of government, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich says.

"What I reject, out of hand, is the idea that by five to four, judges can rewrite the Constitution, but it takes two-thirds of the House, two-thirds of the Senate and three-fourths of the states to equal five judges," Gingrich said during a Georgetown University Law Center conference on the judiciary.

It takes approval by two-thirds of Congress and three-fourths of the 50 states to adopt an amendment to the Constitution, the government's bedrock document.

Gingrich, a Republican who represented a district in Georgia, noted that overwhelming majorities in Congress had reaffirmed the Pledge of Allegiance, and most of the public believes in its right to recite it.

As such, he said, "It would be a violation of the social compact of this country for the Supreme Court to decide otherwise and would lead, I hope, the two other branches to correct the court."

DOJ_NMG_0072049

In 2002, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in California ruled that the pledge was unconstitutional when recited in public schools because of the reference to God. The Supreme Court in 2004 reversed that decision on a technicality, but the case has been revived.

Gingrich said "the other two branches have an absolute obligation to render independent judgment" in cases that are "at variance with the national will."

He spoke at Thursday's panel discussion on relations between the executive, judicial and legislative branches of government.

Former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota, who spoke on the same panel, noted the high court's 5-4 decision settling the contested 2000 presidential election in favor of Republican George W. Bush.

"What if Al Gore had said I don't agree?" Daschle asked. "In a sense, what we did was put the court in the position of the American people. We were giving the court the power to make the decision for the American people based on their best judgment and I'm not challenging the judgment. I accept it, too, even though I disagree."

Abortion Bill Fails In Senate (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times/AP, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — A bill to criminalize taking minors over state lines for secret abortions failed late Friday in the Senate when Republicans were unable to get the 60 votes required to advance the bill to a final vote.

The vote stopped the bill from heading to the White House for Bush's signature.

The House voted 264 to 153 Tuesday to approve the legislation, which would have made it a federal crime for anyone other than a parent to take a child over state lines for an abortion in an effort to circumvent parental involvement laws.

The vote was aimed at giving Republicans a shot at political redemption after a year that began and ended without Congress passing some major items on the agendas of social conservatives.

Republican leaders scheduled votes on some of those items, but bans on gay marriage and flag desecration failed.

Rhode Island Couple Wins Same-Sex Marriage Case (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

BOSTON, Sept. 29 — Same-sex couples who live in Rhode Island can marry in Massachusetts, a Superior Court judge here ruled on Friday.

The judge, Thomas E. Connolly, ruled that because Rhode Island did not prohibit same-sex marriage by statute or in its Constitution, same-sex couples were allowed to marry in Massachusetts under state law.

“No evidence was introduced before this court of a constitutional amendment, statute or controlling appellate decision from Rhode Island that explicitly deems void or otherwise expressly forbids same-sex marriage,” Judge Connolly ruled.

The Massachusetts attorney general, Thomas F. Reilly, said he would not appeal the ruling. Rhode Island’s attorney general, Patrick Lynch, said the marriages would not be valid in his state.

“This ruling does not authorize same-sex marriages in Rhode island, and it does not mean that Rhode Island will recognize a same-sex marriage performed in Massachusetts,” Mr. Lynch said in a statement. “Only the Rhode Island legislature or a Rhode Island court can decide if same-sex marriage is valid in Rhode Island.”

Same-sex marriage was legalized here in 2004. But until Friday, only residents could be granted marriage licenses because of a 1913 law that prohibited the state from performing marriages that were not legal in the couple’s home state. The state’s highest court upheld that law last year after same-sex couples from six states challenged it.

The court ruled that same-sex couples from Connecticut, Vermont, Maine and New Hampshire could not marry in Massachusetts because same-sex marriage was expressly prohibited by statute in those states.

The court left the door open for residents of New York and Rhode Island, but the New York State Court of Appeals ruled shortly after that that same-sex marriage was not allowed under state law. With Rhode Island being the only state with no express prohibition of same-sex marriage, two Providence residents, Wendy Becker and Mary Norton, appealed.

“After a very long engagement, we are thrilled to be able to marry and provide our family with the legal protection and social recognition we deserve,” Ms. Becker said Friday. “As the parents of two wonderful young children, our desire to marry has always been with them in mind. We want them to feel their family is as worthy as any other.”

Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, which argued the case, applauded the ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0072050

"At last the fence of discrimination has been removed at the border of Massachusetts and Rhode Island," Michele Granda, the lawyer who argued the case, said in a statement. "Loving, committed Rhode Island couples can now affirm their relationships in the most public and respected way our society knows."

Pagans Sue On Emblem For Graves (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Military veterans are entitled to have their headstones engraved by the government with a symbol of their religion. Families of the deceased may choose from emblems representing a variety of 18 Christian churches, a number of Buddhist sects, Judaism, Islam, Sikhism, Hinduism and atheism (represented by an atom with an A inside) — 38 religious symbols in all.

But not the Wiccan pentacle, which the Department of Veterans Affairs has neither approved nor disallowed despite various petitions over the last nine years.

Yesterday three Wiccan families and two Wiccan churches sued to force the department to include their symbol — a five-pointed star inside a circle — on the list of approved emblems.

Wiccans, also called pagans, are often wrongly confused with Satanists. Theirs is a nature-based religion recognized by the Internal Revenue Service, and by the military itself in its chaplains' handbooks and on the dog tags that troops wear around their necks. There are an increasing number of Wiccans (pronounced WIK-ens) in the armed forces — 1,800, according to a Pentagon survey cited in the suit.

The American Civil Liberties Union, representing the plaintiffs, brought the action in the United States Court of Appeals for Veterans Claims, in Washington. A spokesman for the V.A. did not respond to requests for an interview.

In the years that Wiccans have been petitioning, the department has approved emblems for at least six groups, including the obscure Izumo Taishakyo Mission of Hawaii.

Kathleen Egbert, a Wiccan priestess in Laurel, Md., is among the plaintiffs. Her father, Abraham Kooiman, fought in World War II and received a Bronze Star and a Purple Heart. He died in 2001 at age 77 and was buried in Arlington National Cemetery, a Wiccan without a symbol on his headstone.

"I'm angry," Ms. Egbert said, "because if pagans can fight and die for our country, we should be recognized by our country the same way anyone else would be."

ANTITRUST:

Congress Approves Wright Repeal (FWST)

By Maria Recio

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The House and Senate approved historic legislation repealing the Wright Amendment on Friday after proponents and critics sparred in the House over whether the bill would protect consumers.

Shortly after 10 p.m. Central time, House members voted 386-22 to approve the bill. The Senate passed it on a voice vote early in the afternoon, and the measure now goes to President Bush for his signature.

The bill caps decades of acrimony over the issue between Fort Worth and Dallas. It opens up Dallas Love Field to nonstop domestic flights after eight years, allows immediate connecting and one-stop passenger flights to distant cities, and slashes Love Field to 20 gates from 32. Proponents said the bill will increase air travel competition in North Texas and drive fares down at Dallas/Fort Worth Airport. Critics argued that eight years is too long, that the gate reductions strengthen near-monopolies by American Airlines and Southwest Airlines at their D/FW and Love Field home bases, and that through-ticketing won't bring fares down as much as hoped.

Southwest, which dominates Love Field, will add 40 one-stop destinations from the Dallas airport within days of the president's signature, spokeswoman Beth Harbin said Friday. That will probably include service to cities such as Chicago, Las Vegas and Washington, D.C. American officials wouldn't comment on their plans, but they are also likely to begin connecting service from Love.

"Everyone gave up something for the common good," Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth, told colleagues during House debate Friday night.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, who led the Texas delegation's efforts to push the bill through Congress, called the votes "a historic accomplishment for the leaders of the North Texas community acting in the best interest of consumers."

Bill has its critics

But opponents said North Texas airfares will remain artificially high.

"You're going to pay more to fly to Dallas/Fort Worth, no question about that," said Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

Sensenbrenner noted that he often sees "Don't Mess with Texas" bumper stickers on the cars of his colleagues in the Texas delegation.

"Tonight is one of those nights when I think we ought to mess with Texas," Sensenbrenner said during the debate. "This is the most anti-consumer, anti-free-enterprise piece of legislation that has come before this House in a long time."

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the Judiciary Committee's ranking Democrat, said consumers were remarkably absent from negotiations on the repeal bill, which was crafted from a compromise reached in June by Fort Worth, Dallas, American and Southwest airlines, and Dallas/Fort Worth Airport.

"If anyone can explain to me how this is pro-consumer, of course" it should be made law, Conyers said.

Fort Worth Mayor Mike Moncrief, who led negotiations on the local compromise with Dallas Mayor Laura Miller, begged to differ.

"Who says miracles don't happen?" he said. "Tonight, a miracle did happen. I don't think there's any question it's a win for the traveling public."

Miller said in a statement: "I think it's very fortuitous that the Wright Amendment is passing Congress on opening day of the 120th year of the State Fair of Texas. Both are historic, and it's a super day to be in Dallas-Fort Worth."

The Wright Amendment, passed by Congress in the late 1970s to protect D/FW Airport from competition, has been a source of nonstop friction since.

Amendment's pros and cons

It limits most nonstop, connecting and one-stop passenger flights from Love Field to destinations within Texas and several nearby states. Critics have long argued that the law hampers competition in the North Texas air travel market and keeps fares high, while proponents such as Fort Worth argued that the law helped make D/FW into one of the world's busiest airports and an economic powerhouse for the region.

Southwest began campaigning for repeal two years ago. Fort Worth, Dallas, the airlines and D/FW began moving toward a compromise after Sen. Kit Bond of Missouri succeeded a year ago in getting his state included in the Wright Amendment boundaries.

Both houses approved the bill just before recessing for the November election season, avoiding having the debate spill over into a December lame-duck session. The local compromise could have been voided if Congress didn't pass it intact this year.

Debate over language in the bill exempting it from antitrust laws delayed the legislation. Ultimately, the exemption was stripped out of the bill and replaced by language making clear that Dallas will "reduce the number of gates," ostensibly giving the local parties cover from antitrust lawsuits because they would be acting under congressional direction.

Dallas is already facing a lawsuit by the owner of the former Legend Airlines terminal, which Dallas would seize and close under the local agreement. Bill Brewer, a Dallas attorney representing the owners, said Friday night that his client will proceed with its suit.

Brewer said the measure is "wildly anti-competitive and it's anti-consumer." Like other critics, he said the bill would help American and Southwest maintain near-monopolies at D/FW Airport and Love Field.

"I think it's inevitable that prices will keep going up at D/FW and we'll start to see the same thing at Love Field," Brewer said. "You're going to see over the next several years Southwest starting to act like the monopolist it will now be out at Love Field."

Andrea Newman, senior vice president of government affairs for Northwest Airlines, said she thinks other airlines' "ability to go into Love Field will be effectively eliminated" under the new law.

Darren Bush, an antitrust professor at the University of Houston, said he doesn't think the legislation is airtight against lawsuits and an injunction.

"It certainly is subject to court challenges and therefore certainly could be subject to injunctions," he said. "I think a case could be made for irreparable harm in light of the impending destruction of the [Legend] terminal."

Airlines happy with passage

Officials with American and Southwest welcomed passage of the bill. Since 2004, when Southwest began campaigning for repeal, each airline has deployed lobbyists to oppose the other.

"This is tremendous news for travelers in Dallas," said Harbin, the Southwest spokeswoman. "We're incredibly excited to be finally opening the city."

DOJ_NMG_0072052

Once the deal is approved by the Federal Aviation Administration, which is expected, Southwest will update its schedule within a few days to include the new long-haul cities Southwest will serve from Love via connections and one-stops. The airline will roll out an advertising blitz to let consumers know about the new service, she said.

"We're going to be treating Dallas like it's a brand new city to our network," Harbin said.

The Texas delegation, which backed the bill, was confident of its prospects in the House. House leaders placed the bill on the "suspension" calendar, which is typically used for noncontroversial bills. Those bills can't be amended, but they require two-thirds of members voting for passage.

The Senate vote earlier in the day hinged on allaying the objections of Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, who signed off on the bill Friday morning, Hutchison said.

Leahy relented after getting additional assurances and after a wilderness bill he wanted for his state was also released for passage. Asked if she had placed a "hold" on Leahy's bill, Hutchison smiled and said, "Let's just say we came to an agreement that brought up both bills."

To appease Leahy's antitrust concerns, Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, a former judge and member of the Judiciary panel, engaged in what Senate procedures call a "colloquy," or a conversation to clarify congressional intent. Leahy, afraid of setting precedent by allowing the local parties to declare the legislation free of competition laws, emphasized that the Wright Amendment was unique.

"The similar respect Senator Cornyn and I have for preserving competition laws has made our conversations productive and moved the legislative process forward," Leahy said. "While my concerns remain about this legislation, I am prepared to accept it."

Cornyn said in his remarks: "The legislation contemplated here should not be a model for any future arrangement. In no way can I imagine a situation arising with a set of facts remotely similar to that created in Dallas by the passage of the Wright Amendment."

Many proponents of the bill say it was the best deal they could get, given the long conflict over it in North Texas.

"It's not perfect," said Rep. Sam Johnson, R-Plano, who, with Rep. Jeb Hensarling of Dallas, broke ranks with the Texas delegation and pressed for repeal before the local compromise was reached.

The Texas delegation in the House voted 30-1 for passage of the bill, with Hensarling voting no.

"In my opinion, it doesn't do the job fast enough," Johnson said. But he added that he knew he had to compromise to bring the law "into the 21st century."

Staff writers Trebor Banstetter and David Wethe contributed to this report.

Wright Amendment: What's next?

Andrew Fastow will be out of prison before the Wright Amendment is gone. Here's what's ahead:

Now that the House and Senate have passed identical bills to repeal the amendment, President Bush must sign the bill before it becomes law.

The Federal Aviation Administration must then certify that the agreement won't affect air safety. The agency is expected to approve the compromise.

Southwest Airlines says it will launch connecting and direct flights -- ones that include at least one stop, but where passengers stay on the same plane -- from its Dallas Love Field home base to long-haul cities within days of FAA approval. The airline isn't being more specific about its plans.

American Airlines is likely to begin connecting service at Love to compete with Southwest. But it's not expected to move significant operations from its D/FW Airport home base.

Love Field Terminal Partners, which has filed three lawsuits against the locally produced Wright Amendment compromise that led to the congressional bill, is likely to continue trying to upend the deal in the courts. The partners own the former Legend Airlines terminal at Love Field, which Dallas will seize and close as part of the repeal deal with Fort Worth, American and Southwest airlines, and D/FW.

Six years from now, Fastow -- who engineered the shrouded deals that led to Enron Corp.'s collapse -- is expected to be released from federal prison.

Assuming that Bush signs the bill into law, in 2014 all Wright Amendment restrictions will be fully repealed. That will leave airlines free to fly nonstop domestically from Love to long-haul cities, without having to make stops.

Congress Repeals Wright (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy

The Dallas Morning News, September 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072053

WASHINGTON – Congress approved legislation late Friday to repeal the Wright amendment, potentially resolving a decades-old battle over the role of Dallas Love Field in North Texas.

The bill to phase out flight restrictions at the airport cleared the House overwhelmingly in a late-night vote before lawmakers departed for a pre-election recess.

The legislation won Senate passage under unanimous consent earlier Friday after months of pressure by Texas Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn to win over a final detractor, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

Southwest ready to expand Love service

Tracking the Wright amendment: History, opinions, links and FAQs

President Bush is expected to sign the measure as early as next week.

"It's a great relief to have a final solution," said Rep. Kenny Marchant, R-Coppell, whose district includes Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport. "The fact that none of the parties are completely happy and all of the parties are relieved to have it over should be a sign that it's a good agreement."

Lawmakers acknowledged that the Wright battle may not be over. Opponents of the deal are expected to challenge the legislation in court.

The Wright legislation stalled this summer under criticism over its treatment of federal antitrust laws, and supporters in Congress fought hard for language to help shield the deal from a long court fight.

The legislation will repeal Wright in 2014, implementing a June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines, Southwest Airlines and D/FW Airport.

It would immediately allow flights anywhere from Love Field, as long as they first stopped inside the nine-state Wright perimeter.

The agreement would also cut the number of available gates at Love from 32 to 20, part of a plan to compensate for an expected increase in noise, pollution and congestion. Nineteen gates are used now.

On Congress' last day, the House turned out to be the greatest source of contention over repealing Wright.

House members planned to clear their bill under suspension of normal rules, a procedure often used for uncontroversial measures.

Suspension bills often pass without recorded votes, but objections to the Wright legislation forced proponents to corral the support of two-thirds of those present. A heated evening debate had opponents sparring over the antitrust issue, while also arguing over the bill's potential benefits.

The chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., said the bill "will continue vestiges of the Wright amendment" until 2025, when gate arrangements expire under the deal.

Unusual splits

In a departure from many congressional debates, supporters and opponents of the Wright agreement weren't split by party affiliation or geography.

Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, the top Democrat on the judiciary committee, argued against a frequent ally, Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, D-Dallas, whose district includes Love Field.

Mr. Sensenbrenner, recalling the "Don't Mess with Texas" bumper stickers in the House garage, said, "Tonight is one of the nights where we ought to mess with Texas.

"This is the most anti-consumer, anti-free-enterprise legislation that has come before this House in a long time," he said.

Rep. Kay Granger, R-Fort Worth, was distributing red "Vote Yes" fliers to members on the floor; Ms. Johnson had her own yellow fliers supporting the bill.

The final tally, which came just past 10 p.m. Dallas time, was 386-22.

A tough fight had been expected in the Senate, where rules and traditions allow a single member the power to block legislation.

By early Thursday afternoon, after House members from North Texas had forged a path for their bill to reach the House floor, the pressure had grown on Ms. Hutchison and Mr. Cornyn, both Republicans.

Efforts in recent weeks to find language that was acceptable to Mr. Leahy and the North Texas parties had failed, even after changing the antitrust language from an explicit to implicit exemption to win over the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

Break in impasse

Word came from the Texas senators' staffs later Thursday afternoon that Mr. Leahy could come to an agreement for bringing the Wright bill up under unanimous consent, a procedure used for uncontroversial measures.

The senators and their staffs started working on statements to be read on the Senate floor.

Ms. Hutchison reached out to House members, e-mailing and talking with Ms. Granger past midnight to ask her to wait for a Senate bill to come to the House to prevent further procedural delays.

By Friday morning, Ms. Hutchison was sitting in a cloakroom off the Senate floor working out how the bill would come up under unanimous consent.

Mr. Leahy had been pushing a wilderness bill to move under unanimous consent, a measure that largely affected Vermont and New Hampshire.

Asked later if she was holding up his bill, Ms. Hutchison smiled. "Why would someone do that?

"Let's just say that we came to an agreement to pass both bills," she said.

The bill passed the Senate in less than a minute just before 1 p.m. Dallas time.

Then Mr. Cornyn and Mr. Leahy engaged in a colloquy, a discussion on the Senate floor that allows lawmakers to share their thinking for the record.

The dialogue does not offer the force of law but could help judges glean congressional intent in a court challenge.

"Senator Cornyn and I share a concern about providing antitrust immunity to agreements involving private parties," Mr. Leahy said. "While I would prefer greater clarity on this point in the bill, I am pleased that Senator Cornyn and I agree that this is an entirely unique situation, which should not be repeated."

Mr. Cornyn agreed that "the legislation contemplated here should not be a model for any future arrangement.

"In no way can I imagine a situation arising with a set of facts remotely similar to that created in Dallas by the passage of the Wright amendment," he said.

Mr. Cornyn, who serves on the judiciary committee with Mr. Leahy, said later that ending the impasse was a matter of talking through the details of the Wright law and the uniqueness of the situation.

"We had to explain to him that actually this increased competition rather than decreased competition," Mr. Cornyn said. "That was one of the hard things for people to understand because of the unique nature of the Wright amendment."

Ms. Hutchison, who urged North Texas officials early in the year to come up with a solution, said the Wright legislation took "an inordinate amount of time for a bill that shouldn't have been this complicated."

"I have to say that in my 12 years in the Senate, the hardest thing that I've ever had to explain was the Wright amendment to outside people," she said.

Dallas Mayor Laura Miller was euphoric Friday. She'd feared the Senate would be the bigger obstacle. Ms. Miller said she was confident the terms of the bill would protect Dallas from losing a court challenge, due to a dedicated North Texas delegation and attorneys who worked around the clock.

"Without the language crafted in the Senate ... we would have a huge problem," Ms. Miller said.

Lawsuit a thorn

She acknowledged that the lawsuits filed by Love Terminal Partners, the owners of the former Legend Airlines terminal slated to be demolished under the Wright agreement, will continue to be a thorn in her side.

But Dallas will not wait for a court ruling, she said, as the Wright agreement directs the city to proceed immediately.

Love Terminal Partners' "tactic is to keep the pressure up, because they see we have a great chance of being successful," Ms. Miller said. "In the court of law, I sure hope a judge would say...[they] have frivolously filed this lawsuit."

Bill Brewer, a Dallas lawyer representing Love Terminal Partners, said a lawsuit he filed Thursday – his third pending suit regarding Wright – seeks to void the city's involvement in the agreement.

He also said changes that were achieved by the judiciary committee leaders "saved the right of consumers and others who are affected by this to go to court."

The legislation does not specify which gates must be demolished, Mr. Brewer noted, potentially protecting the Legend building.

Friday's actions followed a nearly two-year fight over the Wright amendment and Love Field.

In November 2004, Southwest announced that it would lobby Congress to lift the flight restrictions. American and D/FW vigorously opposed any changes.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Dallas, introduced legislation the following May to repeal Wright completely, spurring lawmakers nationwide to pick up the cause to win cheaper flights to and from North Texas.

But Mr. Hensarling decided not to back the compromise agreement, saying he could not support the nation's only congressional mandate on the number of gates at a local airport.

He sat quietly in the back row of the House on Friday evening to watch the debate. He ultimately voted against the bill.

Rep. Sam Johnson, R-Plano, who co-sponsored the original Wright repeal legislation with Mr. Hensarling, said the compromise was "not perfect" but still an agreement worthy of support.

Congress Approves Deal On Dallas Flights (BLOOM)

By John Hughes

Bloomberg, September 30, 2006

An agreement between Southwest Airlines Co. and American Airlines to ease limits on nonstop flights from Dallas Love Field won approval from the U.S. Congress and awaits President Bush's signature.

The House passed the measure Friday in Washington 386-22 after the bill cleared the Senate by unanimous consent. The Senate sponsor, Republican Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, and other lawmakers secured approval by resolving some colleagues' antitrust concerns.

Congress' action resolved a clash over Love Field flying between Dallas-based Southwest and AMR Corp.'s American. Southwest pushed for two years to repeal the 1979 federal law restricting nonstop flights from Love to Texas and eight nearby states, including Tennessee.

The Wright Amendment, which limits the number of destinations airlines can fly to from Dallas' Love Field, became law in 1979. It was designed to encourage flights into the Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport, American's hub.

If Bush signs the measure, it could mean lower airfares for travelers between Nashville and Dallas as well as an easier method of buying tickets for Southwest customers.

Southwest has 96 percent of Love passengers, while American has more than 80 percent at Dallas-Fort Worth. Southwest, American and local governments agreed in June to scrap the Love limits in eight years and let flights there connect immediately at airports throughout the U.S.

The accord cuts Love Field's available gates to 20 from 32. ·

YouTube's Video Poker (NYT)

By Saul Hansell

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Chad Hurley effects a calm, almost detached demeanor, even as the Web site he runs, YouTube.com, has provoked a frenzy of consternation among executives of record labels, TV networks and movie studios. For millions of Internet users, the site that opened to the public less than a year ago provides a daily fix of odd and interesting video clips, from White House speeches to frat house pranks.

YouTube has also become a vast repository of video taken without permission from television shows and movies, not to mention home movies constructed — with nary a cent paid in royalties — from commercial music and imagery.

Mr. Hurley was surrounded by curious media executives at Allen & Company's annual Sun Valley mogulfest in July. They wondered: friend or foe? Is he earnestly working to make YouTube and its exuberant users conform to the existing standards of copyright law and contractual obligations? Or is he cynically flouting the law to enable YouTube to grow rapidly, calculating that he will be able to cut a more advantageous deal later, or perhaps sell the company to someone else who will be able to sort through the mess of liabilities?

In an interview this week, Mr. Hurley, not surprisingly, portrayed himself as mainly trying to improve the site for its users while working to find arrangements that will satisfy Hollywood.

"There's going to be bumps along the way, but we're trying to make an effort to make the new model work for everyone," he said. "We've been developing features and working on the problem. I don't think we have been just sitting back and just buying fancy furniture."

YouTube has started to attract mainstream advertisers and the site has become financially stable, Mr. Hurley said, despite the huge cost of showing more than 100 million video clips a day. Potentially most significant, Mr. Hurley pointed to a deal signed recently with Warner Music that he hopes will be a model for dealing with Hollywood and record companies from now on. YouTube is developing technology that will identify Warner music used in a video that is uploaded. When the site plays those videos, it will share some of its advertising revenue with Warner and others with copyrighted material that is used.

Moreover, Mr. Hurley says, there is much more to YouTube than piracy. And professionals are creating programs specifically for YouTube: the recent series of clips posted under the name Lonelygirl15, for example, showed an actress pretending to be a disaffected teenager.

Others are not so sure. Doug Morris, the chief executive of the Universal Music Group, said at an investor conference recently that YouTube and MySpace, the social networking site, "are copyright infringers and owe us tens of millions of dollars."

And Mark Cuban, who founded Broadcast.com, an early Internet video site that was bought by Yahoo, argued on his blog that YouTube did not have a viable business other than piracy.

"It is absolutely reminiscent of Napster," Mr. Cuban said in an interview. "It's nice that they say 'it's different this time,' but it's not."

Mr. Cuban argues that the deal with Warner is unworkable because it is too complex, with so many parties with potential claims on videos.

Alex Zubillaga, Warner's executive vice president for digital strategy, said in an interview that these problems could be solved. "This is a framework that allows us to monetize our assets while we unleash the creativity of the user," he said.

Warner, he said, is reaching out to other major media companies to negotiate how royalties from YouTube will be split in cases where more than one song or video program is included on one clip.

Still, Mr. Zubillaga said, dealing with YouTube "is not the typical situation we run into every day" because the company has not thought through many of the issues raised by its business. "Part of what we are doing is working with them to figure out what their business model can be," he said.

Now 29, Mr. Hurley was a graphic designer at PayPal, the money transfer system. After it was acquired by eBay, he and Steve Chen, a former PayPal engineer, were looking for a new company to start. They decided to make a site that would help users exchange video files, much as many sites had been created to hold photographs.

Mr. Hurley found a backer in Roelof Botha, the former chief financial officer of PayPal and now a partner with Sequoia Capital, the powerful Silicon Valley venture capital firm that had backed Yahoo, Google and others. Sequoia is betting so heavily on YouTube that it has provided all of the company's financing so far, rather than bringing in other firms, as is common.

This was hardly a unique idea. There are several hundred video sharing sites. But YouTube took off quickly. Its technology was simple and easy to use. In addition, it tapped into the rapid growth of MySpace. YouTube developed a system that would allow anyone to insert a video directly onto a Web page. MySpace users leapt on this technology to show videos to their friends, and in turn they spread the YouTube logo throughout MySpace.

Last year, MySpace provided some 20 percent of the visitors to YouTube. That proportion has fallen sharply, in part because MySpace now offers its own video storage system. In the meantime, YouTube has established itself as the best place to look for videos, especially from professional programs.

YouTube gained a lot of notoriety as the place where users traded copies of "Lazy Sunday," a sketch that appeared on "Saturday Night Live" and became a cult hit. And much of the activity on the site is watching clips from "The Daily Show," "The Colbert Report" and other broadcast programs.

YouTube is relying on the Digital Millennium Copyright Act, which in general does not require Internet companies to screen material they store in advance. Rather, the law says Web sites must remove content when a copyright holder informs them of a violation.

But there are many who wonder how safe YouTube's position is. The Supreme Court ruled in the MGM v. Grokster case that music file sharing systems could be held liable for inducing users to violate copyrights. That said, many other mainstream sites, like MySpace and Yahoo, also post videos without trying to screen out copyrighted material. (Most do scan for pornography, though.)

Yet even Hollywood executives interested in finding a way to work with YouTube are perplexed about how to go about it. They are happy to use YouTube as a free place to distribute movie trailers and TV clips, but users prefer the very best bits of hit shows.

"The yin and yang of working with YouTube is you want to use them as a way to promote our programs but we don't want to give away the store," said John Miller, the chief marketing officer of NBC Universal television. NBC has bought advertising on YouTube and uploaded clips promoting shows like "The Office." And it has also actively demanded that the site take down clips from "Saturday Night Live."

Mr. Hurley hopes to be able to solve this concern by offering studios a share of ad revenue as it has for Warner Music. But for now YouTube does not have much advertising revenue. It displays graphical banner ads on some pages and text ads on its search pages. But Mr. Hurley rejects inserting commercials in front of video segments, an increasingly common advertising format.

Peter Levinsohn, the president of Fox Digital Media, the News Corporation unit that looks after Internet distribution of movies and television programs, said that YouTube's advertising revenue, typically measured in cost per 1,000 views, or cpm, appeared to be low.

"If they get a relatively low cpm, and give us the majority, there won't be enough left for them to sustain themselves," he said.

Mr. Hurley responds simply that the company is developing new, more engaging advertising formats that will lure people to watch commercials that interest them. And he argues that YouTube's bargaining power with Hollywood will increase along with its popularity.

"We have the most content and we have the largest audience," he said. "When people are making the decision to put a piece of content online they really do truly want to get it in front of the largest audience."

Seeks To Put Billions More Into Bankrupt Delphi (WSJ)

By Ianthe Jeanne Dugan

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

For weeks, senior auto-industry executives have been gathering at a Manhattan law firm to hammer out an agreement to bring auto-parts giant Delphi Corp. out of bankruptcy protection.

They have included Delphi Chief Executive Officer Robert "Steve" Miller and Frederick A. Henderson, chief financial officer of General Motors Corp., Delphi's former parent. But the man who has emerged as pivotal in the talks, according to several participants, is David A. Tepper, a blunt hedge-fund billionaire who has been a thorn in Delphi's side for months.

Mr. Tepper, 49 years old, is head of Appaloosa Management, a $4.5 billion hedge fund that owns 9.3% of Delphi's stock. Mr. Tepper, who grew up in a middle-class household in Pittsburgh, has gotten rich investing in America's broken companies and declining industries. He bought into the steel and coal industries when they slumped and picked up bargain-priced securities of firms tainted with asbestos suits.

"Are you a good guy or a bad guy?" his wife asked him one evening in May as they stood in the kitchen of their New Jersey home watching televised footage of auto workers protesting in front of federal bankruptcy court in Manhattan. Mr. Tepper says he told her he is not causing economic pain -- he is just capitalizing on it.

"These employees are facing an economic reality," he told her. "You can't manufacture profitably in the United States with these salaries. One way or another, these people will be displaced."

Mr. Tepper has been pushing a restructuring plan that could leave him in control of a far bigger stake in Delphi. After weeks of negotiations, the group is near an agreement under which Mr. Tepper would inject billions of dollars more into Delphi and wind up controlling up to one-third of Delphi's stock when it emerges from bankruptcy, people involved in the meetings say. An agreement would end a bankruptcy-court battle between Delphi, its stockholders and creditors, and GM, which still has significant financial ties to Delphi.

Mr. Tepper is betting he can make big money as Delphi cuts back its operations, which will be painful for some Delphi employees. Delphi wants to close many plants and lay off thousands of people. It also intends to cut wages and benefits.

The negotiations have not been completed, and the complex plan could come unraveled. Several people involved in the discussions say they expect an agreement to come perhaps by early October.

Delphi's Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing on Oct. 8, 2005, was the largest in a recent wave of car-related bankruptcies, making Delphi a prime symbol of Detroit's woes. Its efforts to emerge from court protection are being watched closely in Detroit. The company cranks out everything from air-bag triggers to satellite radios. It employed 177,000 people world-wide as of June 30, reported $26.9 billion of revenue last year, and is the biggest supplier of parts to GM. Some investors in Delphi claim that GM is still responsible for billions of dollars of Delphi liabilities.

Mr. Tepper is among a small fraternity of contrarian investors betting that the American car industry will return to profitability, much the way the steel industry did. New York-based investor Wilbur Ross, who made a fortune buying steel companies, has also invested in an array of auto-parts makers. Mutual-fund manager Michael Price has bought into Delphi and other parts companies. Billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian has a large stake in GM.

These investors have become flash points in the debate over the future of the car industry. In a June speech in Las Vegas, the president of the United Auto Workers, Ron Gettelfinger, said bankruptcy reform was needed to stop employers and "bankruptcy vultures" from "lining their pockets with everything of value and uncaringly destroying lives, hopes, dreams and communities in the process."

Mr. Tepper's Delphi foray illustrates how large private investment funds increasingly are affecting the fates of large companies and their employees. Mr. Tepper's fund buys stock and bonds in ailing companies, then leans on them to hammer out restructuring plans that will make his investments worth more. The process can pit him against existing management, unions and stockholders.

Mr. Tepper bought Appaloosa's stake in Delphi for just $16 million several days after its Chapter 11 filing, an investment that some people involved in the talks describe as his admission ticket to Delphi's restructuring.

"Delphi is an important example of the kind of thing David Tepper does," says Mr. Price. "He makes a contrarian investment away from easy money and fights to unlock profits."

These days, Mr. Tepper declines to comment on the restructuring because he was given access to confidential financial information about Delphi in the talks. His comments for this article were made before that agreement last month.

Appaloosa occupies the first floor of a three-story brick building on Main Street in Chatham, N.J. Mr. Tepper often shuns his corner office for a cluttered desk on an open floor where a dozen traders work. On his desk sit three plastic pigs. He jokes that he rolls them for guidance on difficult trades. If all three snouts point down, in the eating position, it's a signal to buy.

"The media says that hedge funds are the new masters of the universe," he chuckles. "We're just a bunch of schmucks."

Mr. Tepper still lives in the two-story home he bought in 1990 for $1.23 million, according to real-estate records. He owns no vacation home. His kids attend public school. On weekends, he coaches his daughter's softball team at a municipal field. He says he feels out of place at his country club. "I'm just a middle-class dad trapped in a rich man's body," he says.

He grew up in a small brick house in a working-class section of Pittsburgh called Stanton Heights, the middle of three children. His father was an accountant, his mother a school teacher. His father, who died in January, "was not a warm and cozy guy," Mr. Tepper says. "He worked all the time. He was underpaid."

His mother, Roberta, now 74, says her husband worried constantly about money. He played the lottery, dabbled in stocks, and often visited casinos in Biloxi, Miss. Twenty years ago, he won a $715,000 lottery jackpot, which was paid out over two decades.

"We were all very quiet and shy kids," says Mr. Tepper's sister, Sheryl Weitman, 50. "We were the fat kids." Mr. Tepper rarely studied in high school, he says, but he enjoyed talking stocks with his father and began dabbling in the market.

When he went off to the University of Pittsburgh, he worked in the library and began trading risky stock options to pay his tuition, he says. "It was such a gamble," says his brother, Scott, 45. "I told him: 'Why don't you just go to Las Vegas?'"

His sister recalls: "David always said he'd be a millionaire by the time he was 30."

Mr. Tepper met his wife, Marlene, while working for a mutual fund in Boston. In the late 1980s, they moved to New York, where he worked for Goldman Sachs Group Inc. helping build a unit to buy and sell "junk" bonds, corporate debt securities that carry speculative ratings.

Although he was very successful, he was repeatedly passed over for partnership, he says. In the early 1990s, "distraught" about the situation, he quit as head of junk-bond trading, he says. After trading on his own for a few months at a spare desk in Mr. Price's office, he started Appaloosa. His clients included both institutional and individual investors.

Since it began, Appaloosa has delivered its investors an average annual return of 33.9%, after Mr. Tepper's 20% share of profits and 2% management fee are taken into account. But the returns have been volatile.

In 1998, Appaloosa lost hundreds of millions of dollars when Russia defaulted on its currency and global debt markets were thrown into chaos. It was up 67% in 2001, then fell 25% the following year when junk bonds crashed. In 2002, Mr. Tepper bought into the bond slump, building positions in Conseco Inc., an insurance company, and Marconi Corp., a British telecommunications company. The following year, the fund returned more than 150%. Institutional Investor magazine estimated that Mr. Tepper took home about $510 million, and ranked his compensation second only to famed hedge-fund manager George Soros.

Until then, he and his wife had kept the scope of their wealth a secret from friends, relatives and even their three teenage children. "Everything changes when people realize how much money you have," he says. "I didn't want my kids to get spoiled."

In 2004, he contributed $55 million to Carnegie Mellon University's school of industrial administration, where he got his graduate degree. It is now called the David A. Tepper School of Business. It stunned some relatives. "Suddenly, everywhere -- in the supermarket, at the bank -- everyone was asking me, 'Are you related to David Tepper?' " says his uncle, Bernard Tepper, a former bakery owner in Pittsburgh.

"There have been times when I opened the mailbox and found a nice check," his sister says. "I call my mother and say, 'Check your mailbox!' Then we call Scott and say, 'Check your mailbox! David is having a good year!' "

Last year, he hired Ashlee Simpson to sing at his youngest daughter's bat mitzvah. And he bought his elder daughter a Lexus for her 17th birthday this year. "She's getting all A's," he says. His 19-year-old son asked him for money for a new Acura. Mr. Tepper says he told his son he would have to share the cost because his grades were too low.

Jon Corzine, his former Goldman boss, stopped in to see him during his successful campaign for the U.S. Senate. Mr. Tepper met him, but didn't contribute. "Maybe he was the reason I was passed over for partner," Mr. Tepper says. Mr. Corzine, now New Jersey's governor, says through a spokesman that he "was a big fan" of Mr. Tepper and didn't stand in the way partnership.

"In his position, you get to the point where people only call for money," says his sister. "It's incredibly difficult figuring out...who would be your friend if you weren't David Tepper the billionaire"

As the corporate scandals earlier this decade died down and competition among bottom-fishing investors for deals intensified, it became harder to find profitable niches. Mr. Tepper began studying the troubled auto industry.

Although more than six years have passed since Delphi was spun off from GM, questions remain about which company is responsible for pension and health-care liabilities for Delphi retirees. GM had agreed to cover them if Delphi was unable to pay, but Delphi had later agreed to release GM from the obligation. After Delphi sought bankruptcy protection -- listing $22 billion in debt and $17 billion in assets -- GM claimed in court that Delphi owes it money in connection with these liabilities.

GM's claim caught the eye of Mr. Tepper. He believed GM had no right to the money, and that its claim would be thrown out in court. Getting rid of that claim, he reasoned, would significantly narrow the gap between liabilities and assets and would allow Delphi to pay off its debts. GM has called the claims valid.

He saw other pluses. A big chunk of Delphi's revenues came from overseas, and those operations were not part of the bankruptcy filing. Moreover, the core of the company's business was electronics, which he felt would remain integral to making cars.

Often, holders of common shares wind up with nothing in bankruptcy reorganizations. But if this asset-liability gap could be narrowed, Mr. Tepper figured, Delphi's shares would be worth something.

"I saw a 10% chance of losing everything and a 90% chance of making money," Mr. Tepper said earlier this summer. "So, I had to roll the dice."

Days after the bankruptcy filing, he scooped up nearly 10% of the stock for about $16 million, and immediately began agitating to ensure that shareholders emerged intact. He blasted Delphi officials in letters, calling the bankruptcy filing a "sham." He fought to form a court-sanctioned committee of shareholders so they would have a say in the restructuring. A federal bankruptcy judge approved the formation of the committee, but a federal bankruptcy trustee left Mr. Tepper off it.

Earlier this year, Mr. Tepper decided on a friendlier approach. He called Delphi's chief executive, Mr. Miller, and invited him to Appaloosa's offices to talk. During their meeting, they began laying the groundwork for the current talks. Mr. Tepper agreed to stop trading Delphi shares in exchange for confidential financial information about the company.

In recent months, Mr. Tepper has raised $2 billion from his investors to inject into Delphi. Under the proposal being considered, the company's shareholders and bondholders would be given the option to invest new money into Delphi in exchange for a larger stakes in the restructured company, people involved in the talks say. Appaloosa is prepared to pump in billions of dollars, and the size of its future stake would depend on how much Delphi's other shareholders and bondholders invest, these people say.

The new money would be used to pay off debts and liberate Delphi from massive health-care and pension liabilities. In addition to Appaloosa, major shareholders in the restructured company are expected to include hedge fund Harbinger Capital Partners, UBS AG and Merrill Lynch & Co., people involved in the talks say.

U.S. Loosens Its Control Over Web Address Manager (NYT)

By Victoria Shannon

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

The Commerce Department agreed yesterday to loosen its control over the agency that manages the Internet address system, a move that experts called a big step toward private-sector control.

The agreement is part of a three-year renewal of the partnership between the government and Icann, the California-based nonprofit group that keeps technical tabs on the Internet. It replaces an agreement that expires today.

In addition to providing for more autonomy, the accord calls for a midterm review in 18 months, the earliest point at which Icann could become unleashed from government oversight.

“The top line is that this is a major step forward for Icann to become completely autonomous,” said Paul Twomey, the Australian who is chief executive of Icann.

Though much of the foundation of the Internet came out of American government and university research, over the last two decades the network has become a critical worldwide tool in commerce, communications and, for some countries, national security.

Countries in Asia and the Middle East in particular have strenuously objected to Washington’s effective veto power over Icann and have lobbied to put Internet governance in international hands.

“Internationally, the world will see that the U.S. government is beginning to walk the talk,” Mr. Twomey said in an interview. “The transition is now in the hands of the international community.”

The “joint project agreement” signed yesterday is meant to be the last of six that have given Icann the authority to keep the Internet running since 1998.

John M. R. Kneuer, the Commerce Department acting assistant secretary for communications and information, said other countries “should draw some heart” from the latest agreement’s goal to allow Icann to become a private-sector organization.

“Private-sector management of the Internet is demonstrably effective,” he said in an interview. “The Internet has become a massive global source of innovation and commerce, and all of that is because the D.N.S. system has been running uninterrupted.”

D.N.S. refers to the domain name system, which is managed by Icann through 13 so-called root computer servers and provides an address system that lets any computer on the network find any other one and pass along data traffic like e-mail messages and Web pages nearly instantaneously.

Paul Kane, chairman of Centr, a group of Internet country domain registries like .uk, agreed that the marketplace was in a better position to serve the global interests of the Internet than any single government or group of governments.

"The Internet today is run by private networks interconnecting computers around the world," he said, and "it is not in the private sector's interests to have an inefficient Internet."

Mr. Kneuer said he had had "broad support" from governments around the world for continuing to wean Icann from American government oversight.

Vinton Cerf, chairman of Icann, said in a conference call yesterday that the accord was a "major step forward" that defines "a rather new and different relationship with the Commerce Department."

Although Icann independence was also the goal of the agreement that expires today, Mr. Kneuer, Mr. Cerf and others said that the organization was not ready to be totally self-sufficient.

Icann has been criticized for not representing the Internet community at large and for not making decisions openly and publicly. No formal mechanisms to address these issues were announced yesterday.

Mr. Twomey said the role of the Commerce Department would now be "to consult with Icann on developing greater transparency and openness."

The American government would also continue to take part in policy developments through Icann's government advisory committee, "which is the way every other government does it," Mr. Twomey said.

Under the agreement, Icann no longer must report to the Commerce Department every six months; instead, it will file an annual report addressed to the whole Internet community.

US Keeps Control Of Key Web System (FT)

By Richard Waters In San Francisco

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

The US is to retain its controversial control of the internet's core addressing system, at least for now, though it moved a step closer on Friday to handing responsibility for this key part of the online medium to a fully independent body.

The Department of Commerce's continuing influence over the internet's root directory – the system that "glues" the global internet together, enabling a person anywhere in the world to find any page – came under fire last year from the European Union, which wanted broader international oversight. Icann, the body that runs the addressing system under licence from the US, has also been accused of secrecy, and of moving too slowly to extending the addressing system to languages other than English.

That has raised the spectre of rival, national-level addressing systems springing up outside Icann's root directory, which would fragment the internet into a series of stand-alone networks.

The commerce department has repeatedly said it planned to hand control of the addressing system to the private sector, but only when it was sure that certain principles in the system were protected, such as technical stability, security, and competition.

On Friday, the department announced a new contract with Icann that provides for continued government authority, marking a step back from the indication it gave at the time of the last three-year agreement that it planned to work towards full independence. But it said it still planned to give up control eventually, and the new three-year agreement provided for a review after 18 months to see whether Icann has yet met the requirements.

Icann itself called its new relationship with the US government "a dramatic step" towards full management of the addressing system through what it called a "multi-stakeholder model of consultation". It said the new agreement would allow it to act more autonomously, for instance by allowing it to set its own work agenda.

In congressional testimony last week, John Kneuer, a commerce department official, said a consultation process run by his department had revealed "strong support for a more specific focus on transparency and accountability in Icann's internal procedures and decision-making processes", as well as "the continued involvement of the Department of Commerce in this transition".

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

House OKs Recourse For Private Property Owners (WT)

By Chrissie Thompson

DOJ_NMG_0072061

The Washington Times, September 30, 2006

The House last night passed a bill that would enable individuals to appeal zoning laws in federal courts, giving private property owners additional protection that opponents say will benefit big developers.

Rep. Steve Chabot, Ohio Republican, said the bill that passed 231-181 responded to the Supreme Court San Remo Hotel ruling, in which the court denied property owners the ability to appeal state court rulings on zoning laws in federal courts. The hotel is in San Francisco.

"What has been taken from [owners] is the enjoyment of their property," said Mr. Chabot, who co-sponsored the bill with Rep. Bart Gordon, Tennessee Democrat. "If I say, 'That's your land, but you can't use it,' I'm basically taking your property."

Mr. Chabot said zoning laws fall under the taking clause of the Constitution's Fifth Amendment and require federal recourse for property owners pursuing compensation when the government takes their property.

Rep. Earl Blumenauer, Oregon Democrat, spearheaded the debate from opponents who argued the bill benefited big developers at the expense of others' property values.

"They basically flunked Property Protection 101," he said, noting that 35 state attorneys general opposed the bill, including Jim Petro, the attorney general from Mr. Chabot's state.

Mr. Blumenauer said zoning adequately protects property and argued local governments and state courts can best make decisions about local zoning disputes.

"They're going to federalize local land decisions anytime a big developer is told no," he said.

Mr. Blumenauer said most homeowners will not be able to afford lawsuits, and developers will utilize the bill to make money.

"This is a big, expensive proposition," he said. "Small communities are going to be worn down. They won't have the firepower to stand up to Wal-Mart or to a big owner of a landfill or to some national company who wants to put up cell towers in people's back yards."

Mr. Blumenauer predicted the bill would not become law.

"Luckily, it's not going to pass the Senate," he said. "I mean, those people aren't crazy."

Spinach Called Safe (NYT)

By Bloomberg News And William Yardley

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Consumers can now resume buying and eating fresh spinach, the Food and Drug Administration said. The tainted spinach all came from Natural Selection Foods, a vegetable grower and processor in San Juan Bautista, Calif., said David Acheson, chief medical officer for the Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition of the F.D.A. All brands that were affected by an outbreak of E. coli that killed one person and sickened 188 in the United States and Canada have been recalled, Dr. Acheson said. In Idaho, health officials said that tests showed E. coli in Kyle Allgood, 2, of Chubbuck, who died on Sept. 20, eight days after his parents said he drank a smoothie that contained fresh spinach. The state is conducting more tests to determine if the strain of E. coli was the same one that killed a woman in Wisconsin.

More Money Sought For Storm Research (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

The government should invest more money in understanding hurricanes because they are so deadly and expensive, according to a draft of a federal report. The report, from the National Science Board, recommends a streamlined, multiagency effort to improve hurricane science and engineering research, along with about $300 million a year in additional financing. Hurricane-related losses in the United States totaled $168 billion in the last two hurricane seasons, and 1,450 storm-related deaths were reported, according to the report. Meanwhile, annual financing for the Hurricane Research Division of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration has never exceeded $5.1 million, and its staff has declined by 30 percent in the past decade, the report states.

DuPont Deal To Aid Milford-area Wetlands (WNJ)

By Jeff Montgomery

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, September 30, 2006

The DuPont Co. will pay $700,000 to restore wetlands east of Milford as part of a proposed settlement with state and federal agencies for natural resource damages along the Christina River in Newport.

Under the multi-agency agreement announced Friday, DuPont's overall expense will total about $1.6 million for penalties, investigation reimbursements and other expenses connected with DuPont's Newport Superfund site, which straddles the Christina River just west of Del. 141.

Near Milford, the money will finance the purchase of an "environmental covenant" that will protect and restore 56 acres of land along the Mispillion River, east of Del. 1. Planned work includes stabilization of about 2,000 feet of riverbank, some channel improvements and elimination of invasive phragmites reeds across the property.

"This settlement will result in significant habitat improvements in the Mispillion River ecosystem -- home to many valuable natural resources, such as blue crab, Atlantic herring, spot and striped bass," said Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division.

Department of Natural Resources and Environmental Control Secretary John A. Hughes said ecological restoration was a "fundamental goal" for the agency, and said that the settlement will help to improve aquatic and wetland habitats in the Mispillion.

DNREC officials said Delaware Bay shorelines near the Mispillion are especially important to migratory shorebirds.

Greg Smith, public affairs manager for DuPont's Corporate Remediation Group, said DuPont and the agencies involved considered 38 other sites in the state before settling on the Mispillion property. It will be protected from development and deeded to the state after the owner's death.

Federally supervised cleanup work at DuPont's Newport site targeted a former pigment plant, a 7 acre landfill on the north side of the river and a 15 acre dump on the south side. Actions taken along the river included installation of buried steel sheet wall to stop contamination from entering the river, dredging of the river and nearby wetlands, and development of permanent caps for the landfills.

The deal does require federal court approval. Contact Jeff Montgomery at 678-4277 or jmontgomery@delawareonline.com.

EXPENSIVE CLEANUP

The DuPont Co. already has spent millions of dollars restoring wetlands, treating groundwater, removing contamination, and cleaning up and capping landfill on property formerly used for pigment production and waste disposal in Newport. Those projects included work that officials said "vastly improved" the habitat for fisheries and other aquatic life in the Christina River and wetlands near the site.

Big Cat Owner Says Proposal Overdone (PVT)

By Mark Waite

Pahrump Valley (NV) Times, September 30, 2006

A lot of residences bear the sign "Beware of dog," but in front of Zuzana Kukol's house is a sign that warns, "Beware of cat."

In this case, the cat isn't an ordinary Siamese, Maltese or tabby cat, but an eight-year-old, 350-pound white tiger named "Pepper."

Lately, Pepper has been a little jealous about the attention paid by her owner to "Bam Bam," a 10-month-old 110-pound African lion.

To complete the menagerie, Kukol also has an ocelot and a bobcat on her spacious property located in a remote part of Pahrump Valley.

Despite her overwhelming power and size, "Pepper" was hiding in her spacious cage when a reporter arrived for a visit, afraid of a strange human. That same fear of the unknown is what Kukol thinks is behind strict new regulations on exotic animal owners that are a major part of the proposed Nye County Animal Ordinance that will be discussed by county commissioners at 10 a.m. Tuesday.

Kukol showed a copy of a handout that urges: "Punish someone for deeds, not breeds."

"Go after the bad exotic owners," she said. "Why punish us for someone else's act?"

Kukol was referring to Gert Abby Hedengran, 58, and his wife Roena Emma Hedengran, 54, who recently moved to Pahrump. The Hedengrans were arrested March 16, 2005, at their former home in Moorpark, Calif., in Ventura County, after a Siberian tiger escaped and roamed for three weeks before being shot near an elementary school and public park in a residential neighborhood.

There were rumors of dangerous animals on the loose in Pahrump last December around the Hedengrans property. The Nye County Sheriff's Department and Nye County Emergency Services responded to the call, a Mercy Air helicopter even flew overhead, but no exotic animals were loose.

"Their housing is excellent," Debbie Pemberton, Nye County Animal Control Supervisor, told the Pahrump Valley Times. "I do not have any concerns with these animals getting out."

DOJ_NMG_0072063

Pemberton, who compiled the ordinance draft, said she thought the alert came from nervous neighbors, after they heard lions roaring. At the time she said the Hedengrans had four or five caged lions and tigers as well as 14 smaller cats, like lynx and snow leopards.

"What happens if one of these animals gets out? It happened in California. It's a huge liability there," she said.

Gert Hedengran agreed to plead guilty to one felony count of making a false statement and one felony count of obstruction of justice in a plea agreement. The Justice Department claims Hedengran misled and obstructed officers who were attempting to track down and capture the tiger.

He also pleaded guilty to misdemeanor counts of improper transportation of exotic felines; improper handling of exotic felines, in a manner causing physical and emotional trauma; and exhibition of exotic felines without a license.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Central District of California, said U.S. District Judge George H. King had some questions about the vagueness of the animal welfare charges in the misdemeanor counts.

The only reaction to a reporter's visit at Kukol's house was some growling from Pepper. The lion club was led out of his cage briefly for some photos, during which he endured some provoking from a Doberman. When Bam Bam reaches maturity, a trip out of the cage would be less likely. He will probably weigh 400 pounds and boast a beautiful mane.

Kukol said she agrees with provisions requiring double doors and perimeter fencing but complained about requirements for a $1 million liability insurance policy and notification of neighbors within one mile.

"Don't treat us like pedophiles, telling everybody within one mile," Kukol said. "I've been here six years. My current neighbors like me. Why put me at the mercy of new neighbors? This county, there's so few people here. Why are they trying to regulate us like this? People move here for freedom."

Kukol said no animal should be at large, regardless of species.

She sought to dispel some of the hysteria about exotic animals. In Clark County, animal control reported 29 bites by animals other than dogs and cats, which includes horses, 3 percent of the total. Nationally, nine fatalities involved exotic mammals (over half by elephants) out of 227 fatalities reported from all animal attacks between 1992 and 1997.

It's a matter of scale, Kukol indicated, saying a $1 million liability insurance policy would be applicable to some place like the Lowry Park Zoo in Tampa, Fla.

A Web site by the People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, PETA, reported 16 people were fatally mauled by big cats between 1990 and 2006, or one per year. All the deaths occurred on the property where the animals were kept, Kukol said.

While Kukol lives some distance away from her nearest neighbor, LDO Management has submitted plans for 42 lots on 84 acres near her home.

"Here we have two people per square mile. Why do we need all these ordinances?" she asked. "In Clark County they adopted a new ordinance in 2003, and they formed an animal control board where exotic animal owners have input."

Kukol said Clark County has gradually reduced its liability insurance requirements down to from $10,000 to $50,000, depending on the size of the cat. She said there are only a few companies in the country who offer the insurance. A $1 million policy would require $3,000 in premiums per year, with a $10,000 deductible.

"If the regulations get so tough, sometimes it means a ban. People can't afford the insurance," Kukol said.

She said Pemberton's draft ordinance is based on an old Clark County ordinance, "which they never passed because it's so horrible."

Then there would be a $500 initial fee and a $250 annual permit fee. Nye County deputies would also be inspecting the facilities twice annually, while the animal control board would have authority to revoke her permit.

"You're subject to their mercy at any time," Kukol said. "Why? Because there's one idiot who shouldn't even be here if California officials were doing their job?"

Kukol said she doesn't need a federal license because she doesn't exhibit her lion and tiger as a commercial activity. She has a state license for the bobcat, which is a native species.

Pemberton said she's paying keen attention to the Hedengrans' case. She said the reason people like the Hedengrans are in Pahrump is because of a lack of ordinances on exotic animals. Existing county ordinances require exotic animal owners to get a permit, but she said, "The sheriff's office has never seen one, and they never issued a permit.

"If everyone with animals had a setup like Zuzana got, we wouldn't have an issue. If everyone was as conscientious as Zuzana is, we wouldn't have an issue," Pemberton said. "We're talking public safety here. One of these big cats get out, we're in a big deal of hurt."

Among a few other residents who harbor such animals, Pemberton said Brian Turner owns a couple cougars. But Carl Beck, who owned tigers and used to perform in magic shows on the Las Vegas strip, has moved out of Pahrump. Jeanie Stevenson, who brought a lion, tiger, cougar and four bobcats to Pahrump, has also left.

"They're my pets," Kukol said.

When it comes to Pepper, Kukol added, "I still go to the cage, I don't let her hug me. But Bam Bam, I could hug him forever."

Statistics Show Native Women Most Abused Group In U.S. (ADS)

By Jodi Rave

Arizona Daily Sun, September 30, 2006

MISSOULA, Mont. -- The report, when it was released in 1999, could have been a call to action:

Native women are raped, abused, stalked and murdered more than any other group in the country.

It wasn't.

"When those statistics came out, there was no cry. There was no outrage," said Karen Artichoker, director of Sacred Circle, a crisis center in Rapid City, S.D.

But in the years since the Bureau of Justice report was released, longtime activists like Artichoker redirected their efforts and took their cause to the nation's leaders. And they've successfully blazed a trail on behalf of Native women.

Tribal leaders, through the National Congress of American Indians, have since joined with more than 30 tribal domestic violence coalitions across Indian Country.

Together, they spurred Congress to action. The result: In January, President Bush reauthorized the 2005 Violence Against Women Act, which contained an important and unprecedented provision specifically aimed at making life safer for indigenous women.

The Violence Against Women Act's Safety for Indian Women provision could dramatically improve the way the Justice Department's Office on Violence Against Women provides services to tribes around the country.

Justice Department officials met Sept. 19 with tribal leaders and anti-domestic violence coalitions in Minnesota for a first-ever government-to-government consultation to discuss safety for Native women.

"The turnout from Indian Country was so incredible," said Jacquelyn Johnson, NCAI executive director. "Every seat was filled. Every region was represented."

And all voices were heard.

"It was so powerful," said Juana Majel, a Pauma Band of Luiseno Mission Indians tribal leader from California and chair of the NCAI domestic violence task force.

"There are moments in time in Indian history and you're glad you were a witness. It was DOJ's first time out the door and it seemed like it was going to be more a 'talking-to,' but DOJ said, 'No, this is your time.'"

As the first year of the new Safety for Indian Women program begins, discussion centered on some of the act's most profound provisions, including federal imprisonment for habitual offenders, increased funding for tribes and organizations battling domestic violence, a revamped grant application process, domestic violence research and creation of an Indian Country sex-offender registry.

The registry will make it easier to track habitual offenders, who will now be subject to stiffer penalties.

For example, a person of any race who commits a third offense against a Native woman within tribal jurisdiction -- including crimes of domestic and dating violence, stalking and sexual assault -- will be tried in federal court.

Previously, a tribe could only give a one-year sentence. A third-time crime is now punishable with between five and 10 years in prison.

"The third offense becomes a federal offense," said Majel. "That's huge. That's the law now."

In the past, tribes did what they could with little money to bring protection and healing to women in their communities.

"Many tribes are so impoverished that it's nearly impossible to develop this full-spectrum response without the resources," said Sarah Deer, a Tribal Law and Policy Institute attorney in Minneapolis.

But Title IX of the Violence Against Women Act promises to infuse millions of dollars into organizations, including tribal programs providing domestic violence services for Native women.

Majel is encouraged by the financial support provision in the act.

"What's so powerful about it, for the first time in legislative history, when we went to speak to our counterparts, our non-Native sisterhood out there ... they realized our journey was such that we weren't getting fair representation in the programs," Majel said.

"They actually set aside money in their grants, 10 percent across the board, in support of us in adding the Indian title."

The act also provided an additional $2.5 million -- funding for research, a baseline study, and criminal tracking and registry systems.

It's still unclear how the registry will work, but one goal is to track serial offenders who travel between tribal nations.

"We are not required to have a government relationship with each other, but it would be wise of us to do so," said Majel.

DOJ_NMG_0072065

The House of Representatives has so far failed to include the needed $2.5 million allocation in the 2007 appropriations bill. The Senate is still debating the president's budget as well.

"I'm dedicated and our office is dedicated and so is our attorney general," said Diane Stuart, director of the Justice Department's Office of Violence Against Women. "Specifically, he and I have spoken about violence against Indian women and we'll do all we can to further their safety."

Since Stuart announced she will retire in October, tribal leaders have voiced their concern about moving forward.

"The message overall was that tribes are engaged and this is an important issue to our communities," Johnson said. "We believe there needs to be ongoing dialogue. This can't be a one-time consultation."

It's hoped another touted section of Title IX -- the creation of a deputy director of tribal affairs in the Office of Violence Against Women -- will allow for a seamless transition. The job is yet unfilled but is being advertised.

"Right now there's not a consistent person in the office that deals solely with tribal governments," Deer said.

Prior to the new provision, tribes often avoided the Violence Against Women Office's complicated grant process. Now, four staff members will work specifically with tribes requesting grants.

Artichoker, who also served on the National Congress of American Indians domestic violence task force, looks forward to the coming changes.

And she's ready to embrace the day when Native communities restore relationship balance in the home. The traditional knowledge of family relationships can be recovered, she said.

Energy Bills Don't Reach Finish Line In Congress (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

When oil prices punched through $75 a barrel and gasoline topped $3 a gallon five months ago, members of Congress offered a raft of proposals, ranging from more U.S. drilling to windfall profits taxes to antitrust investigations. They railed against oil executives' pay packages, and some called for higher gasoline mileage standards.

Five months later, long after "Energy Week" came and went in the House of Representatives, Congress is heading home without adopting any significant legislation on energy.

Most notably, the Senate and House failed to bridge differences over how much offshore oil and gas drilling to allow on the Outer Continental Shelf, with angry negotiators blaming each other for the collapse of talks early yesterday.

Offshore drilling made it further than other energy proposals that came up during the long, hot summer of high gasoline prices. Among the ideas that failed to gain traction in Congress: a bipartisan move to raise mileage standards led by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) and others, and a White House request for clearer authority to set fuel efficiency targets under the Corporate Average Fuel Economy (CAFE) program. The CAFE fuel economy standard hasn't changed since 1985. About half of U.S. oil consumption goes to automobiles.

"The president started the year by saying we're 'addicted' to oil in the State of the Union address, and yet another year passed without any action on U.S. oil use and specifically on improving U.S. fuel economy," said Paul W. Bledsoe, director of communications and strategy at the National Commission on Energy Policy.

Efforts to open up U.S. coastal areas for drilling held out the most promise for legislation. Both chambers voted over the summer to add acreage for drilling -- and give states a big share of federal royalties. But the Senate limited itself to a single major lease area in the Gulf of Mexico; the House voted to open up the entire Atlantic and Pacific coasts at least 100 miles from shore and to let states choose to allow drilling as close as three miles from shore. Those coasts were closed to new oil and gas drilling after the Santa Barbara, Calif. oil spill a generation ago.

House negotiators, led by Resources Committee Chairman Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), held out for offshore drilling outside the Gulf of Mexico, while Senate leaders bluntly declared that they could not muster enough votes for that.

"He keeps asking us to do something that is politically impossible for us to do," Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.) said during the week. She played a key role in forging a compromise in the Senate, and her state stands to gain hundreds of millions of dollars of royalties from new drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. "I frankly wish there were more support for drilling off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts," she said, "but the political reality is that there is not. Period. The end."

House leaders said that the Senate version, which would have opened up 8.3 million acres in Gulf of Mexico federal lease 181 and adjacent deeper water to the south, didn't go far enough. They wanted a state to set a precedent outside the Gulf to generate broader support for offshore drilling when other states saw how much revenue could be earned. House leaders proposed opening up areas off the coasts of five states considered most friendly to drilling -- Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia and Alaska. Later they discussed making it Virginia alone.

But talks broke down in the end over maps of the offshore state boundaries in what are now federal waters. A deal involving Virginia also would have injected new controversy into the closely contested Senate race there.

Lobbyists for more offshore drilling had earlier urged lawmakers to work things out. "For the first time in 20 years, the Congress has taken action. I'd hate to get three-quarters of the way around the bases and be left standing on third base," said Jack Gerard, president of the American Chemistry Council, an association of chemical companies.

Rep. John E. Peterson (R-Pa.), a leader of the push for wider offshore drilling, said yesterday that House leaders decided to wait for lawmakers to return after the elections. "We're hoping when we get back we can move the ball," he said. "There will be more vehicles in the lame duck than now."

That's a gamble though, especially if Democrats win back the House in November. " 'Wait for the lame duck' always strikes me as a desperate rallying cry," said Bledsoe.

Not everyone was disappointed about the sinking prospect of an offshore drilling bill. "The gridlock," said Athan Manuel, lands protection director at the Sierra Club, which opposes both versions of the bill, "from the environmental perspective is good."

The House can blame the Senate for another part of the gridlock. It adopted another energy measure that failed to get Senate support: one that would open part of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil exploration.

Peterson said that the recent easing of oil and gas prices was a factor in blunting the impetus for energy legislation. "That always hurts," he said. But he warned, "We're just another storm away, another pipeline problem away, from high prices."

Fuel For Thought (NYT)

If the world is going to reduce the quantity of greenhouse gases spewed into the atmosphere, every industry has to find ways to use energy more efficiently. One of the most common-sense proposals we have heard lately comes from Sir Richard Branson, chairman of Virgin Atlantic airline.

As passengers on late-departing flights are only too aware, jets taxi between the gate and the runway sometimes for an hour or longer. And they do it with their giant engines burning fuel the entire time. Sir Richard proposes simply that an aircraft's engines remain off until the plane is ready for takeoff.

Under his proposal, tugs would pull the airplanes from the gates to a holding area near the end of the runway. This would reduce the pollution generated by the waiting planes. Not only does that help the effort against global warming, it also benefits the health of those living nearby.

Like any new system, there would be kinks to work out, such as how to power systems like air-conditioning or heating while the plane waited. The biggest hurdle of all may be bureaucratic, because of the many different companies and regulatory bodies represented at each location. But airlines should get behind the proposal because it would save fuel, which in the end would mean saving money.

Virgin says it is working with London's Gatwick and Heathrow airports to try to get trial programs up and running. We hope that Kennedy, LaGuardia and Newark get involved as well. An official at the Port Authority said it would embrace the opportunity, and pointed out that the authority has applied for a grant to acquire electric-powered tow vehicles. With a little cooperation, substantial reductions in airport ground pollution are within reach.

When Sir Richard pledged last week to invest $3 billion over 10 years to fight global warming, some questioned whether it was one of his many publicity stunts. This new proposal should allay doubts about his commitment and seriousness. Ultimately, private enterprise must play a critical role in moving away from an economy powered by fossil fuels and toward a sustainable one run on alternative power sources. The more entrepreneurs like the brash Sir Richard get involved in green business, the faster we will end our reliance on petroleum.

But the actions of private citizens and businesses do not absolve the government of responsibility to act decisively. The United States government still needs to regulate emissions of heat-trapping greenhouse gases. Only when there is a price associated with polluting the atmosphere with carbon dioxide will the clean-energy businesses supported by people like Sir Richard really take off.

Appeals Court Rules Bonds' Trainer Must Stay In Jail (AP)

AP, September 30, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal appeals court rejected a bid to free Barry Bonds' personal trainer, who has been jailed for refusing to testify to a grand jury.

The three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Thursday sent Greg Anderson's contempt case back to U.S. District Judge William Alsup to decide a key issue.

Anderson's lawyers have argued he shouldn't have to testify about whether he gave the Giants slugger steroids, contending prosecutors illegally tape recorded him.

Prosecutors say the recording was made during a face-to-face meeting and wasn't obtained improperly. And they promise not to use its contents when questioning Anderson before a grand jury.

The appeals court demanded Alsup rule whether the tape recording was indeed illegal but rejected Anderson's other claims. The 9th Circuit also granted prosecutors' request to seal some documents in the case.

Anderson has been behind bars since August for refusing to testify before a federal grand jury investigating whether Bonds committed perjury when he told a grand jury he never knowingly used steroids.

Anderson also served three months in prison and three months of home detention after pleading guilty to steroid distribution and money laundering stemming from the government's investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, which allegedly supplied Bonds and other elite athletes with performance-enhancing drugs.

Anderson is currently being held at the Federal Correctional Institution in Dublin, near San Francisco.

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Passes Bill On Building Border Fence (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29 — The Senate on Friday approved the building of 700 miles of fence along the nation's southwestern border, fulfilling a demand by conservative Republicans to take steps to slow the flow of illegal immigrants before exploring broader changes to immigration law.

The Senate vote, 80 to 19, came as lawmakers finished a batch of legislation before heading home to campaign. It sent the fence measure to President Bush, who has promised to sign it despite his earlier push for a more comprehensive approach that could lead to citizenship for some who are in the country illegally.

House Republicans, fearing a voter backlash, had opposed any approach that smacked of amnesty and chose instead to focus on border security in advance of the elections, passing the fence bill earlier this month. With time running out, the Senate acquiesced despite its bipartisan passage of a broader bill in May.

Congress also passed a separate $34.8 billion homeland security spending bill that contained an estimated $21.3 billion for border security, including $1.2 billion for the fence and associated barriers and surveillance systems.

"This is something the American people have been wanting us to do for a long time," said Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, whose state would be the site of substantial fence construction.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff praised the money for border security. He said it would "enable the department to make substantial progress toward preventing terrorists and others from exploiting our borders and provides flexibility for smart deployment of physical infrastructure that needs to be built along the southwest border."

Some Democrats ridiculed the fence idea and said a broader approach was the only way to halt the influx. "You don't have to be a law enforcement or engineering expert to know that a 700-mile fence on a 2,000-mile border makes no sense," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat in the Senate. Nevertheless, more than 20 Democrats moved behind the measure.

The fence bill and homeland spending were among security-related measures the Republican leadership was pushing through in the closing hours to bolster their security credentials.

On a 100-to-0 vote, the Senate earlier sent a $447.6 billion bill for the Defense Department to the president. It included $70 billion for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, a sum that will bring the total spent on those wars and other military antiterrorism operations to more than $500 billion.

Lawmakers also sped through a port security bill that would institute new safeguards at the nation's 361 seaports, while a Pentagon policy measure stalled in a Senate dispute.

"Passage of this port security bill is a major leap ahead in our efforts to strengthen our national security," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and chairwoman of the Senate homeland security panel.

At the urging of conservative groups and the National Football League, among other interests, the port security measure carried legislation cracking down on Internet gambling by prohibiting credit card companies and other financial institutions from processing the exchange of money between bettors and Web sites. The prohibition, which exempts some horse-racing operations, has previously passed the House and Senate at different times but has never cleared Congress.

"Although we can't monitor every online gambler or regulate offshore gambling, we can police the financial institutions that disregard our laws," said Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, who lobbied to add the crackdown to the port bill.

Because Congress failed to finish nine other required spending bills before the Sept. 30 deadline, the Pentagon measure also contained a provision to maintain spending for other federal agencies through Nov. 17 to give lawmakers time to finish the bills in a post-election session.

In an end-of-session appeal to conservatives, Senate Republicans also brought up a measure that could lead to criminal charges against people who take under-age girls across state lines for abortions, but they were unable to get enough votes to overcome procedural obstacles, and the bill stalled.

The atmosphere in the Capitol was somewhat tense as lawmakers were set to head back to their districts for what is looming as a difficult election. And the sudden resignation of Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, after the disclosure of sexually suggestive e-mail messages he reportedly sent to teenage pages, added to the turmoil.

The fence legislation was one of the chief elements to survive the broader comprehensive bill that President Bush and a Senate coalition had hoped would tighten border security, grant legal status to most illegal immigrants and create a vast guest worker program to supply the nation's industries.

Senator Saxby Chambliss, Republican of Georgia, said the vote would build credibility with conservative voters who have been skeptical of the government's commitment to border security.

"They have been under the impression that Congress has been a lot about conversations about securing the border and not about action," said Mr. Chambliss, who opposes the legalization of illegal immigrants and voted against the Senate immigration bill. "This is real action."

But Republicans and Democrats alike acknowledged they were leaving the country's immigration problems largely unresolved. The border security measures passed do not address the 11 million people living here illegally, the call for a guest worker program by businesses or the need for a verification program that would ensure that companies do not hire illegal workers.

And while Congress wants 700 miles of fencing, it was appropriating only enough money to complete about 370 miles of it, Congressional aides acknowledged, leaving it unclear as to whether the entire structure will be built. Dana Perino, deputy White House press secretary, said Friday that Mr. Bush intended to keep pressing Congress for a broader fix. She said the White House was hopeful that Congress would return to the issue after the elections.

With Senate Vote, Congress Passes Border Fence Bill (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Barrier Trumps Immigration Overhaul

The Senate gave final approval last night to legislation authorizing the construction of 700 miles of double-layered fencing on the U.S.-Mexico border, shelving President Bush's vision of a comprehensive overhaul of U.S. immigration laws in favor of a vast barrier.

The measure was pushed hard by House Republican leaders, who badly wanted to pass a piece of legislation that would make good on their promises to get tough on illegal immigrants, despite warnings from critics that a multibillion-dollar fence would do little to address the underlying economic, social and law enforcement problems, or to prevent others from slipping across the border. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) surprised many advocates of a more comprehensive approach to immigration problems when he took up the House bill last week.

But in Congress's rush to recess last night for the fall political campaigns, the fence bill passed easily, 80 to 19, with 26 Democrats joining 54 Republicans in support. One Republican, Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.); one independent, Sen. James M. Jeffords (Vt.); and 17 Democrats opposed the bill. The president has indicated that he will sign it.

Mexico's foreign affairs secretary, Luis Ernesto Derbez, told reporters in Mexico City yesterday that his country plans to send a letter strongly condemning the measure in an effort to dissuade Bush from signing the bill.

If fully constructed, the fence would span a distance equivalent to the distance between Washington and Jacksonville, Fla.

The Secure Fence Act authorizes the construction of at least two layers of reinforced fencing around the border town of Tecate, Calif., and a huge expanse stretching from Calexico, Calif., to Douglas, Ariz. -- virtually the entire length of Arizona's border with Mexico. Another expanse would stretch over much of the southern border of New Mexico, with another section winding through Texas, from Del Rio to Eagle Pass, and from Laredo to Brownsville.

The Department of Homeland Security would be required to install an intricate network of surveillance cameras on the Arizona border by May 30, 2007, with the entire fence set for completion by the end of 2008.

Under the measure, the secretary of homeland security would have 18 months to achieve "operational control" of the U.S. frontier, using unmanned aerial vehicles, ground-based sensors, satellites, radar and cameras to prevent all unlawful U.S. entries. Fortifying those requirements, Congress approved $1.2 billion in a separate homeland security spending bill to bankroll the fence.

That figure, however, is only a down payment and falls far short of the $6 billion the fence is expected to cost. Lawmakers from both parties conceded that even at 700 miles in length, the barrier would leave nearly 1,300 miles of border uncovered.

Foes of illegal immigration had clamored for the bill, flooding lawmakers' phones in the past week and sending lawmakers bricks symbolizing the wall they want on the southern border. Advocates of the measure called it a landmark step toward securing the nation's porous borders.

"Fortifying our borders is an integral component of national security," Frist said. "We can't afford to wait."

But opponents dismissed it as a political stunt, an international disgrace and an affront to the ideals laid out by Bush earlier this year when he called for legislation that would couple a border crackdown with new paths to lawful work and citizenship for foreigners seeking entry and for the nation's estimated 12 million undocumented workers.

"This is not a sign of strength and engagement, but a sign of weakness and fear. And frankly, speaking as an American, it's an embarrassment," said Kevin Appleby, director of migration and refugee policy at the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) taunted Bush for laying out an expansive vision of immigration reform, only to cave "to the radical anti-immigrant right wing of his party."

"It is a shame that after he went on national television to call for comprehensive reform, even after he went to Mexico this summer and said he was against fences, he is now willing to settle for this ineffective half-measure," Reid said.

Advocates and opponents of the measure said it is not clear that the fence can be built as the bill envisions. The Arizona branch would have to plunge down steep ravines and scale craggy mountain peaks. "This is not Iowa farmland," said Rep. Raul M. Grijalva (D-Ariz.). Construction is "going to be near impossible."

A vast stretch of the Arizona fence would traverse the lands of the Tohono O'odham Nation, which strongly opposes it and could bring suit, said Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.). Construction crews would have to deal with rivers and streams running north to south and wildlife migration routes that do not respect the U.S.-Mexico divide. And the Border Patrol does not have enough agents to stop smugglers from simply knocking holes in remote stretches.

"It's not feasible," said Kolbe, who is retiring from Congress at the end of the year. "It's a statement for the election. That's all."

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.) tried to amend the Senate bill to give the Department of Homeland Security more flexibility in the placement of the barriers, but House leaders resisted any changes to the House-passed bill. In the end, she settled for a letter from GOP leaders promising to revisit the issue when Congress returns after the elections.

An effort by Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) to moderate the bill's definition of "operational control" was also dropped. The bill defines operational control as preventing all unlawful entries. Martinez suggested dropping the word "all."

Passage of the fence bill culminated a year of sometimes-vicious infighting among Republicans, who were divided between the get-tough approach of the House GOP and the more comprehensive vision embraced by Bush and many Senate Republicans. In December, the House approved legislation to declare illegal immigrants to be felons, build a border fence, increase penalties for employers who hire undocumented workers, expedite the detention and removal of illegal immigrants, and create a vast database of lawful Social Security numbers and other indicators for employers to use to check the legality of their workers.

The Senate, led by a bipartisan coalition headed by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), followed in May with legislation that coupled many of the same border security measures with guest-worker programs that would allow illegal immigrants to find lawful employment and, eventually, citizenship.

But House GOP leaders never moved to negotiate a final compromise. Instead, this summer, they launched a series of politically freighted immigration field hearings that entrenched the House's enforcement-only approach. House Republicans saw the final passage of the fence bill last night as a victory.

Border Barrier Approved (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072070

The bill, which calls for 700 miles of fence and beefed-up enforcement, easily clears the Senate. It does not include a guest worker program.

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Friday approved and sent to President Bush a bill calling for construction of a 700-mile wall along the U.S. border with Mexico, voting overwhelmingly for a project that became the centerpiece of efforts to improve border security and stem illegal immigration.

Bush is expected to sign the measure into law.

"Most immigrants come to America with good intentions, but not all of them," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said in supporting the bill. "We need an enforcement-first approach … [that] allows us to get full operational control of our border."

The bill, which passed 80 to 19 and is identical to legislation passed by the House last week, authorizes the building of double-layered fencing in areas near Tecate and Calexico, Calif., and border towns in New Mexico, Arizona and Texas.

It also empowers the government's Homeland Security secretary to "take all actions … necessary" to stop "all unlawful entries into the United States."

The legislation's opponents dismissed it as a costly political gimmick that would have little effect on stopping illegal immigration. They also chided Congress for failing to create a guest worker program or to address the status of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the U.S.

The fence is "a feel-good plan that will have little effect in the real world," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Even before the bill passed, it prompted an angry condemnation from the Mexican government.

"We have indicated in a clear and unambiguous manner that the wall is unnecessary and that it is not a gesture that shows friendship between the countries of Latin America, the Caribbean and the United States," said Mexican Foreign Minister Luis Ernesto Derbez.

He said Mexico would send a note of diplomatic protest about the fence to the White House.

The debate on immigration dominated much of this year's congressional session, especially after Bush in a nationally televised speech in May called for a sweeping rewrite of current policy. He called for legislation that, in addition to increased border security, would create a path to U.S. citizenship for many illegal immigrants and a guest worker program as part of a broad effort to control entry into the U.S.

The Senate later that month passed a bill embracing the approach, but efforts to reach agreement with the House quickly reached a stalemate.

Republican House leaders objected to citizenship proposals as a form of "amnesty" for illegal immigrants and insisted that any legislation passed this year should focus on enforcement at the border. With an eye on the November midterm election, they argued that their view was in line with the sentiments of most voters.

After months of back-and-forth over the issue, the fence bill is the main result of the debate, representing a partial victory for House Republicans. Some other enforcement measures sought by the House, such as making it easier to deport illegal immigrants linked to gangs, fell by the wayside.

As part of the larger push to secure the border, the House and Senate on Friday approved and sent to Bush a spending bill for the Department of Homeland Security that, among other provisions, will alter the way Americans travel to and from Mexico, Canada and the Caribbean.

The bill, which Congress made a priority to pass before recessing for the November election, will require U.S. citizens to present a passport when returning from other countries in the Western Hemisphere, ending Americans' ability to cross these international borders with simply a driver's license or other forms of identification.

The provision, recommended by the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, is to take effect June 1, 2009.

The $33.7-billion spending bill also significantly boosts funding for border security and enforcement of immigration laws at work sites and elsewhere.

The bill will enable the Department of Homeland Security to hire an additional 1,500 border patrol agents and buy 6,700 more beds at detention centers for illegal immigrants. In the past, the lack of enough beds at these facilities has caused authorities to release some of the illegal immigrants they apprehended.

The bill also provides $1.2 billion to pay for border fencing, vehicle barriers and improved sensor equipment at border crossings.

The money "provides flexibility for smart deployment of physical infrastructure that needs to be built along the Southwest border," said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Estimates of the cost of construction of 700 miles of fencing range from $2 billion to $9 billion, so Congress will need to allocate more money for the project in future years.

Fencing over about 90 miles now runs along the border with Mexico. Some secondary fencing has been installed 50 to 200 yards north of the border around San Diego and Tucson.

The Secure Fence Act specifies that fencing extend 10 miles to the east and west of Tecate, Calif., and from 10 miles west of Calexico, Calif., to five miles east of Douglas, Ariz.

In other areas, the fencing would start five miles west of Columbus, N.M., and extend to 10 miles east of El Paso; extend from five miles northwest of Del Rio, Texas, to five miles southeast of Eagle Pass, Texas; and from 15 miles northwest of Laredo, Texas, to Brownsville, Texas.

The Homeland Security spending bill also makes it a criminal offense to build tunnels under U.S. borders, and includes prison terms for landowners who allow the tunnels to be built on their property.

The measure was sponsored in the Senate by Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and in the House by David Dreier (R-San Dimas).

Although Feinstein was among those voting for the fence bill, she was highly critical that it did not include a guest worker program, arguing that such a measure was vital to agriculture in California and other parts of the country.

On Friday, she joined with Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) in a failed effort to attach the program to the bill.

Labor shortages in the field are costing billions of dollars in lost produce this year.

Feinstein, noting that California produces about half of all America's fruits, vegetables and nuts, warned that harvest problems in the state would affect consumers in the other 49.

"I don't know what it takes to show that there is an emergency," she said. "I think next year we should be ready, willing and able to [create a guest worker program], but we will have lost one agricultural season. I just hope that someone will listen."

California's other senator, Democrat Barbara Boxer, also voted for the fence bill. Other prominent Democratic senators who supported it included Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Overall, the bill was backed by 54 Republicans and 26 Democrats; opposing it were 17 Democrats, one Republican (Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island) and the Senate's lone independent (James M. Jeffords of Vermont).

Some of those voting for the bill said they believed it could serve as a prelude to the type of broader changes in immigration policy sought by Bush.

"Many people have told me they will support comprehensive immigration reform if we secure the border first," said Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.). "I hope we can use passage of this bill as a starting point toward long-term, comprehensive immigration reform."

Immigrant advocates expressed skepticism that the 700 miles of fencing would ever be completed, given how costly it may prove. They also predicted the bill would have the unintended effect of hurting the long-term prospects of the Republican Party by sparking intense opposition among Latinos.

"I'm going to go out on a limb and say we'll never see a 700-mile wall along the southern border," said Frank Sharry, executive director of National Immigration Forum. "This is about incumbent protection, not border protection."

Cecilia Muñoz, a vice president at the National Council of La Raza, characterized the fence bill as "more symbolism than substance."

She added, "It's pretty clear to me it's going to have a negative impact on Republican prospects."

Senate Approves Fence For Border (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 30, 2006

The Senate last night gave final approval for construction of 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

The bill passed on an 80-19 vote. One Republican, 17 Democrats and the chamber's lone independent voted against the measure.

The bill "will have a real impact on our homeland security now and is a vital step toward fixing the problem of illegal immigration," said Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, adding that Congress also has increased the number of Border Patrol agents and detention beds for apprehended illegal aliens.

"This legislation will take us much closer to the operational control of our border that our homeland security requires," he said.

Eight Democratic senators who supported the bill last night switched their position from the previous day, when they voted to block the fence. They are Sens. Barbara Boxer of California, Thomas Carper of Delaware, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Tom Harkin of Iowa, Herb Kohl of Wisconsin, Barack Obama of Illinois and Charles E. Schumer of New York.

Many of the Democrats who joined Republicans on the vote either face close elections this November or represent mostly conservative states.

But for the most part, Democrats opposed the measure.

"We can build the tallest fence in the world, and it won't fix our broken immigration system. Nor will it strengthen security at our borders," Minority Leader Harry Reid said yesterday. "To do that, we need the kind of comprehensive reform that the Senate passed earlier this year."

The "comprehensive" legislation supported by Mr. Reid would grant citizenship rights to about 10 million illegal aliens already in the country and create a guest-worker program that would usher hundreds of thousands of new foreign workers into the country. That Senate-approved bill also would allow illegals to collect Social Security benefits accrued while working illegally.

That Senate bill also has many Republican supporters. But, realizing the comprehensive bill would not pass anytime soon, they supported last night's fence bill with the belief that at the very least the border should be secured.

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said yesterday that he has long been a supporter of "comprehensive" legislation and still is.

"The place to start with that is the construction of fencing and other barriers to prevent illegal entry," he said.

House Republicans, who approved the fence bill earlier this month, applauded yesterday's Senate action.

But several other border security measures that the House approved this month essentially died on the Senate floor last night, when lawmakers were scheduled to adjourn to campaign for the November elections.

Among them was a bill to require voters to provide a valid photo identification before participating in federal elections. The Federal Election Integrity Act was approved on a nearly party-line vote in the House. Senate Democrats have said they are adamantly opposed to such legislation.

Also left incomplete by the Senate last night were House-passed bills to:

·Give state and local law enforcement more authority to combat illegal entry.

·Close a decades-old loophole that bars federal officials from placing illegal aliens from El Salvador into "expedited removal proceedings." The provision, adopted during El Salvador's 1980s civil war, means that suspected illegals often are freed back into the United States to await deportation proceedings but never are heard from again.

·Allow federal officials to detain illegal aliens for more than six months if they are awaiting deportation. The same bill also would bar illegals from obtaining political asylum if they are found to be part of a "criminal street gang."

·Criminalize the construction and financing of border tunnels with criminal penalties of up to 20 years' imprisonment for those who knowingly construct or help finance an unauthorized tunnel across a U.S. international border. Under current law, it is illegal to cross over a border but not under a border. In recent years, 39 such tunnels have been found along the southern border through which illegal aliens and large quantities of drugs are smuggled.

Still, Senate Republicans said yesterday they had made great strides this year in securing the border.

"This bill continues a significant commitment to protecting our borders and improving our overall national security," said Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican who has helped lead the effort for tighter border security.

Senate Approves 700 Miles Of Fence Along The Border With Mexico (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Leaving President Bush's proposed immigration overhaul in disarray, Republicans on Friday won congressional approval for fencing nearly one-third of the Southwest border and prepared to head into the November elections with a tough border security message.

Rushing to finish work before leaving on a six-week campaign recess, the Senate passed, by a vote of 80-19, and sent to President Bush a bill for more than 700 miles of fencing. The House approved the bill in mid-September.

The legislation - which Bush has agreed to sign - was denounced by critics as little more than a symbolic gesture by Republicans to appeal for votes in their re-election campaigns. But GOP supporters hailed the fence as the cornerstone of a legislative offensive to plug the porous 2,000-mile border with Mexico.

"It's important that we demonstrate to the American people that we are serious about securing our border," said Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., "and it can't be done without the fence."

The proposed construction of the five-section fence - along with roads and vehicle barriers - has threatened to tarnish diplomatic relations with Mexico and has prompted resolutions of opposition from several U.S. towns along the border. Outgoing Mexican President Vicente

Fox has condemned it as "shameful."

The largest section of fencing would reach 361 miles from Calexico, Calif., to Douglas, Ariz. Three sections would be in Texas - a 51-mile stretch from Del Rio to Eagle Pass; 176 miles from Laredo to Brownsville and 88 miles stretching westward to Columbus, N.M.

A 22-mile section would be built near San Diego, Calif.

Texas' two Republican senators, Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn, both expressed reservations with the House-passed bill, saying it was not Congress' role to tell states where the fences should be built.

Hutchison had hoped to offer an amendment that would have allowed the Department of Homeland Security to determine location and need for border fencing after consulting with state and local officials.

But Senate leaders decided not to allow amendments to avoid sending the measure back to the House, where it would have likely been rejected.

House and Senate leaders assured Hutchison that they would allow modifications to accommodate her concerns after lawmakers return for a so-called "lame-duck" session after the elections.

Bush has vowed to keep pushing Congress for enactment of an immigration package that includes a temporary guest worker program and legal status for millions of undocumented immigrants after they meet certain requirements. But with time running out before the 109th Congress adjourns by the end of the year, the prospects of a breakthrough seem unlikely.

"We've abandoned principles and allowed politics to triumph," said Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., calling the fence a "political gimmick."

The Senate passed a comprehensive bill in May that embraced the key elements of Bush's immigration plan, including a guest worker plan and a three-tier program that would have put most of the more than 11 million illegal immigrants on a path to U.S. citizenship. But the plan was shelved in a stalemate with the House, which passed a strikingly different immigration bill focusing primarily on enforcement.

The fence was the most high-profile element of a late-breaking package of border security initiatives unveiled by House leaders following a series of summertime field hearings. Several other pieces of the package, including a bill empowering local officers to enforce immigration laws, have thus far stalled in the Senate.

Supporters of the fence say it will complement an initiative by the Department of Homeland Security to erect a "virtual wall" that includes an array of high-tech gadgetry, including sensors, cameras, radar and unmanned aerial drones. The department has awarded the contract to a team led by Boeing Corp.

Congress Approves 700 Mile Border Fence (AP-Y)

By Suzanne Gamboa, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Republicans will go into the elections with a message that they've made great strides fighting illegal immigration, including authorizing a fence along one-third of the U.S.-Mexico border and making a $1.2 billion down payment on it.

Among its final tasks before leaving to campaign, the Senate on Friday night passed and sent to President Bush a bill authorizing 700 new miles of fencing on the southern border. No one knows how much it will cost, but a separate bill also on the way to the White House makes a $1.2 billion down payment on it. A 14-mile segment of fence under construction in San Diego is costing $126.5 million.

The fence bill was passed by the House two weeks ago. The Senate vote on it Friday night was 80-19.

In addition to money for starting work on the fence, a homeland security bill passed Friday by the House and later by the Senate includes $380 million to hire 1,500 more Border Patrol agents and money to build detention facilities to hold 6,700 more illegal immigrants until they can be deported.

"We have made giant steps in terms of our ability to control illegal immigration," House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, told reporters.

The fence bill became House Republicans' immigration focus in September after they abandoned President Bush's call to bring millions of illegal immigrants into the American mainstream.

In addition to the money in the Homeland Security spending bill, Boehner cited Bush's deployment of the National Guard on the border and more frequent arrests of illegal immigrants at work sites.

"The perception that has been painted mistakenly is that the United States government, our Congress is not delivering to the American people on a huge problem that's out there," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. "We're active."

Democrats and immigration advocates say Republicans can hardly claim victory.

House Republicans failed to win measures for deporting immigrant gang members and empowering local police to enforce immigration laws. Their biggest obstacle turned out to be another Republican, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said the border security achievements trumpeted by Republicans don't measure up to the more comprehensive reforms her party backed. What the GOP calls achievements fall "very far short of what Democrats have proposed over and over and over again," she said.

After a debate that stretched over three months, the Senate in May passed a sweeping immigration bill that combined tougher border enforcement measures with new guest worker programs and a plan to give millions of illegal immigrants already in the U.S. a shot at citizenship.

Despite Bush's ringing endorsement of the measure, the House would have no part of it, sticking to the bill it passed five months earlier that would treat illegal immigrants and people who offer them aid as felons.

Rather than negotiate a compromise with the Senate, Republican leaders plucked out many provisions of the House bill for new votes in both the House and Senate over the past two weeks.

"It's been two years of high visibility, high volume debate in terms of which way to go in the immigration system," said Frank Sharry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum. In the end the debate ended in a tie, he said.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., called the fence "a bumper sticker solution for a complex problem."

"It's a feel-good plan that will have little effect in the real world," he said. "We all know what this is about. It may be good politics, but it's bad immigration policy. That's not what Americans want."

Sens. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, and Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., made a 11th-hour appeal to colleagues to include in the fence bill a measure to help the agriculture industry, which relies heavily on undocumented workers.

Those workers have become harder to find because of increased border enforcement and availability of jobs for the workers in construction and other industries, they said. Consumers ultimately will pay the price for that at the grocery store, they added.

"Pickers are few and the growers blame Congress," Craig said, reading a news headline. "The growers ought to blame Congress. They ought to blame a government that has been dysfunctional in an area of immigration that has been problem for decades."

Mexico To Lobby Bush Against Fence Bill (AP-Y)

By E. Eduardo Castillo, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Mexico said Friday it will try to persuade President Bush not to sign a bill that would extend a wall along the border in an effort to stop illegal immigrants.

Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez strongly criticized the legislation to build a 700-mile border fence, which the Senate approved Friday and sent to Bush to sign.

Derbez said Mexico will send a letter to the U.S. government strongly condemning the measure. Asked by a reporter if the government would try to "dissuade" Bush from signing the bill into law, he replied, "Without a doubt."

"We have pointed out in a clear and unequivocal way that it seems unnecessary to us and seems wrong," Derbez added. "We think it is a gesture that doesn't reflect the friendship between nations of Latin America and the Caribbean and the United States."

Congress has abandoned Mexico's top priority: an immigration accord that would have allowed more Mexicans to work legally in the United States. Bush had proposed a temporary worker program that would have given three-year work visas to those with jobs lined up in the U.S.

Instead, U.S. lawmakers have focused on increasing security along the border. The House of Representatives and Senate have maneuvered to speed construction of the double-layer fence along the U.S. southern border aimed at keeping migrants and criminals from entering the country illegally.

Derbez's remarks came a day after his office issued a statement saying the border fence would harm relations between Mexico and the United States. The Foreign Relations Department said that only comprehensive immigration reform would stop millions of Mexicans from sneaking across the border into the U.S.

"A partial measure that is exclusively focused on security does not deal with reality and represents a political answer rather than a viable solution," it said in the statement.

There are an estimated 11 million Mexicans in the United States, about half of whom are illegal. Last year, Mexican migrants sent home more than $20 billion in remittances, providing Mexico with its second biggest source of foreign income after oil.

For A Smuggling Victim, A Precarious Quest For Refuge (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

No one disputes that at 15, Ana Cristibel Sandoval was a victim of abuse and human trafficking, first by her family in her native Honduras, then by smugglers who drugged, raped and held her captive in a house in Phoenix in 2002.

But in the four years since the police found her there, one arm of the federal government has treated her as a traumatized teenager in need of care and refuge, while another arm keeps trying to deport her.

As immigration enforcement grows more aggressive, the case of Ms. Sandoval, now 19 and living in Freeport, N.Y., with her infant son, is in some ways typical of the government's conflict over how to handle the 5,000 unaccompanied minors apprehended in the United States each year.

But it took on unusual drama on Thursday, as the larger tug of war between the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Homeland Security played out in a windowless immigration office in Lower Manhattan.

After Ms. Sandoval, carrying her baby, reported to the office at 10 a.m. for what officials had called "a redetermination of her custody conditions," immigration officers insisted that they had to send her that same day to immigration detention in Phoenix.

The baby would have to stay behind, they said, according to Ms. Sandoval's volunteer lawyer, Andrew D. Morton of Latham & Watkins in Washington, who was with her all day and described events in cellphone calls and e-mail messages as they unfolded. He said officers demanded that Ms. Sandoval call her boyfriend, a construction worker, to pick up Jason, who is 5 months old.

"I told them: 'She's not calling anyone. She's not going anywhere,' " Mr. Morton said midway through a daylong battle that marshaled his law firm's influential contacts to keep Ms. Sandoval in New York with her child. In the end, however, her long-term situation was still precarious, suspended between the forces of law enforcement and child welfare.

Months after the police found her, bound and gagged, in the smugglers' house, the federal Office of Refugee Resettlement, part of Health and Human Services, arranged for her to be transferred from detention in February 2003 and treated for post-traumatic stress disorder and depression at juvenile centers in Texas and in Massachusetts, records show.

A family court judge in Massachusetts ruled last year that she had been abused, abandoned or neglected and that it would not be in her best interests to be returned to Honduras. That seemed to pave the way for her to seek a special juvenile visa, or green card.

But officials at Immigration and Customs Enforcement have battled Ms. Sandoval's lawyers at every step of her four-year legal struggle for permanent refuge in the United States. The crux of the government's case now, according to briefs filed at the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, is that Ms. Sandoval had no right to seek a juvenile green card without the prior consent of the Department of Homeland Security or the attorney general.

Patricia Vroom, the chief counsel handling the litigation for Homeland Security in Phoenix, said yesterday that she was not authorized to talk about the case. She referred questions to Russell Ahr, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, who said it was against the agency's policy to discuss it.

In the past, Homeland Security officials have argued that national security demands a law enforcement approach to illegal immigrants, regardless of their ages. In 2003, Congress passed a measure giving Health and Human Services responsibility for placing unaccompanied minors. But friction over the interpretation of the law has grown as a new influx of volunteer lawyers from corporate firms rallies to cases like Ms. Sandoval's, challenging government lawyers who are under pressure to win deportation cases.

On Thursday, Ms. Sandoval's deportation officer, Ricardo Perez, had seemed sympathetic to her, Mr. Morton said, telling him that if it were up to the New York office, she would be allowed to stay in Freeport and simply be required to report back periodically under an order of supervision.

"But they say Phoenix is calling the shots," the lawyer reported in a call late Thursday afternoon.

As Ms. Sandoval cried and rocked her baby, Mr. Morton demanded to speak to supervisors and sent frantic e-mail messages from his BlackBerry to colleagues and contacts. Calls ricocheted through the offices of congressmen and senators.

Inquiries for this article alerted Dean Boyd, the press secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Washington, and Mark Thorn, the agency's spokesman in New York.

Just what turned the tide remains a mystery. But about 6 p.m., Mr. Perez, the deportation officer, returned with news. As Mr. Morton told it, Mr. Perez said, "I don't know who you know, but they changed their minds."

It was dark when Ms. Sandoval emerged from 26 Federal Plaza, happy to be going home with her baby under an order of supervision.

"They wanted to separate me from Jason," she said through a translator yesterday. "They wanted to send me to Phoenix. But my lawyer wouldn't let that happen."

Still, she is frightened. "I'm afraid that they'll deport me," she said. "I have no one in my country; my mom is dead. I don't want to see my father. He used to beat me."

In a 2005 letter in Ms. Sandoval's court file, Theresa M. Rhein, a clinical social worker who treated her at a residential treatment center in Attleboro, Mass., described her as "very likeable, warm and engaging" and "very motivated to succeed in school."

She warned, though, that because of the life-threatening abuse the teenager experienced at the hands of the smugglers, she was afraid to be alone and had flashbacks, nightmares and suicidal thoughts that were often set off when she felt powerless and overwhelmed.

"Ana does not have any family connection and wants very much to be in a loving relationship," the therapist wrote. "This puts Ana at very high risk for placing her trust in someone who may hurt or manipulate her."

According to court documents, Ms. Sandoval's family, for its own financial gain, hired smugglers to bring her to the United States. Those smugglers passed her in Mexico to others who took her to Phoenix and who are now in prison.

When she turned 18, Ms. Sandoval said, and was too old to live in her group home in Massachusetts, she called the brother of a Honduran woman friend for help. The brother, 32, whom she had never met, drove from New York to fetch her and bring her to his home. He became her boyfriend and is Jason's father, and they live together in a small apartment in an industrial area of Freeport, on Long Island.

"I don't really have friends," she said yesterday. "I don't go out very much, because I'm afraid immigration will pick me up."

More Immigrants In Detention: Tacoma Center Getting Influx (SEATIMES)

By Lornet Turnbull

The Seattle Times, September 30, 2006

Unbeknownst to her family, friends and attorney, Maria Del Toro Chacon was suddenly moved this week from the Northwest Detention Center in Tacoma, where she'd been held for the past year.

Chacon — a Mexican national and mother of two — and 14 other women were not told where they were going, weren't allowed to take personal possessions and weren't permitted to make any telephone calls.

In the dark on Sunday night, she said, they were driven south in two vans that left the highway somewhere beyond Olympia, eventually coming to idle in an unlit, isolated area. In the back of the van, the panicked women cried and prayed — certain they were being taken somewhere to be shot.

They were transferred from the vans to a bus and taken to Columbia County jail in St. Helens, Ore., where they remained for four days before being returned to the detention center in Tacoma.

Movements like these, from and between immigration detention centers nationwide, have occurred with increasing frequency since this summer, when the Department of Homeland Security stepped up efforts to detain and deport illegal immigrants.

Chacon and the others were relocated, immigration officials said, to free up bed space for a new group of detainees expected in from another state. The move was also intended to relieve overcrowding that resulted after a flight to remove some detainees was canceled.

Under mounting pressure from Congress and the public to better enforce immigration laws and expel illegal immigrants, Homeland Security is moving to detain every illegal immigrant taken into custody by guaranteeing a bed somewhere in the country — anywhere in the country, no matter how far away.

It replaces a practice known as catch and release, in which immigrants picked up in areas with chronic bed shortages were released on the promise they would show up for court later.

Most, immigration officials said, never did.

As part of their new focus, enforcement officers are conducting more raids at work sites and scouring jails and prisons looking for immigrants — those here illegally and those holding green cards — who are nearing the end of their criminal sentences and are subject to deportation.

The end goal: to expel from the country every illegal immigrant without a legitimate claim to be here. Within a year, officials expect to have rattled many of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country, creating a disincentive for others to attempt illegal crossings.

Homeland Security was on track to remove 180,000 people from the country during the fiscal year that ended Friday, up 7 percent from the previous year.

"We're detaining them with full expectation of removing them and, depending on where they came from, that process can be very quick," said Gary Mead, assistant director for detention and removal operations with the Department of Homeland Security in Washington, D.C. Homeland Security wants to send a clear message, he said: "If you come to this country illegally, we'll apprehend you, detain you and remove you."

Under Operation Reservation Guaranteed, as it is being called, detainees are flown to wherever in the country a bed is available. As part of the operation, Homeland Security has relocated about 700 detainees a week across the country, Mead said.

In recent weeks, they've come from places like New York, Puerto Rico and Guam to the Northwest Detention Center, which opened in the Tacoma Tideflats in spring 2004.

The self-contained complex boasts a law library, recreational facilities, two courtrooms and a fully equipped clinic capable of rapid detection and treatment for tuberculosis.

"Headquarters is looking to see where there are open beds," said Neil Clark, Seattle-based field director for detention and removal operations of Homeland Security. "They'd call and ask: Can you guys handle this many? We're using the efficiencies of the system."

When the operation began in July, there were about 18,000 immigrants in detention nationwide, he said. The current population is around 25,500.

The stepped-up enforcement has led to a crunch on beds throughout the system, and the push is on to add more space nationwide. The Bush administration's 2007 budget calls for a 25 percent increase in detention beds.

In the Pacific Northwest, where the number of beds has grown from 150 in 2004 to the current 800, officials expect to add another 200 by the start of the year. Clark said admissions at the detention center are about 1,000 people ahead of last year.

Angry advocates

This aggressive approach has angered many immigrant advocates, who call it inhumane and politically expedient in an election year. Attorneys for immigrants grumble that people's rights are being compromised.

More than two years after the Northwest's 147,000-square-foot detention center opened, they point out, the Justice Department has yet to assign a judge to either of the two courts there, a shortcoming government officials call a "resource issue."

Hearings in the courts are conducted by visiting judges, while routine procedures, such as first appearances, are done through videoconferencing, common throughout the detention system.

"One of the most unfortunate side effects of the increase in detention is this huge backlog of cases," said Nancy Acevedo, an attorney with the Northwest Immigrant Rights Project. The agency conducts workshops at the detention center to help explain immigrants' rights to them.

Detainees are entitled to a hearing before a judge within 10 days, she said, but "at this point they're getting pushed out to three to five weeks."

At least 80 percent of people detained don't have legal counsel, she said, mostly because they can't afford it. "There are so many of them and so few of us," she said.

Some people end up waiting so long they simply give up — even those with a legitimate immigration claim, said Robert Gibbs, a Seattle immigration attorney.

"If Homeland Security plans to realistically keep people detained, they are not set up in terms of having judges and courtrooms in proximity to the jails to do that," Gibbs said. "Which makes my point: They don't expect any of these people to ask for hearings."

Outside the detention center on Friday, Community to Community Development, a Whatcom County advocacy group, rallied to draw attention to the hardships such arrests are creating for immigrant families throughout the state.

In raids across the state, from Bellingham to Yakima, workers have been picked up at job sites, including those that traditionally employ women, such as hotels and nursing homes. Many of the workers' families don't learn of their fate until the workers eventually call from Mexico.

"We're seeing a disproportionate number of women being taken," said Rosalinda Guillen, executive director of the group. "It's raising the level of paranoia in our communities."

"Back to the basics"

DOJ_NMG_0072078

Operation Reservation Guaranteed was launched this summer along the southern border and later implemented nationwide with the goal of detaining and expelling virtually every illegal and criminal fugitive immigrant that enforcement officials apprehend.

"We're trying to get away from letting people walk out the door without addresses," Clark said. "With the immigration situation the way it is in this country, as many beds as we have, we can fill them. We're getting back to the basics — putting stability back into immigration enforcement."

Homeland Security contracts with The GEO Group, a national detention-management company, to run the Northwest Detention Center and several others nationwide.

These facilities were never intended to be punitive. Often they are the last stop for illegal immigrants with a one-way pass back to their home countries. Detainees are held while they await an initial hearing before an immigration judge, or while their case is on appeal. In other cases, they are simply waiting on paperwork for deportation.

There is constant churn in these centers. Two flights a week remove about 200 detainees from the Northwest Detention Center, most destined for Mexico or Central America.

Their beds don't stay vacant long.

The average stay, Clark said, is 21 days. "There are many who stay much longer," he said.

Chacon, who is waiting out an asylum appeal, will mark one year in detention next month.

She had been in the country 14 years when she was picked up last year at her job at a health-care facility in Burien. Her friends arranged for her teenage daughter to stay with other friends in Arizona. Her son attends college at Gonzaga University.

"The waiting is tough. I'm ready to give up," she said. "That's the one thing that keeps me going are my kids."

TAX:

U.S. Rebuts Tax Preparer Who Says State Is Sovereign (NYT)

By Anthony Ramirez

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Garry P. Webb-Bey of Brooklyn is a tax preparer who sees tax-reducing tactics in behalf of his clients that other tax preparers might not see.

This week, one of his stratagems attracted the stern attention of the federal Department of Justice, to wit: getting big tax refunds for clients by declaring, unilaterally, that New York State is a separate country.

Wages earned in the state, therefore, are “foreign” income, Mr. Webb-Bey claims, qualifying his clients for the foreign earned-income tax exclusion.

The federal government, in civil court papers, disagreed, accusing Mr. Webb-Bey of fraud and interfering with the administration of the internal revenue laws.

For the record, the government has determined that New York State — admitted to the union in 1788 and the home of the nation’s first capital, at New York City — is not a foreign country within the meaning of the federal tax code.

Mr. Webb-Bey, 44, who was interviewed yesterday at his apartment building in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, said the government accusations were inaccurate.

Mr. Webb-Bey describes himself as “self-taught in the law” and said he was puzzled by the government’s action. “If someone makes a claim that is inaccurate, they would audit you and it is rectified,” he said.

In a complaint filed on Wednesday in Federal District Court in Brooklyn, the Justice Department sought the shutdown of Mr. Webb-Bey’s tax-preparation activities.

The court has not yet taken any action on the government’s petition for temporary and permanent injunctions against what they described as Mr. Webb-Bey’s business. For his part, Mr. Webb-Bey said that he did not charge his clients.

In the interview, Mr. Webb-Bey was vague about his principal source of income, referring only to “community work.” He did not elaborate.

The Justice Department’s tax division said in court filings that the Internal Revenue Service had so far identified 82 tax returns prepared by Mr. Webb-Bey and employing his novel tax argument.

The returns led to refund claims totaling more than $335,000 and actual refunds of more than $97,000, according to court papers. Mr. Webb-Bey has been preparing returns at least since 1997, the department said.

Because the refund claims are relatively small and spread over so many returns, retrieving the lost tax money is costly and vexing, the Justice Department said in court papers.

"Given the I.R.S.'s limited resources," the department said, "identifying and recovering all revenues lost from Webb's preparation of false and fraudulent returns may be impossible."

In court papers, the Justice Department said Mr. Webb-Bey told clients that only residents of the District of Columbia were required to pay federal income tax and that income earned in any of the 50 states was foreign income.

For example, in 2003, Mr. Webb-Bey prepared and signed a 2001 tax return for a New York City woman listing $68,704.77 in income, according to court papers. Mr. Webb-Bey is alleged to have used Form 2555, the foreign-income exclusion, which completely offset her income, leading to a claim for a tax refund of $4,932.87.

When Mr. Webb-Bey's methods were challenged at a hearing on Jan. 12, 2006, before the New York State Tax Appeals Tribunal, he asserted that "in order to be considered a foreign country, one must be present in an area under a government other than the government of the United States." New York dismissed Mr. Webb-Bey's assertion as "patently frivolous."

In the interview yesterday, Mr. Webb-Bey, who lives in the Brevoort Houses project in Bedford-Stuyvesant, said he attended the University of Buffalo in the early 1980's, but did not graduate. He recently added the Moorish honorific of Bey to his family name.

Mr. Webb-Bey said he assisted taxpayers because "a lot of people don't know what their rights are."

As for the government's denial of his foreign-tax argument, Mr. Webb-Bey said: "Basically, all this is their opinion and their assertions. I can't say whether it's true or not. I can't say they're lying."

Public records show that in 2005, the I.R.S. filed a personal tax lien of about $39,000 against Mr. Webb-Bey. In 1998, the New York State Tax Commission filed two judgments against him totaling about $4,700.

Asked about the judgments, Mr. Webb-Bey said, "I have no idea where they originated from."

Feds Force 3 Arizonans To Shut Down Fraud-scheme Business (AR)

The Arizona Republic, September 30, 2006

Three Arizona men who operated a tax-fraud scheme have been forced to shut down after costing the government millions of dollars in lost revenue, the Justice Department said.

A permanent U.S. District Court injunction was issued this week against Mesa tax preparer James G. Morris, barring him from promoting business trusts or limited liability companies as a means of evading taxes.

The Justice Department previously obtained injunctions against two associates, Dennis H. Lawrence of Tempe and Allen Vanderwey of Phoenix.

According to a Justice Department news release, Vanderwey promoted the scheme through insurance salespeople; Lawrence handled the paperwork; Morris prepared false returns.

Mart's Ex-owner Guilty In Tax Case (SJCP)

By Eileen Stilwell

South Jersey Courier-Post, September 30, 2006

Elliott Kattan, former owner of the Pennsauken Mart, pleaded guilty in federal court this week to income tax evasion and hiding money in two Israeli bank accounts between 1996 and 2000.

Kattan, 53, of Oakhurst, Monmouth County, was sentenced to probation at the end of 1997 for three years on a prior tax evasion conviction.

This time he is not likely to get off without jail time, said Ken Vert, prosecuting attorney within the tax division of the U.S. Justice Department.

When Kattan is sentenced Jan. 10 in Camden before U.S. District Judge Joseph H. Rodriguez Jr., he faces a maximum of eight years imprisonment and a $500,000 fine.

Rodriguez may honor a plea agreement that calls for at least 15 to 21 months in federal prison. Kattan also has agreed to pay the IRS $53,000 in back taxes, plus interest and possible penalties.

Kattan failed to report $134,000 in taxable income, resulting in a tax loss of $53,000 on his 1999 and 2000 tax returns. That money was found in Israeli bank accounts in the names of two straw corporations with headquarters in Panama, according to court papers.

All residents with offshore accounts in excess of $10,000 must report them to the IRS.

Kattan was unavailable Friday for comment.

The Camden County Improvement Authority bought the former Pennsauken Mart from Kattan through condemnation in 2004 for $13.2 million.

Kattan owned the 35-acre site at the intersection of routes 73, 90 and 130 for 16 years before the county claimed it. The original plan was to build a civic and convention center.

DOJ_NMG_0072080

After years of costly litigation and declining sales for the surviving merchants, the improvement authority closed the mart in January, displacing about 120 merchants. The site is slated to become a mix of housing and commercial properties though the authority still has no binding agreement with a developer.

Kerry Yobb, a jeweler at the mart for 25 years, recalled Friday some bitter fights with Kattan.

"I may have to take the day off to see the expression on his face when he is sentenced," Yobb said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Lawmaker Quits Over Messages Sent To Teenage Pages (NYT)

By Kate Zernike And Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29 — In six terms representing a wealthy swath of southern Florida, Representative Mark Foley, a Republican, became well known for his ardent efforts to safeguard the young and vulnerable, leading the House caucus on missing and exploited children and championing laws against sexual predators.

On Friday, Mr. Foley resigned abruptly after being confronted with a series of sexually explicit Internet messages he is reported to have sent to under-age Congressional pages. He stands accused of being the very kind of predator he had denounced.

“I am deeply sorry,” Mr. Foley, 52, said in a three-sentence statement released by his office, “and I apologize for letting down my family and the people of Florida I have had the privilege to represent.” The statement did not refer specifically to the Internet messages.

The first e-mail messages to one male page, sexually suggestive but not explicit, were reported by ABC News on Thursday. Mr. Foley, a member of the House Republican leadership, dismissed them as “overly friendly” but not inappropriate.

But by Friday, other pages had come forward with more blatant instant messages. “What ya wearing?” Mr. Foley wrote to one, according to the network. “Tshirt and shorts,” the teenager responded. “Love to slip them off of you,” Mr. Foley replied.

ABC News said it had read him other messages that were far more graphic. Within hours, Mr. Foley resigned in a one-sentence letter to Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida. He left the Capitol without answering questions.

The resignation threw Congressional Republicans off stride on the day they were breaking to campaign for the midterm elections just five weeks away. It also gave Democrats hopes of capturing another seat in November. Even by the standards of Washington, this revelation stunned Mr. Foley’s colleagues for how openly he had courted danger.

According to ABC, he exchanged instant messages with the pages using his initials and year of birth: “MAF54.” And he might have known he would be watched; the pages, teenagers in navy blue uniforms who open doors and carry messages and water to members on the House and Senate floors, are closely guarded, not only for their vulnerability, but because they have been the object of past Congressional scandals.

The page who received the first e-mail messages told ABC News that people in the program had warned his class to watch out for Mr. Foley. The page worked for Representative Rodney Alexander, Republican of Louisiana, and sent the messages to a colleague in the office with a note saying they had “freaked me out.”

Investigators would not say whether they were looking into the matter.

Mr. Foley’s rise in Florida politics had been striking. He told interviewers of getting hooked on politics after he moved to Florida from Massachusetts as a small child, watching people flock around the local congressman as he shook hands at a shopping center in southern Florida.

He started a small family restaurant at age 20 and by 23 was elected to the city commission in Lake Worth, a working-class town south of West Palm Beach. He was known as a tireless campaigner and was elected to the State Legislature in 1990, and to Congress in 1994, at age 40. He was appointed to the powerful Ways and Means committee and was named one of the party’s deputy whips by Tom DeLay, then the House Republican leader.

“He had a meteoric rise,” said Al Cardenas, a former leader of the Florida Republican Party who described himself as a longtime friend of Mr. Foley. “In a span of six years he went through an incredible ascension in our party. He worked real hard, he had a very engaging personality, and people took him very seriously at a young age.”

As a moderate Republican in Congress, Mr. Foley proved a good ideological match for his district, centered in the wealthy northern end of Palm Beach County. He was fiscally conservative but more moderate on social and environmental issues.

He spoke vehemently about the need to protect children from pedophiles. “We track library books better than we do sexual predators,” he said, arguing the need for the Children’s Safety Act, passed by the House in 2005.

Questions about his sexuality swirled beginning with his first run for Congress, when his opponent in the Republican primary sent out mailings saying Mr. Foley was gay. He was single and seemed uncommonly focused on politics. He sometimes referred to his sister, Donna, who often served as his campaign manager, as his "surrogate wife."

In 2003, when he was considered the front-runner in a crowded primary race for the Senate seat being vacated by Bob Graham, Mr. Foley gave a news conference to condemn rumors that he was gay but refused to say whether he was. A few months later, he dropped out of the race, saying he needed to spend more time with his father, who had prostate cancer. Many believed he had left the race to avoid questions about his sexual orientation.

"There were accusations made that he was gay, and clearly that had an impact on him deciding not to run for Senate," said Jim Kane, the chief pollster for Florida Voter, a nonpartisan polling organization. "He knew the scrutiny was clearly going to be much different once he stepped up a notch."

Mr. Foley reportedly sent the messages to the first page in August 2005.

Representative John Shimkus, Republican of Illinois and chairman of the House Page Board, issued a statement late Friday saying he had known of the first e-mail messages "in late 2005." Mr. Foley, Mr. Shimkus said, had said he was simply acting as a mentor, but Mr. Shimkus told him to cut off contact with the page and "be especially mindful of his conduct" with pages.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader, called late Friday for an investigation into who knew of the messages, and when. After Republicans criticized her move on the floor, the House referred the request to the ethics committee.

Although his current race was considered competitive, Mr. Foley had been favored to win re-election; President Bush won his district in 2004 with 54 percent of the vote. And yet the campaign between Mr. Foley and his Democratic opponent, Tim Mahoney, had been combative. Mr. Mahoney, a businessman and former Republican, sued Mr. Foley this month, saying Mr. Foley had defamed him in campaign advertisements.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had included the campaign in its list of "emerging races," or the 50 seats most primed for takeover. Mr. Mahoney, Democrats said, was a good candidate even before the scandal, with $1 million in his campaign chest.

State Republican Party leaders said they would meet with officials from each of the counties in Mr. Foley's district to nominate someone to replace him. But an election official in Florida said Friday night that Mr. Foley's name would have to remain on the ballot. Any votes for him will be counted for his replacement, the official said.

Rep. Foley Quits In Page Scandal (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Explicit Online Notes Sent to Boy, 16

Six-term Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) resigned yesterday amid reports that he had sent sexually explicit Internet messages to at least one underage male former page.

Foley, who was considered likely to win reelection this fall, said in a three-sentence letter of resignation: "I am deeply sorry and I apologize for letting down my family and the people of Florida I have had the privilege to represent."

The resignation rocked the Capitol, and especially Foley's GOP colleagues, as lawmakers were rushing to adjourn for at least six weeks. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) told The Washington Post last night that he had learned this spring of inappropriate "contact" between Foley and a 16-year-old page. Boehner said he then told House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Boehner later contacted The Post and said he could not remember whether he talked to Hastert.

It was not immediately clear what actions Hastert took. His spokesman had said earlier that the speaker did not know of the sexually charged online exchanges between Foley and the boy.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) took the House floor last night to demand an investigation into the Foley matter. But Boehner headed her off, calling on the House to refer the matter to the ethics committee, which the House promptly voted unanimously to do.

The news of Foley's resignation overshadowed an afternoon Republican ceremony hailing a military commissions bill, and it gave Democrats sudden hopes of winning the Palm Beach-based 16th District. Many lawmakers think Democrats are on the verge of winning control of the House in November, and an unexpected gain could prove crucial.

At the Capitol Hill signing ceremony for the commissions bill, a GOP campaign priority, reporters asked Hastert only about Foley. "He's done the right thing," Hastert replied. "I've asked John Shimkus [R-Ill.], who is head of the Page Board, to look into this issue regarding Congressman Foley. We want to make sure that all of our pages are safe and our page system is safe. None of us are happy about it."

ABC News reported yesterday that it had interviewed Foley, 52, about excerpts of instant messages provided by current and former pages under the age of 18. ABC reported that Foley, under the AOL Instant Messenger screen name Maf54, made repeated references to sexual acts and body parts. Foley's spokesman did not respond to a Washington Post request for comment on the ABC report.

Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), who sponsored the page from his district, said he had learned of some of the online exchanges from a reporter some months ago and passed on the information to Rep. Thomas Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Republican campaign organization, the Associated Press reported. Alexander said he did not pursue the matter further because "his parents said they didn't want me to do anything."

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the GOP campaign organization, said Reynolds learned from Alexander that the parents did not want to pursue the matter, AP reported.

Shimkus said in a statement last night, "in late 2005, I was notified by the then Clerk of the House," that Alexander had told the Clerk "about an email exchange between Congressman Foley and a former House Page. I took immediate action to investigate the matter."

In the e-mail, "Foley asked about the former Page's well-being after Hurricane Katrina and requested a photograph," Shimkus said. He said Foley assured him it was an innocent exchange, but "nevertheless, we ordered Congressman Foley to cease all contact" with the boy and to respect all pages. "Only now have I learned that Congressman Foley was not honest about his conduct," Shimkus said.

The news emboldened Democrats that they could gain the 15 seats they need to regain the House majority they lost in 1994. The Florida district's Democratic nominee, Tim Mahoney, has been running a credible campaign, raising more than $700,000 and airing TV ads for nearly a month, according to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. The committee said it is too late under Florida law to remove Foley's name as the GOP nominee on the Nov. 7 ballot, a circumstance that would greatly improve Mahoney's chances of being elected.

But Forti said lawyers hope they can replace Foley's name on the ballot. At a minimum, he said, party officials can designate an alternate candidate who would be credited with all votes cast for Foley on Nov. 7. "It's a very Republican seat," Forti said, adding that Republicans "can move forward" when they have a new candidate.

Florida GOP Chairwoman Carole Jean Jordan said in a statement that executives from each county in Foley's district "will meet to choose a replacement on the ballot." Possible candidates include state Rep. Joe Negron, she said. The decision, she said, is "very time-sensitive" because the replacement "would have the opportunity to get around the district and campaign in a very short amount of time."

Foley's resignation was startlingly sudden. He was a respected House member cruising toward a seventh term when ABC News reported Thursday that he had sent brief, chatty e-mails last year to a boy, then 16, who had been a House page. In them, Foley asked the boy's age and what he wanted for his birthday. He requested a picture of the boy and told him that he had just finished a long bike ride and was going to the gym. ABC reported that the boy forwarded the photo-request e-mail to an unidentified congressional staffer and wrote that the message was "sick sick sick sick sick."

Efforts by The Washington Post to reach the boy were unsuccessful. But he told the St. Petersburg Times last November: "I thought it was very inappropriate. After the one about the picture, I decided to stop e-mailing him back." The Times, which did not disclose the teenager's name, did not publish his comments until yesterday.

The e-mails were posted Friday on the Web site of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington after ABC News reported their existence. The liberal-leaning watchdog group asked the House ethics committee to investigate the exchange Foley had with the boy.

Foley, who is single, moved to Florida as a child and opened a restaurant in Lake Worth at age 20. He also sold real estate and moved quickly into politics. He was elected to Florida's House in 1990, to the state Senate in 1992 and to the U.S. House in 1994.

In Congress, Foley pushed bills to deport imprisoned illegal immigrants and to amend the Constitution so that children born in the United States are not automatically citizens. He also sought to increase the number of immigrants admitted as farmworkers. He obtained a Government Accountability Office report into irregularities at cemeteries and crematoriums, and he called for tougher regulation of funeral workers.

Foley chaired the House caucus on missing and exploited children and was credited with writing the sexual-predator provisions of the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006, which Bush signed in July. A photo on the White House Web site shows Foley among those attending the signing ceremony.

In 2003, Foley faced questions about his sexual orientation as he prepared to run for Sen. Bob Graham's post. At a news conference in May of that year, he said he would not comment on rumors that he was gay. He later decided not to seek the Senate seat to care for his parents.

Congressional pages are teenagers who live in a Capitol Hill dorm and attend a special school while serving in the House and Senate. The program generally is trouble-free, but in July 1983 the House censured Reps. Daniel B. Crane (R-Ill.) and Gerry E. Studds (D-Mass.) for sexual misconduct with House pages.

Congressman Quits After Messages To Teens Revealed (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

The GOP's Mark Foley appeared headed for reelection in Florida before the sex scandal.

WASHINGTON — In a setback for the Republican Party as it focuses on November's midterm election, a senior Florida congressman resigned Friday following revelations of explicit messages he sent to a male teenage House page.

Rep. Mark Foley, who came to Washington with the GOP landslide in 1994 and became a staunch supporter of the entertainment industry, issued a brief statement expressing regret and then left Washington, departing abruptly while the House remained in session.

"I am deeply sorry, and I apologize for letting down my family and the people of Florida I have had the privilege to represent," said the 52-year-old congressman, who is single.

He didn't address the e-mails — in which he asked the boy for a photo and described another teenage boy as being in "great shape" — or a series of sexually suggestive instant messages he wrote to male pages that were revealed Friday by ABC News.

Pages are high school students from across the nation who serve mainly as messengers for lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

The scandal added a tawdry note to the waning hours of a tumultuous congressional session, detracting from the efforts by Republican leaders to notch legislative victories as the party fights to hold on to its House and Senate majorities.

For the GOP, it also provided another embarrassment during a legislative session that began in January with the party trying to distance itself from lobbyist Jack Abramoff after he pleaded guilty to corruption charges — including charges that he had tried to bribe members of Congress.

Late Friday, the House voted unanimously to ask the Ethics Committee to look into the matter after a move by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to get an immediate investigation was turned aside.

Democrats have been embarrassed by their own scandals this year, with Reps. Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia and William J. Jefferson of Louisiana forced to give up committee assignments amid allegations of financial improprieties.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) did not respond Friday night to a report by the Associated Press that GOP congressional leaders had been warned nearly a year ago by one of Foley's Republican colleagues about potential questions concerning his behavior.

But Hastert was visibly uncomfortable discussing Foley at a news conference Friday afternoon that he had called to trumpet congressional passage of rules for questioning and prosecuting suspected terrorists.

"None of us are very happy," he said when asked about the Floridian.

Foley had been a clear favorite to win reelection in a district that includes part of Palm Beach County and stretches across south-central Florida. The scandal presumably boosts Democratic chances to win the seat, further clouding the GOP's bid to retain control of the House.

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats in November to secure a majority. With competitive contests underway in dozens of districts, Republicans do not want to face a tough battle in a district they had thought would be secure.

Foley's troubles began surfacing publicly last weekend when a blogger posted the e-mails sent to the page. News reports on the e-mails followed, including stories in Foley's district.

A Foley spokesman on Thursday said the congressman's relatively unknown Democratic opponent, Tim Mahoney, had engaged in a smear campaign by questioning the appropriateness of the e-mails. The spokesman said the communications with the page were innocent attempts by Foley to help out a young person.

But ABC News reported Friday that it had obtained copies of instant messages to current and former male pages in which Foley made numerous explicit sexual references. In one case he asked: "Do I make you a little horny?"

Foley — who had co-chaired the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus and championed a number of bills aimed at strengthening penalties against pedophiles and child pornographers — announced his resignation shortly afterward.

Under state law, GOP leaders in Florida's 16th District can select a replacement, but that candidate must run as a write-in; Foley's name will remain on the ballot.

Under a newly enacted law, the selected Republican candidate will automatically receive all ballots that are cast for Foley.

DOJ_NMG_0072084

"All of this makes this incredibly unpredictable," said Justin Sayfie, a former aide to Republican Gov. Jeb Bush who operates a political website in the state. "The normal rules of political prognostication don't apply."

Florida GOP officials plan to meet next week to select a new candidate.

With Foley's resignation, the GOP will be defending three House seats in November that once seemed virtually unassailable.

The party is struggling to hold on to the Texas seat once held by former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who abandoned his reelection bid and resigned his seat after former aides pleaded guilty in the Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

The GOP is also in a dogfight to keep the Ohio seat held by Rep. Bob Ney, who this month pleaded guilty in connection to the Abramoff scandal and has abandoned his reelection campaign.

Florida Congressman Resigns After Publication Of E-mails To Teen (MCT)

By Lesley Clark And Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Rep. Mark Foley resigned from Congress Friday a day after the publication of overly friendly e-mails sent to a former underage male page and the discovery of a series of explicit instant messaging sessions with other boys.

And as the Florida Republican's personal and political life began to unravel, the resignation added to the burden for his party to maintain control of Congress in the pivotal November election.

Foley sent a terse resignation letter to Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. His office issued a brief statement, thanking his district for electing him to 12 years of public service.

"I am deeply sorry and I apologize for letting down my family and the people of Florida I have had the privilege to represent," he said, making no mention of the e-mails that he sent to a 16-year-old page, in which he asked the page to send a picture of himself and noted that another page was "in really great shape."

ABC News reported Friday that Foley participated in sexually explicit instant messages with teenage male pages. In one exchange, Foley wrote: "Do I make you a little horny?" In another, he wrote, "You in your boxers, too? . . . Well, strip down and get naked."

ABC reported receiving the more explicit messages from other pages after posting the e-mails.

"When the congressman realized we had them, he resigned," ABC said.

Foley's abrupt resignation, which House of Representatives members said came after GOP leadership demanded it, comes less than six weeks before the midterm congressional election and throws a wrench into Republican efforts to retain control of the House.

Democrats, who need to win 15 Republican seats to regain the House, were struggling to gain traction against the popular incumbent in the Republican-leaning district. Foley's campaign on Thursday had blamed the release of the e-mails on his Democratic opponent, Tim Mahoney.

A spokesman for Mahoney denied any role in publicizing the e-mails. Spokesman Eric Jotkoff said the campaign learned about the e-mails when a reporter called to ask about them. That was followed by a posting on the Web site Wonkette.com and on Thursday by ABC News, Jotkoff said.

Foley's name is likely to appear on the ballot, though Republicans weren't conceding that Friday. If his name does appear, any votes he receives would go to a candidate chosen by the Republican Party of Florida, but Republicans said it would be difficult to win with his name on the ballot.

"Holding the seat is the least of my concerns right now, but it'd be tough to hold that seat," said Rep. Adam Putnam, R-Fla., chairman of the Republican Policy Committee. "Look at the shame he brought on the institution. Look at what he did to these kids, if it's true. These kids are given the opportunity of a lifetime to come here and serve in government. It makes us all look bad; it makes the institution look bad."

By late Friday, Florida state Rep. Joe Negron, who ran for the seat in 2004 when Foley planned to run for the Senate and who has $1 million available from a campaign he dropped for state attorney general, had offered his candidacy.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said Friday that he was calling for an investigation into the House's page program, adding that Foley's resignation was "the right thing."

"We want to make sure that our pages are safe," Hastert said.

A clerk read Foley's resignation letter on the House floor, and Republicans greeted it with some relief. Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite, R-Fla., said GOP leadership had "suggested to Foley it was the right thing to do," and she said Foley didn't hesitate.

Foley was chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus and was active in child protection issues, including pushing for legislation to protect children from exploitation by adults over the Internet and further restrictions of child pornography on the Web. In 2003, he led a charge to bash a Tampa-area nudist camp that permitted underage campers to be naked.

According to the e-mails obtained by several news organizations, including the Miami Herald, the boy who received the e-mail sent them to a House staffer for Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., saying the August 2005 exchange "freaked me out."

Foley's office on Thursday had called the release of the e-mails politically motivated and "an attempt at the worst kind of character assassination." They dismissed the e-mails as innocent replies to a thank-you letter given to Foley from a former page.

But by Friday, a group that Republicans have assailed for its attacks on GOP members was calling on the House ethics committee to investigate the matter.

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington noted that the House censured two members for having sexual relationships with pages and frowned on a third for making sexual advances to a Peace Corps volunteer.

"The House of Representatives has the responsibility to protect teenagers who come to Congress to learn about the legislative process," the group's director wrote.

Questions about Foley's sexuality have dogged him in the past. In 2003, as a potential candidate for retiring Sen. Bob Graham's seat, he denounced rumors that he was gay and said it was no one's business if he was.

"Elected officials, even those who run for the United States Senate, must have some level of privacy," Foley said at the time.

He later took his name out of the running, citing a need to care for his ailing parents.

Foley Resigns From Congress Over E-mails (AP)

By Brendan Farrington

AP, September 30, 2006

Republicans' hold on U.S. Rep. Mark Foley's seat has gone from safe to shaky overnight.

Foley abruptly resigned Friday amid questions about e-mails he wrote a former teenage male page. His name will remain on November's ballot, but the votes will go toward whomever the state Republican Party chooses to face Democrat Tim Mahoney. The party has until Wednesday evening to choose a replacement.

Foley had been considered a strong bet for re-election. He has held the seat since 1994 and was popular with voters in his district, which stretches from Palm Beach County to Charlotte County on Florida's southwest gulf coast.

Foley's resignation could add to the GOP's difficulty in holding onto its House majority.

"The difficulty for whomever the candidate may be is he has to enter at a late date and has this disadvantage of not having his name on the ballot," said Darryl Paulson, a University of South Florida political science professor.

State Rep. Joe Negron is actively lobbying to be the replacement candidate, calling state GOP leaders to make his case. Negron was a candidate for attorney general before dropping out to avoid a primary with former U.S. Rep. Bill McCollum.

"I'm obviously saddened and shocked at the circumstances, however I think it's important that we don't give up on District 16," Negron said.

Negron, who said he has already received commitments from some Republican committee members, still has money left from his attorney general run, much of which he could transfer to a congressional account.

"I have very quick access to several hundred thousand dollars," Negron said.

State Republican Party Chairwoman Carole Jean Jordan praised Negron when talking about possible replacements.

"He's a great guy, a great human being, a good candidate," Jordan said.

Whoever runs will face Mahoney, a millionaire financial services executive and a former Republican who entered the race a year ago.

It's not the first time Foley has backed out of a race. He was a candidate for U.S. Senate before the 2004 primary before dropping out citing his father's poor health.

Foley Quits In Hill Sex Scandal (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 30, 2006

Republican Rep. Mark Foley resigned yesterday after the exposure of several sexually suggestive messages he sent to underage boys.

DOJ_NMG_0072086

Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican and chairman of the Missing and Exploited Children Caucus, led efforts to overhaul sex-offender laws, apologized in a brief statement that did not mention the electronic correspondence with the former congressional pages.

"I am deeply sorry and I apologize for letting down my family and the people of Florida I have had the privilege to represent," said Mr. Foley, 52, an unmarried real estate broker from Palm Beach.

The incident, the latest in a long history of sexual scandals that have plagued both parties, threatens the Republican campaign to retain control of the House of Representatives in the Nov. 7 elections.

ABC News first reported yesterday that Mr. Foley had engaged in several sexually explicit Internet conversations with current and former teenage male pages.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said Mr. Foley, a 12-year member of the House who served as deputy majority whip, did the right thing by resigning. Mr. Hastert, speaking of the scandal, said, "None of us are very happy about it."

Late last night, the House voted 409-0 to let the House ethics panel decide whether to investigate the matter. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, had officially demanded an investigation, but the House voted to defer the decision to the panel.

Mr. Foley's resignation, which stunned Capitol Hill, makes it more difficult for Republicans to keep the 16th District in Florida, long a reliable Republican district that voted 54 percent for President Bush in 2004. Mr. Foley won his last election with 68 percent.

"It obviously took a seat that was not competitive and made it competitive," said Jonathan Collegio, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Republican lawyers are examining Florida election law to determine whether a new Republican candidate could be added to the November ballot. If not, Republicans would be required to mount a write-in campaign for a replacement, which is difficult.

Even before yesterday's developments, House Republicans had speculated the party would lose seats, but hoped to lose fewer than 15, which would enable them to maintain control of the House. About 30 seats are considered in play.

A Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee memo yesterday afternoon argued that Mr. Foley's name "cannot be removed from the general election ballot," and promoted the candidacy of Tom Mahoney, a businessman described as a moderate Democrat who has raised more than $1 million for his campaign. However, the Florida Republican Party chairwoman said executives from each of the counties in the district will choose a replacement. State Rep. Joe Negron is said to be a leading contender.

Mr. Collegio said Republicans will field a strong candidate and called Mr. Mahoney a "B-list" candidate.

DCCC spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg said the Florida district was "always a very competitive race" and is now leaning more toward the Democrats. "This is a pretty decent district for Democrats," she said.

Mr. Foley became the fourth Republican congressman to resign so far this year amidst scandal. Most recently, former Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio resigned after admitting to federal bribery charges. Tom DeLay of Texas, the former majority leader, resigned in the spring over ties to casino lobbyist Jack Abramoff after he was accused of campaign finance irregularities. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California resigned and was convicted and imprisoned for bribery.

In its reporting, ABC News cited e-mail exchanges between Mr. Foley and a 16-year-old former congressional page in which the congressman asks the boy how old he is and requests a photograph. The boy seemed concerned about the exchange and alerted congressional staffers. ABC questioned Mr. Foley yesterday about earlier sexually explicit Internet messages with current and former congressional pages under the age of 18. Copies of the computer messages were given to ABC News by male former pages.

Mr. Hastert said he directed Rep. John Shimkus, Illinois Republican and head of the Page Board, to look into the matter. "We want to make sure that all our pages are safe and the page system is safe," Mr. Hastert said.

Steve Tomaszdwski, spokesman for Mr. Shimkus, said the Page Board of three House members would consult with lawyers to determine what authority, if any, the board has to investigate.

Finance Office Of Disease Control Agency Is Slipshod, Federal Report Says (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

The finance office of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention is plagued with inefficiency and ineffective leadership, outside consultants have concluded. Still, the office's leaders have in recent years been showered with bonus money.

The consulting firm, Deloitte Consulting, found that, in part because of low morale and fatigue, 53 percent of finance office employees planned to leave within two years. The leadership needs immediate improvement, said the report, which is dated July 2006 and is stamped "Draft."

The finance office, the agency's accounting and budgeting arm, with several hundred employees, is the subject of an investigation by the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services, said Jill Kozeny, a spokeswoman for Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

The investigation, first reported by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, involves accusations that officials had changed or falsified payment records to avoid paying late fees on overdue bills to drug companies, Ms. Kozeny said.

The Government Accountability Office is also investigating whether the disease control agency is properly overseeing $5 billion in state bioterrorism grants, she said.

William H. Gimson III, the agency's chief operating officer, said in an interview yesterday that the finance office recently put in place the most complex financial management system in the federal government, and that some of the problems stemmed from carrying that out.

"Good managers find problems and fix them," Mr. Gimson said. "We are taking the report very seriously. In some areas we have lagged. We are taking steps to improve."

Much of the report describes a four-year overhaul that Deloitte proposed to oversee for $9 million. The centers have begun that transformation at meetings to ask employees to express their "challenges with and thoughts about" the services provided by the finance office, according to an e-mail message obtained by The New York Times from agency employees.

The Deloitte report found that scientific managers in the agency were "hiring staff to fulfill financial management responsibilities due to dissatisfaction with" the finance office staff. It found that payment backlogs rose 47 percent from 2004 to 2005.

"Managers are too removed from daily work and attend too many meetings; make decisions that should be made at lower levels, so people are constantly waiting on answers; people are unsure of which decisions they are allowed to make," it said.

Deloitte graded the finance office on five criteria. On "strategy" and "people," it gave the office grades of 1 out of a possible 5. On "process" and "technology," the office got 2's. Only on "infrastructure" did the office merit a 4.

Meanwhile, top management and finance officials at the disease centers have been rewarded with huge performance bonuses.

Barbara W. Harris, the agency's chief financial officer, got $84,894 in bonuses from 2002 to the first half of 2006. Ms. Harris's bonus total was second to that of Mr. Gimson, who led the office through 2002 with $147,863 worth of premium bonuses — those greater than $2,500.

John C. Tibbs, director of the finance office, got $52,880 in premium bonuses from 2002 to early 2006.

Mr. Gimson defended the bonuses. "These are one-time recognitions, and I'm proud to have received" them, he said. "We are committed to rewarding the outstanding achievers at C.D.C."

Tom Skinner, a C.D.C. spokesman, said that Ms. Harris was not reachable and that Mr. Tibbs was not available for comment. John LaPlace, a spokesman for Deloitte, said he could not comment on the report for client confidentiality reasons.

Since Dr. Julie L. Gerberding became director of the centers in 2002, finance and other management officials have received a growing share of the bonuses. The share of premium bonuses given to those within the director's office has risen at least tenfold under Dr. Gerberding's leadership, according to a New York Times analysis of the records.

This resulted in part from a decision by the Bush administration to make a transformation of the management a priority, said Glen Nowak, the centers' media relations chief.

Deloitte spent six months this year interviewing more than 200 employees, according to a copy of the report obtained by The Times.

The report is yet another indication of problems at the centers under the leadership of Dr. Gerberding. Soon after arriving, she started a reorganization of the agency that is now in its third year. In its wake, many of the agency's senior scientists and leaders have left or have announced that they would leave.

The Washington Post and The Journal-Constitution investigated the resulting turmoil, and they quoted disgruntled former senior scientists who said Dr. Gerberding's leadership was creating a crisis.

Five of the six former directors recently wrote to Dr. Gerberding expressing concerns over the exodus of key leaders and scientists, according to The Journal-Constitution.

Dr. Gerberding was unavailable for comment, but in an e-mail message sent to the staff on Sept. 19 and reported by the Atlanta newspaper she defended her role and wrote that "press attacks" represented "symptoms of a disease within C.D.C."

"Frankly, I believe it is a chronic (or perhaps autoimmune) disease that pre-dates our leadership, but there is strong evidence of an acute exacerbation," she wrote in the message, a copy of which was obtained by The Times. In autoimmune diseases, the body attacks itself.

Bush Signs Bill To Monitor Credit Raters (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0072088

AP, September 30, 2006

President Bush on Friday signed legislation under which the government will more closely monitor agencies that rate the creditworthiness of corporations with publicly held securities.

Supporters described the Credit Rating Agency Reform Act as a significant component of congressional efforts tighten controls over the financial community following the corporate accounting scandals at the beginning of the decade.

The bill takes steps to increase competition in a field now dominated by three Wall Street agencies — Moody's Investors Service, Standard & Poor's and Fitch Ratings. It would also give the Securities and Exchange Commission expanded oversight over the credit agencies.

Audit: Firm Received Improper Payments (AP-Y)

By Ben Feller, Ap Education Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

A Nebraska company was improperly paid more than $278 million by misusing the federal student aid program, according to a federal audit released Friday.

The overpayments could swell to $882 million through 2015 if the company, Nelnet, is not ordered to change its billing practices, the Education Department's inspector general found.

The department should make Nelnet return the money after the company does its own calculation of what it was overpaid, the audit says, estimating the figure at $278 million.

Nelnet officials called the report inaccurate and denied wrongdoing. They did not agree to return any money but pledged to work with the Education Department on a resolution.

Mike Dunlap, the chairman of the company, said Nelnet will examine "all other available remedies that prove the merits of our position. However this matter is resolved, we will continue to provide superior service."

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings will review the report and Nelnet's response before deciding how to proceed, said spokeswoman Katherine McLane.

"Secretary Spellings takes protection of American taxpayers very seriously and is concerned about the issues raised in the inspector general's report," McLane said.

The lawmaker who requested the audit, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said the Education Department should take action. He said hundreds of millions of dollars have gone to waste.

"Nelnet should be required to pay back the ill-gotten proceeds from these loans, and that money should be used to benefit students," Kennedy said.

The top Democrat on the House education committee also jumped on the findings.

"The depth and breadth of Nelnet's failure to comply with the law is breathtaking," said Rep. George Miller, D-Calif.

Nelnet is one of the nation's largest providers of student loans. The audit describes the company as purposely exploiting the loophole that lawmakers have been trying to close.

At issue is a promise the government made to lenders in 1980: a guaranteed return of 9.5 percent on loans financed by tax-exempt bonds. It forced billions of dollars in payments to banks when interest rates dropped and the government had to make up the difference.

Congress has tried to end the lofty payments to banks, most recently in 2004. Yet lenders have found ways to keep drawing in the large government payments by recycling older loans.

The inspector general says the Nelnet created a project just for that purpose, substantially increasing the amount of loans requiring a 9.5 percent payment. From March 2003 through June 2004, the amount of Nelnet loans billed rose from $551 million to $3.66 billion.

Auditors say the company did this in violation of the law and department regulations.

The company disputes that it made money off ineligible loans. It says it followed the department's guidance and that any loans billed at the higher rate "were fully eligible."

The report came out late Friday afternoon as Congress neared the end of its session.

More Choices For Medicare (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang And Vanessa Fuhrmans

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

New, Fine-Tuned Drug Plans Aim to Lower Costs, Expand Coverage

WASHINGTON -- The number of companies offering nationwide Medicare prescription-drug plans will increase to 17 next year from nine this year, and more plans will feature zero deductibles and coverage in a gap commonly called the "doughnut hole," federal officials said.

Insurers are permitted to begin advertising their plans Sunday. Enrollment begins Nov. 15 and runs through the end of the year, with the new coverage beginning Jan. 1.

Officials at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services said that beneficiaries who are satisfied with their current Medicare prescription-drug coverage won't have to take any action. But even if they opt to remain in the same plans, they may see changes in their co-payments, premiums and list of covered drugs.

The average premium will remain about $24 a month, about the same as this year, and the lowest will be around $10, up from about $2 this year, according to Medicare. Officials added that more than 80% of seniors will have access to plans with premiums lower than they are paying this year, and that more plans will offer more comprehensive coverage, including coverage in the "doughnut hole."

In 2007, that coverage gap begins after the federally subsidized drug plan and the beneficiary have spent $2,400 on drugs. At that point, a beneficiary must pay 100% of costs until he or she has spent a total of $3,850 out of pocket. Then the federal subsidy resumes, paying 95% of any additional drug purchases.

"As a result of robust competition and smart choices by seniors, plans are adding drugs, removing options that were not popular and providing more options with enhanced coverage," said Mark McClellan, CMS administrator.

The new offerings will unlikely change the nature of the market, where the 10 largest insurance companies already have 80% of the market, said Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health LLC, a health-care consulting firm in Washington. "You have a vibrant market," he said.

Avalere estimated that beneficiaries in most states will have about 15 or 16 choices of plans that cover drugs in the "doughnut hole," with most of the plans covering only generic drugs.

But some advocacy groups such as Families USA worry that more choices, a shorter enrollment period and changes in plans will confuse seniors even more than this year, when they had six months to make up their minds.

Company by company, the changes in plans and prices reflect lessons learned in the first year of the drug benefit. Many of the more-expensive plans in 2006 have come down in price to compete with the low-cost options that helped Humana Inc. sign up 3.5 million members for its drug plans this year -- second only to UnitedHealth Group Inc. Premiums for Aetna Inc.'s drug benefit plans, for instance, will fall by between 5% and 13%. Its lowest-cost plan will be $24.80 a month, compared with $27.50 for its lowest-cost plan this year.

Meanwhile, some of Humana's premiums -- though still the lowest to be had in 38 states -- have climbed higher. Its most basic option costs an average $15.34, $5.29 more than this year, while its more-enhanced version -- which covers the benefit's initial $265 deductible and requires beneficiaries to pay a flat co-payment rather than a percentage of a prescription's price -- will cost an average $22.02, $6.11 more than this year.

Cigna Corp. has lowered the cost of its most basic plan by roughly 30%, to an average $24, and spruced it up by making generics free. Its middle-range plan costs an average $33, down 18%, while its high-end plan costs an average $43, down 10%.

Medicare Expands Options To Ease Costs (WT)

By Gregory Lopes

The Washington Times, September 30, 2006

The number of drug plans in the Medicare prescription drug program will increase next year, giving consumers the option of further lowering their drug costs, federal officials announced yesterday.

Monthly premiums for beneficiaries who decide to stick with their current plan will remain around $24. But 83 percent of beneficiaries will have the option of choosing a less expensive plan in 2007, said Mark McClellan, administrator of the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS). The enrollment period begins Nov. 15.

In the District and Maryland, even more beneficiaries will have the option of lowering their monthly premiums while in Virginia, 70 percent will be able to pay less.

The initial months of the program were plagued by consumer confusion over issues such as signing up for the appropriate plan that met a patient's individual needs. Consumer advocates blamed the startup glitches on the large number of drug plans offered in 2006.

This year, the number of plans will increase because nearly no insurance companies pulled out of the program. Instead, eight companies are being added to the list offering nationwide coverage.

Mr. McClellan said the number of plans will not be a source of confusion this year because consumers do not have to switch plans and CMS is improving the "plan finder" tool on the agency's Web site, www.medicare.gov, that will assist beneficiaries with choosing a different plan.

Mr. McClellan praised insurance companies for following the government's recommendation to offer more enhanced drug plans.

"What we were looking for and got was a shift in the options available," Mr. McClellan said. "There are still a lot of plans, but there are now a range of options with increased enhanced plans and coverage options."

In the District, 55 drug plans will be available next year, up from last year's 47. According to CMS, 87 percent of District residents will have access to less expensive drug coverage. In addition, 34 drug plans will offer coverage with no deductible. In 2006, 26 drug plans offered coverage with no deductible.

WellCare Health Plans Inc., an insurance company in Tampa, Fla., will offer the lowest monthly premium in the District and Maryland at $12.20 with a $265 deductible. At that price, consumers will get basic coverage and be subject to the gap in coverage.

In Virginia, 53 drug plans will be available to Medicare beneficiaries in 2007, seven more than were available in 2006, and 70 percent of the state's Medicare beneficiaries will have the option of choosing a new plan with a lower premium than they paid in 2006.

The insurance giant Humana will offer the lowest premium in Virginia at $13.40 for its standard plan with an annual deductible of $265. Unlike last year, Humana will offer only generic coverage..

At a monthly premium of $41.70, First Health will provide a drug plan that covers both brand name drugs and generics through the coverage gap. No drug plan's premium in Virginia will exceed $100.

U.S. OKs Firms To Give Medicare Coverage (AP-Y)

By Kevin Freking, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Seniors who complained this year about a dizzying array of choices for a Medicare drug plan may find themselves even dizzier when they shop around for next year.

Federal officials announced Friday that 17 companies have been approved to provide Medicare drug coverage nationally. This year, there were nine.

As a result, beneficiaries in Oklahoma, for example, will have 57 stand-alone plans to select from, compared to 42 this year. Beneficiaries in North Carolina will have 51 stand-alone plans to select from, compared to 38 this year.

New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Virginia have more than 60 plans each.

In addition, beneficiaries can get coverage through one of dozens of Medicare Advantage plans. Such plans offer protection from other medical expenses, such as a visit to the doctor's office.

Many of the new plans are offering coverage that seniors have been asking for, such as no deductible or coverage in the so-called "doughnut hole," said Mark McClellan, the Bush administration's point man on Medicare. The doughnut hole is the gap created at the point when beneficiaries have to pick up all of their drug costs.

"The new options that are available are primarily options that provide enhanced coverage," McClellan said. "The number of variations for basic coverage have gone down significantly."

Critics of the program said the benefit is getting more complicated, not easier.

"The incredible confusion that persisted throughout this year is about to get considerably worse," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, an advocacy group. "This is because there will be quite a few more plans to choose from, they will all be different from each other, and seniors will have a much shorter time period to make decisions about enrollment."

Beginning Nov. 15, seniors have until the end of the year to enroll in a drug plan. During the program's start-up, they had about six months to enroll.

McClellan's comments came as the Department of Health and Human Services formally announced Friday which plans Medicare beneficiaries will have available to them during the benefit's second year. The officials said the monthly premium that beneficiaries pay next year will average $24 — about the same as in 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0072091

Seniors happy with their drug coverage this year — and surveys indicate that most are — won't have to do any shopping if they want to stay with their plan, said HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt.

"We expect most of them will not want to change. However, we do encourage seniors to compare their current plans with the new offerings," Leavitt said.

Nationally, 83 percent of beneficiaries will have access to plans with premiums lower than they are paying this year, Leavitt said.

With the new year, insurers get to update their offerings to seniors and the disabled. Some are lowering their premiums. Others are raising them. Plans are including more drugs on the list of prescriptions that they will cover. On average, plans will cover about 13 percent more drugs next year, Leavitt said.

Insurers have predicted that some of the lowest-priced plans would become more expensive as the program matured, and some of the highest priced plans would be less expensive. That appears to have occurred. For instance, Humana offered a plan in several states this year costing just $1.87 a month. In 2007, the company's basic plan will cost $10.60 a month.

Deanne Beebe, a spokeswoman for the Medicare Rights Center, said that seniors won't be won over by all the additional options.

"They don't want dozens of choices," she said. "They want one affordable drug benefit they can count on when it comes time to fill their prescription."

But competition is the reason premiums won't be increasing next year, countered Rep. Bill Thomas, R-Calif.

"Competition brings down prices and ensures seniors save money on their prescription drug costs throughout their lifetimes," he said.

Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a consulting firm, said he's not surprised by the expansion of insurers offering drug coverage nationally. He said several companies, such as Humana, already operated in most states.

"Some plans wanted to experiment and might not have gone into certain regions. Now they're more confident because they're having a profitable experience," Mendelson said.

The 17 companies approved to operate nationally are: Aetna Inc., Caremark Inc., CIGNA, Coventry Health Care Inc., EnvisionRX Plus Inc., Express Scripts Inc., Health Net Inc., Humana Inc., Long Drug Stores Corp., Medco Health Solutions Inc., Member Health Inc., NewQuest Health Solutions LLC, NMHC Systems Inc., Torchmark Corp., UnitedHealthCare-Pacificare, WellCare Health Plans Inc., and Wellpoint Inc.

F.D.A. Says Bayer Failed To Reveal Drug Risk Study (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29 — Bayer A.G., the German pharmaceutical giant, failed to reveal to federal drug officials the results of a large study suggesting that a widely used heart-surgery medicine might increase the risks of death and stroke, the Food and Drug Administration announced Friday.

Bayer scientists even appeared at a public meeting called by the F.D.A. on Sept. 21 to discuss the possibility that the drug, Trasylol, might have serious risks. But they did not mention the study or its worrisome results.

In a highly unusual move, the food and drug agency released a public health advisory saying it had learned of the study's existence only on Wednesday. Preliminary results of the study demonstrate "that use of Trasylol may increase the chance for death, serious kidney damage, congestive heart failure and strokes," the advisory said.

Nevertheless, the agency did not change its advice about whether patients should be given the drug. Instead, it restated previous warnings that Trasylol's use should be limited to patients in whom the risks of blood loss outweighed the drug's risks.

The disclosure comes exactly two years after Merck announced it was withdrawing its arthritis drug, Vioxx, after a study showed that it doubled the risks of heart attacks. Since then, members of Congress and even top scientific advisers have concluded that the F.D.A. lacks the regulatory authority and the money needed to detect and protect against drug dangers.

Drug companies have also been sharply criticized for failing to make public the results of some human trials of their drugs that suggest that the drugs are either ineffective or dangerous. Some lawmakers have proposed legislation that would require that nearly all human drug trials must be announced and their results disclosed publicly.

A top F.D.A. official said the agency learned of the Trasylol study on Wednesday only after a getting a tip from a researcher involved in it. The official insisted on anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

In a written statement, Bayer said “that it mistakenly did not inform” the F.D.A. of the study and added, “This data was not shared immediately with the agency because it was preliminary in nature.”

Staci Gouveia, a Bayer spokeswoman, said the company nonetheless stood behind the safety of Trasylol, which has become one of Bayer’s fastest sellers. Sales last year were $200 million and were expected to nearly triple this year.

Several members of the advisory committee that met last week said they were shocked that Bayer failed to inform them of the study.

“For them not to mention that it was under way, that it was being analyzed or that results were available is appalling and will do significant harm to their reputation for transparency,” said Dr. John Teerlink, an associate professor of medicine at the University of California, San Francisco, and a member of the advisory committee.

Steven Findlay, a health care analyst at Consumers Union and another committee member, said the agency needed to investigate whether Bayer knowingly withheld the information from the advisory committee.

“The safety of this drug is called into further question now,” Mr. Findlay said.

Doctors give Trasylol to patients before surgery to reduce the risks of blood loss. It can also reduce the need for transfusions in patients undergoing heart bypass surgery. Trasylol, also known as aprotinin, has been on the market for 13 years.

But two recent studies suggested that the drug might have serious risks. One of the articles, published in January in The New England Journal of Medicine, found that the drug increases the risks of kidney failure, heart attack and stroke. The study concluded that halting the drug’s use would prevent 10,000 to 11,000 cases of kidney failure a year and save more than $1 billion a year in dialysis costs, as well as nearly $250 million spent on the drug itself.

There are other, cheaper drugs that can be used in Trasylol’s place.

Still, the advisory panel concluded that Trasylol’s risks were worth taking in some patients. Dr. Teerlink said that despite the results of the new study, that might still be true.

Bayer’s study was performed by a contract research organization. But Bayer did not inform the F.D.A. that the study was being done, even though that is routine practice.

It examined hospital records of 67,000 patients, 30,000 of whom received Trasylol. The rest got other drugs. It concluded that the patients given Trasylol were at greater risk.

Such studies, however, are fraught with statistical and other problems. Patients given Trasylol may have been sicker than those given other drugs. Their worse outcomes would be explained not by problems with Trasylol but by their own illness.

Susan Bro, an F.D.A. spokeswoman, said it was evaluating the new study and would decide soon whether the results merit changing the agency’s advice about use of the drug.

“It is regrettable that the F.D.A. advisory board did not have the benefit of a frank scientific dialogue based on the totality of available data,” she said.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and a longtime critic of the F.D.A., said Bayer’s behavior proved that the agency was largely toothless.

“The remedy is mandatory reporting of all clinical trials and real teeth for the F.D.A. to do its job in holding drug companies accountable,” Mr. Grassley said.

Bayer Delayed Report To FDA On Study Results (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

Bayer AG failed to immediately disclose to U.S. regulators a study that may underscore serious safety concerns about its antibleeding drug Trasylol.

The Food and Drug Administration said preliminary results of the new study showed that use of the drug may increase the risk of death, serious kidney damage, congestive heart failure and strokes. Some of those results echo two earlier studies about the drug. Trasylol, used by about 150,000 U.S. patients last year, is approved to limit blood loss during coronary-artery bypass surgery.

The FDA said Bayer told the agency about the study, which the company had commissioned from an outside contractor, on Wednesday, nearly a week after the agency held an advisory-committee meeting on the safety of the drug.

Bayer said Friday that it told the agency about the study after an outside researcher, who isn't a Bayer employee, "requested that we inform the FDA." The company said it now "believes that, despite the highly preliminary nature of this data, the information should have been shared with the FDA before the Sept. 21 advisory-committee meeting." It called the failure to disclose it "a mistake on the company's part."

The FDA said it was evaluating the new study, which involved the database records of 67,000 patients. The agency repeated an earlier recommendation that doctors should carefully monitor patients taking the drug and use it only when it is most needed.

Without the Bayer-commissioned study, the FDA committee voted that Trasylol appeared safe and effective. Members of the committee questioned the methodology and downplayed the results of the main safety study that they did review, published in the New England Journal of Medicine and not funded by Bayer.

The history of Trasylol, approved in 1993, may underline worries about the U.S. system for detecting and confirming drug side effects. Companies are supposed to inform the agency about the results of studies they sponsor about their drugs, particularly those with new information relevant to evaluating the drug's safety. The agency has limited resources to do such studies on its own, and its authority to order manufacturers to do them isn't always clear.

In February, the FDA put out a warning about Trasylol, prompted by two published studies. One, in the Jan. 26 New England Journal, found the drug might be linked to a doubling of the risk of kidney failure, as well as increased risk of heart attacks, heart failure and strokes. The authors concluded that "continued use is not prudent." Another study, in the journal Transfusion, also linked Trasylol to kidney damage.

Earmarks Find Way Into Spending Bill (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29 — Less than a year after two bribery scandals produced bipartisan calls for Congress to overhaul the way it finances lawmakers' pet projects, the $436.6 billion military spending bill passed Friday is packed with them.

The bill, which accounts for about half of federal discretionary spending, includes only a small part of the expected costs of next year's military operations in Iraq. After the fall elections, President Bush is expected to request another supplemental spending measure to pay for the war, just as the administration has for the last three years.

Lawmakers nonetheless found room in the bill to pay for thousands of requests never sought by the Defense Department. These projects, or earmarks, included $2.1 billion for 10 additional C-17 Globemaster III cargo jets, which the Pentagon is trying to discontinue. They are made by Boeing in the home state of Senator Jim Talent, Republican of Missouri, who is locked in a tight race for re-election.

Lawmakers say earmarks can result in contributions to national security as well as to their districts' economies. The Defense Department complains that such projects divert billions of dollars from programs the Pentagon considers vital. But both sides agree that earmarks' merits are hard for Congress and the public to assess.

The number of earmarks has tripled over the last 12 years, straining the ability of Congressional staff members to vet each one. The opaque language of spending bills makes it hard for outsiders to know where the money for each project goes. And it is often impossible to know which lawmaker requested a specific project.

The total cost of earmarks is subject to debate. The House Appropriations Committee said the value of the "member projects" in the spending bill this time was $6.7 billion, down from $7.7 billion in the bill approved last year. The Congressional Research Service estimated the total cost of earmarks in last year's bill at more than $9 billion. Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan group, has identified well over 2,000 earmarks in this year's bill, roughly on par with last year's.

Among the earmarks identified by Taxpayers for Common Sense were $1.7 million for photon research in upstate New York, care of Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles E. Schumer, both Democrats, and $1.2 million for prostate cancer research involving DNA, a pet cause of Senator Ted Stevens, Republican of Alaska, who is chairman of the military spending subcommittee and once suffered from the disease.

Lawmakers' projects have drawn new attention in the past year because they abetted the misdeeds of former Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican who accepted bribes in exchange for earmarking money for military contractors, and the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who bribed lawmakers to insert earmarks into spending bills.

But as lawmakers head home for the fall campaign season, Congress has done little to alter the earmarking process.

"The appetite is undiminished," said Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma and a frequent critic of earmarks.

Congressional leaders said they were proud of several broader elements of the spending bill related to the war in Iraq. It includes $70 billion as a bridge until the next supplemental spending request. It provides $22.9 billion to replenish and refurbish equipment for the Army and the Marines. And it pays for a 2.2 percent increase in military pay.

In a shift from previous years, no new items were added — "airdropped," in the parlance of Capitol Hill — in the conference held to reconcile the House and Senate versions of the bill. If the conferees had added items, an internal rule passed by the House earlier this month would have required the sponsors to take responsibility publicly.

That did not stop the conference from adding $2.1 billion to pay for the additional C-17 Globemaster transport planes. Boeing, which makes the planes in Long Beach, Calif., and St. Louis, has lobbied for months to keep the military buying more. The Pentagon asked for a final 8 planes; the House and Senate bills added 4 more; and in closed conference, the leaders of the two appropriations committees decided to add 10, bringing the total to 22. Each costs about $200 million.

Senator Talent heralded the earmark on Friday with a statement declaring, “Senate approves Talent’s request to keep the C-17 line open” for “our highly skilled workers in Missouri.”

109th Congress Earns `do-nothing' Label, Scholars Say (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - The 109th Congress recesses this weekend for November's elections having earned a reputation among scholars as a "do-nothing Congress" of historic proportions.

It failed to enact a host of once top-priority legislation on issues such as overhauling Social Security, immigration and lobbying laws. None of those is expected to be resolved in Congress' brief lame-duck session after the elections.

Lawmakers worked three-day weeks and took lots of time off. Both parties generally eschewed compromise. The Republican-led Congress conducted little meaningful oversight of the Bush administration and its policies in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Yet the do-nothing label belies at least three substantial legacies that this Congress will leave the nation:

-A surge in pork-barrel projects for lawmakers' constituents back home.

-Deference to a same-party president that shifted unchecked power to the executive branch and extended government's reach into people's private lives.

-New rules that permit the government to hold suspected terrorists indefinitely without charges, to use harsh interrogation measures on them if the president approves and to convict them using evidence that would be inadmissible in any other court.

Republicans tout some of Congress' accomplishments on the home front, including pension revisions and keeping taxes down. They blame the small number of legislative accomplishments in part on Democrats' obstruction and more pressing wartime priorities.

"The post-9-11 world is a hugely different world, and the way the Congress functions has changed fundamentally," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H. "We're so overwhelmingly absorbed by the issue of our national security and keeping ourselves from being attacked again."

Democrats, for their part, accuse Republicans of politicizing national security at a cost to the nation's traditions of free expression and human rights. They say the Republican-led Congress is but a rubber stamp for Bush, and its actions haven't made America safer.

"This Congress does exactly what the president tells them to do; a complacent, complicit Congress," said Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the second-ranking Democrat in the House of Representatives.

Democrats deny that their "obstructionism" limited Congress' achievements. Instead they blame Republican infighting on immigration, stem cells, spending and treatment of detainees. They deride the Republican leadership's fixation on tax cuts and social conservatives' unpopular priorities, such as last year's legislative effort to prolong the life of Terri Schiavo, a Florida woman in a vegetative state.

Voters aren't happy with either party.

A New York University national survey released Friday showed that most Americans think that Congress either can't or won't fix long-term problems, such as global warming, Social Security, Medicare and even aging roads and bridges.

Two of Washington's most respected scholars of Congress - Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution, a center-left think tank, and Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute, a center-right research center - co-authored a new book on the legislature, "The Broken Branch." They argue that Congress is at a self-inflicted nadir.

They note that President Harry Truman first stuck the "do-nothing" tag on Congress in 1948. That year Congress was in session 110 days. This year Congress completes only 94 days of work before recessing for the elections.

Lawmakers typically are in Washington only from Tuesdays through Thursdays.

Mann and Ornstein say Congress' Republican leadership has taken traditional abuses of power farther than ever: They bypass committees, cut off floor debate, disallow amendments, force hasty votes on major bills that few have read and sometimes keep 15-minute vote counts open for hours while they browbeat junior members into supporting their position.

To be sure, there were instances when this Congress challenged the Bush administration, such as the Dubai ports deal and scrutiny of the Federal Emergency Management Agency after Hurricane Katrina. One committee investigated and publicized the activities of Jack Abramoff, a corrupt Republican lobbyist.

Three senior Senate Republicans - John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina - convinced the White House to make some concessions over the detention and trials of suspected terrorists. But civil rights experts say the senators didn't force the White House to give up much.

That's consistent with U.S. history. Since the nation's start, executive power has grown during wartime, only to subside later, said John J. Pitney, a government professor at Claremont McKenna College in California. He worked for Vice President Dick Cheney when Cheney was a congressman from Wyoming.

"It's no accident that in the 1990s we were talking about the increase of legislative power over the executive," Pitney said. "That came between the Cold War and 9-11."

On balance, scholars say Republican congressional leaders ignored their duty to question decision-making and investigate corruption within the Bush administration. "They've done almost no oversight on the war or almost anything that matters," Ornstein said.

In contrast, in the 1990s Republicans in Congress investigated whether President Clinton had used the White House Christmas card mailing list to scout for donors.

"There were (more than) 100 hours of oversight hearings on alleged misuse of the Clinton Christmas card list, and 12 hours of hearings on Abu Ghraib. This tells you all you need to know," Ornstein said.

There's one area, however, in which scholars say members of both parties have excelled over the past two years: serving their constituents massive amounts of pork-barrel spending.

The taxpayer watchdog group Citizens Against Government Waste identified 9,963 special pork projects in the federal budget this year, collectively worth $29 billion. In 1996, the group found 958 projects worth less than $13 billion.

"Here, Congress has done a hell of a job, and every lawmaker has his earmark to show it," said Stephen J. Wayne, a government professor at Georgetown University.

The surge, Wayne said, tracks with trends in congressional redistricting that have made most seats in the House safe for one party or the other. One result of that is a polarized Congress. Another is that it gives lawmakers an incentive to tend to their own backyards and ignore national issues. "Congress is the only institution I can think of where the whole is less than the sum of its parts," Wayne said.

The ambition of Congress' agenda in its lame-duck session later this year will depend largely on whether Democrats capture either legislative chamber in November. That could compel Republicans to try to act while they still can, or Democrats to try to run out the clock.

"You want an irony of history?" Pitney said. "Everybody remembers the so-called `do nothing' Congress Truman ran against, but it was one of the most productive in history." It passed the National Security Act that reorganized the military, creating the Defense Department, Air Force, CIA and National Security Council. And it overrode Truman's veto of the anti-labor union Taft-Hartley Act.

This year, the case for a do-nothing Congress "is far stronger than it was in 1948," Pitney said. "But it's not a presidential election year. So the argument has to be made by (Democratic) members of Congress. And if Democrats talk about a do-nothing Congress, the danger is the public will find a plague on both their houses."

Sworn in in January 2005, the 109th Congress was poised to help President Bush carry out an ambitious agenda for conservatives on fiscal, religious and social issues. Republicans scored some victories, but had more mixed results or high-profile failures.

APPROVED:

-More lenient rules for interrogating and trying terrorism suspects.

-Confirmation of two Supreme Court justices and other conservative jurists.

-Pension revisions.

-Funding for fence construction along U.S.-Mexican border.

-Renewal of the Patriot Act.

-Tax cuts for individuals and businesses.

-Bankruptcy and tort-law overhauls.

-Omnibus energy and transportation bills.

-Voting rights act extension.

-Allowing transport of cheap prescription drugs from Canada.

UNFINISHED:

-Social Security and Medicare fiscal changes.

-Comprehensive immigration law changes.

-Comprehensive lobbying law changes.
-Passage of most annual appropriations bills.
-Constitutional bans on same-sex marriage and flag burning.
-Funding for new embryonic stem-cell research (vetoed).
-Repeal of estate tax.
-Minimum wage increase.
-Closing gaps in Medicare prescription-drug plan.
-Expanded offshore oil and gas exploration.
-Restrictions on president's warrantless wiretap program.
-Action against identity theft.
-Action to curb global warming.

Republican-led Congress Winds Down (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington
Financial Times, September 30, 2006

Republican leaders in Congress gave a final push on Friday for last-minute accomplishments, hoping that action on military spending, a fence along the US-Mexico border and other security measures would give them a boost before the November 7 midterm elections.

But even before they left Washington for an intense period of campaigning, the contours of their election strategy were on display.

"Congress has made clear its commitment to the safety and security of the American people," said Bill Frist, the Republican majority leader, after the Senate approved a $448bn (€353bn, £240bn) defence spending bill.

John Boehner, majority leader in the House of Representatives, echoed that approach, insisting that while Republicans had tried to give the White House the national security tools it needed, Democrats had opposed many of them. "You can't say you're serious about taking on the terrorists if you stand up here every day and vote No."

The defence spending bill was set to go to the White House for President George W. Bush's signature, but the outcomes of the border fence and a homeland security spending bill were unclear.

The focus on national security does not come as a surprise to Democrats. But while Republicans have tried to paint their rivals as weak on defence, the party has shown new confidence on the topic in recent days.

A majority of Democrats in both chambers voted this week against legislation that sets out new rules for the treatment of terrorism suspects, arguing that the legislation neglected basic rights, permitted torture and weakened America's standing in the world.

Democrats will also use the campaign to highlight what they say has been the lack of attention by the Republican-controlled Congress to issues that are important to ordinary Americans.

"We haven't had time to increase the minimum wage, to cut the cost of student loans for America's college students, to lower prescription drug prices, to roll back tax breaks for big oil or to pass the 9/11 commission recommendations [on homeland security]," said Nancy Pelosi, Democratic leader in the House.

Republicans also failed this year to complete action on several proposals that they had made a top priority, including immigration and lobbying reform.

Opinion polls show Democrats have a strong chance of capturing the 15 seats they need to take control of the House, and, perhaps, the five more they need to control the Senate as well. Voters continue to list the war in Iraq as a top concern, explaining Republican attempts to talk about the unpopular conflict in the broader context of the "war on terror".

Charlie Cook, the respected political analyst, made it clear this week that while the themes of the election were clear, the outcome was not.

"I feel the frustration of a still photographer trying to capture a marathon," he wrote.

"A snapshot of the race at any given moment becomes obsolete the instant it is taken, and it reveals nothing about what will happen later in the contest."

Murtha Again Seeks House Leadership Post (AP)

Associated Press, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Rep. John Murtha said Friday he has started campaigning again for the position of House majority leader if the Democrats oust the Republicans in power in November.

DOJ_NMG_0072097

In June, the Pennsylvania Democrat who has been the leading voice for pulling troops out of Iraq agreed to suspend his campaign for the position out of concern that it could divert from the party's ability to gain the 15 House seats it would need to take control of the House.

"I think we need a presence. We need somebody that knows something about defense and we need a leadership team that will work together," Murtha said in an interview taped Friday on C-SPAN's "The Newsmakers" show to be aired Sunday.

Murtha's decision to seek the position put him on a possible collision course with Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer, D-Md., second-in-command to Democratic Party Leader Nancy Pelosi. Hoyer's press secretary said Friday he had no comment on Murtha's statement and referred to previous statements he has made about his first focus being on winning a majority in the House.

Murtha, a pro-military Democrat gained prominence by leading the party in demanding an early troop withdrawal from Iraq. He's spent the last several weeks traveling the country raising money for Democrats.

One On One With Former President: Jimmy Carter Talks Politics (RGJ)

By Ray Hagar

Reno Gazette Journal, September 29, 2006

Former President Jimmy Carter sat down with the Reno Gazette-Journal on Wednesday in Fallon for an exclusive one-on-one interview.

Question: Does your stature as a president help your son's campaign for the U.S. Senate in Nevada?

Carter: The fact that he is the son of a former president gives him some initial name recognition. When he is introduced to a crowd and they say, 'This is a son of a former president,' it helps him at the start. But of course, the success of his campaign will depend on him, his stand on the issues and how he does in the debates and things of that kind.

Question: When you ran for president in 1976 and 1980, you did not carry Nevada. So, has anything changed to make you think that a Carter can be a winner in Nevada in 2006?

Carter: Then, it was a hopeless cause for a Democrat. There was not any hope for a Democrat to carry Nevada.

But it was very close in 2004 in Nevada (in the presidential election) between Kerry and Bush, which was a pleasant surprise to us. John Kerry carried the metropolitan areas and lost the rural areas. And Jack, since he announced last October, has been concentrating on the rural areas to try to repair that damage.

Question: As a resident of Plains, Ga., how would you compare rural Georgia to rural Nevada?

Carter: It's similar in many ways. Jack and I come from a little town that still only has 635 people, Plains, Ga. It's agricultural, it's populated with hard-working people who are religious and who have to get along with each other or move out. They struggle, as working-class families do, to make a living.

We're very proud of our right to make our own decisions and not let the federal government interfere with what we do and what we decide as a town and as an individual family.

Clinging to moral values will never change, even though the international and national mood changes. The basic moral values of small towns don't change

Question: There seems to be a lot of consternation between the Democratic Party and some of the policies of the Bush administration. As a former president, what type of grade would you give President Bush for his performance?

Carter: I'd give him about as low of a grade as you could get.

It's not because it's a Republican administration. I am not talking about liberals versus conservatives. But this administration, for the last five years, has made radical departures from the basic values of all previous presidents "" compared to what his father did, to what Dwight Eisenhower did or Richard Nixon or Gerald Ford, as well as Democrats.

We have had a complete abandonment of every nuclear arms agreement that was ever negotiated. We have had no effort to bring peace to Israel and to the Middle East in the last five years. We had an administration where every tax bill has been designed to benefit the richest, tiniest portion of American citizens to the detriment of working class families. We have had a deliberate mixture of church and state that really has never been done in our country.

We have also frittered away in the most dismal fashion the unanimous support that the United States had after 9/11 when the whole world combined as a team against terrorism. We did a half-job in Afghanistan and we let Osama bin Laden escape in order to start an ill-advised war in Iraq. So, in all those areas, we have had a major failure in the last five years.

Question: You have been on the campaign trail many times in your life. Your son, who is in his first campaign, was recently hospitalized with a stomach disorder and missed more than a week's worth of campaigning. How do you think that will effect his chances of being elected because he faces an uphill battle against an entrenched incumbent in Sen. John Ensign.

Carter: He knew that he had an uphill battle from the beginning. And I think that if he had to get ill, which I regret very much, that was probably the most convenient time to do it.

He still had six or seven weeks to let the people of Nevada know who he is and what he stands for.

I would say, as was the case with me, that the debates that are scheduled in the middle of October with Sen. Ensign will be the deciding factor in the campaign.

I know that when I ran for president, I was just a peanut farmer, running against the President of the United States Gerald Ford, who was a wonderful man. I did well enough in those debates that some people said, 'This guy is qualified to be president,' and I won. Question: Many of our state's political experts downplay the importance of debates. But you seem to be saying that the debates between your son and Sen. Ensign hold the key to this election. Can you explain?

Carter: It will be the first time for Nevada to observe both men on the same platform, talking about the same issues. There is no question that the senator (Ensign) has a lot more money than Jack Carter so that (debates) will be the equalizing factor.

Question: Some Democrats complain that President Bush was not fairly elected in 2000? Do you think he was fairly elected in 2000?

Carter: No, I don't. There is no question about it. He (Bush) lost by 200,000 votes across the nation, and he lost in Florida. But he won by a 5-4 vote in the U.S. Supreme Court. So there is no doubt that that was a very doubtful outcome. But it is over now. You can only have one candidate who is successful and you can't question the decision of the Supreme Court, even if you don't think it was fair.

Question: Your father served in World War I, you were a Navy submarine officer ... your son, Jack, volunteered for the Navy during the Vietnam War. You have been dismayed with the treatment of veterans by the Bush administration. Could you explain?

Carter: I have seen in recent months with this administration, a tremendous desire to cut back taxes on the richest people in America and at the same time, to deprive veterans "" even the disabled veterans coming back from Iraq "" the kind of care, attention and priority that they have had through history and which they deserve. The head of the disabled veterans administration just pointed out to me that now, there is no guaranteed budget allocation for disabled veterans in Washington. It is just a temporary, flexible allocation of funds. The incumbent senator (John Ensign) voted against increasing funds for veterans, voted against increased funds for body armor, voted against increased funds for the armor plates around Humvees and that sort of thing. So, I think that the veterans have really suffered under this administration.

OTHER NEWS:

Small Drop At End Of Strong Quarter (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Wall Street ended a stellar third quarter with a moderate decline yesterday, as the Dow Jones industrial average pulled back further from record-high levels.

The major indexes closed out the week, month and quarter with gains.

The day's economic news was gloomy and money managers made few bold moves as the quarter ended.

"This is possibly a short-term top," Ken Tower, chief market strategist for CyberTrader, said of the Dow's briefly surpassing its closing record of 11,722.98 on Thursday.

"The Dow has been flirting with an all-time high; the market may be due for a little rest as we enter October," he added.

Stocks dipped after William Poole, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, said the Fed would continue to watch economic data as it sets interest-rate policy. His comments were seen as leaving the door open to additional interest rate increases if inflation necessitates them; traders had been hoping the increases were over.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 39.38 points, or 0.34 percent, to 11,679.07. The blue-chip index briefly crossed its record close of 11,722.98 on Thursday, then fell back. It has yet to surpass its record intra-day trading high of 11,750.28; both that and the closing high were set Jan. 14, 2000.

Broader stock indicators also fell. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index declined 3.30 points, or 0.25 percent, to 1,335.85, and the Nasdaq composite index slipped 11.59 points, or 0.51 percent, to 2,258.43.

Crude oil futures rose. A barrel of light crude settled at $62.91, up 15 cents, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In economic news, the Commerce Department said consumer spending dropped in August by the largest amount in nearly a year and core inflation for August, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, was up a worrisome 2.5 percent compared with a year ago, the biggest year-over-year increase in more than a decade.

Inflation's increase was far above what the Federal Reserve has set as its "comfort zone" and the concern on Wall Street is that it could portend additional Fed increases in its benchmark short-term interest rate.

The department said consumer spending, after adjusting for inflation, dropped by 0.1 percent last month, the first decline since a 0.3 percent fall in September 2005.

Income gains were anemic, rising by just 0.3 percent in August, the weakest performance in nine months.

Yesterday was also the end of an unusually strong third quarter as stocks rebounded from their May and June tumble. The Dow gained 4.74 percent for the quarter, the S.& P. 500 rose 5.17 percent and the Nasdaq gained 3.97 percent.

Declining prices for oil, commodities and real estate have once again made equities an attractive investment.

”Investors are getting out of commodities, getting out of residential real estate and getting into financial assets, including stocks,” said a UBS economist, Maury Harris.

The markets also had a strong September. The Dow gained 2.62 percent; the S.& P. 500 rose 2.46 percent; and the Nasdaq advanced 3.42 percent.

In company news, Dell fell 13 cents, to $22.84, after it said it was increasing the recall of Sony battery packs used in its computers to 4.2 million units from 4.1 million units.

Wendy’s International rose 43 cents, to $67, after a federal judge told the hamburger chain it could go ahead with its planned spinoff of its profitable Tim Hortons coffee and doughnut unit, rejecting a last-ditch effort by bondholders to block it.

Jabil Circuit, a maker of electronics, fell 20 cents, to $28.57, after it said it expected to record a $120.2 million charge related to a restructuring plan.

Jabil, which makes electronics and other equipment for larger technology companies, said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it intended to incur the charge in the period ended Aug. 31.

Eli Lilly fell 32 cents, to $57, after it said it would decide whether to sink another five years of development into a proposed treatment for a diabetic eye disease after the Food and Drug Administration asked for additional data before granting approval.

Bonds were lower, with the 10-year Treasury note falling 3/32, to 10129/32. The note’s yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rose to 4.63 percent, from 4.61 percent late Thursday.

Stocks Broke Tradition In 3rd Quarter (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Interest Rates, Oil Prices Credited for Strong Market

NEW YORK, Sept. 29 -- Historically, third quarters are losers. Over the past 16 years, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index has on average lost 2 percent between the end of June and the end of September. "Sell in May, stay away," the Wall Street adage goes.

Not this year. Though the markets briefly dipped in mid-July, the major indicators have been on a hot streak since, and each ended the quarter with significant gains. The S&P 500, which rose 3.30 points to 1335.85 Friday, was up 5.2 percent for the quarter and at a 5 1/2 -year high. The Nasdaq composite index, which fell 11.59 Friday to 2258.43, was up nearly 4 percent.

The Dow Jones industrial average is flirting with its highest close, 11,722.98 in January 2000. The Dow briefly topped that level during the day Thursday and again on Friday before closing at 11,679.07, down 39.38 for the day but up 4.7 percent for the quarter.

"Every now and then the market serves up a reminder that history is a guide not gospel," said Sam Stovall, Standard & Poor's' chief market analyst, who had predicted a third-quarter correction. "It was a pretty good quarter across the board."

Strong sectors in the S&P 500 included health care, telecommunications and technology, which all gained more than 8 percent. The losers were energy, materials and industrial stocks. .

The third-quarter results were all the more welcome to some investors because they came after a six-week swoon in May and June, during which the S&P lost 7.7 percent and emerging-market and small-company stocks did even worse.

Market analysts attributed the turnaround to two key factors. The Federal Reserve, which had raised its benchmark short-term interest rate at 17 straight meetings over more than two years, finally took a break and held the rate at 5.25 percent at its August and September meetings. Crude oil prices, which peaked at $78 a barrel in July, fell precipitously and closed the quarter at $62.91. Accordingly, gasoline prices, which topped $3 a gallon this summer, also fell significantly.

Debt payments and energy are huge expenses for both businesses and consumers. The halt in interest-rate increases reduced fears of an economic slowdown, while the drop in energy prices eased concerns about inflation.

"Two of the biggest headwinds in this market, rising interest rates and high energy prices, became tailwinds, and the fundamentals shown through," said Arthur R. Hogan III, chief market analyst for Jefferies and Co.

Steven Wieting, U.S. economist for Citigroup, said he thought the third-quarter rally was due in large part to market overreaction in May and June to news of a major slowdown in the housing market.

"People were exaggerating the risks for the U.S. economy," he said. "The third quarter was a recovery from exceptionally low expectations."

The recovery was not universal. Large-company stocks -- the blue chips in the Dow and the S&P 500 -- are up from where they were in May, but the smaller companies aren't doing as well. The Russell 2000 index, which measures companies with smaller market values, was up slightly for the quarter, but down 6 percent from its peak in early May. Analysts said the contrast suggests that small- and medium-size companies have already had their run and that larger companies are also comparatively cheap.

Analysts are divided as to where the markets go from here. Historically, the fourth quarter is positive. Since World War II, the average gain in the S&P has been 4.3 percent, and the market has lost money in only one of every five years.

"If it has happened in the past, it can happen in the future. A Dow of 14,000 would not be too surprising," said Curtis A. Teberg, who runs a fund of mutual funds that moves money from cash to equities and back based on historical patterns. He didn't do so well the third quarter but remains optimistic about his model. "The four most abused words in the financial sector are 'this time it's different,' " he said.

S&P's Stovall remains cautious, noting that the market took its biggest single-day dive ever in October 1987. "I think the market is getting ahead of itself," he said. "We could still experience a bull market correction. When nobody's looking for it, that's when it is likely to happen."Movers

General Motors rose 78 cents, to $33.06. Kirk Kerkorian said he was interested in buying up to 12 million more GM shares as he presses for an alliance with Renault and Nissan.

U.S. Stocks Drop As Economic Data Shows Fed May Not Cut Rates (BLOOM)

By Nick Baker

Bloomberg, September 30, 2006

Sept. 29 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks fell, ending a four-day rally that sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average near a record, as a pickup in manufacturing and growing consumer confidence signaled the Federal Reserve isn't about to cut interest rates.

Homebuilders dropped for a third day, led by Pulte Homes Inc., the largest U.S. builder, on concern that the Fed won't reverse course after 17 rate increases since June 2004. Home Depot Inc. and Nordstrom Inc. declined after a report showed slower growth in consumer spending, hurting retailers.

``We don't think it's a foregone conclusion that the Fed will start to ease rates," said Jason Hsu, who helps oversee $17 billion as director of research and investment management at Research Affiliates LLC in Pasadena, California. Inflation is ``probably the biggest risk factor for equities," he said.

Even with today's retreat, the Dow industrials briefly surpassed its record close in January 2000 for a second day and had its largest third-quarter advance since 1995. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index had its best third quarter in nine years.

The Dow industrials fell 39.38, or 0.3 percent, to 11,679.07. Earlier, the gauge rose to 11,741.99, moving above the record of 11,722.98. The S&P 500 lost 3.30, or 0.3 percent, to 1335.85.

Rate Cut?

A surge in Research In Motion Ltd. shares helped support the Nasdaq Composite Index, which slipped 11.59, or 0.5 percent, to 2258.43.

``The driving force behind higher stocks has been expectations that the Fed is going to ease," said Brett Gallagher, co-head of global equities at Julius Baer Investment Management in New York, which manages about $42 billion.

Falling oil prices and signs inflation is moderating have spurred stocks to rally in the past three months.

The S&P 500 rose 5.2 percent since June 30. The Dow average, which has surged about 1000 points this year, climbed 4.7 percent in the period. The Nasdaq jumped 4 percent.

For the week, the S&P 500 added 1.6 percent and the Dow climbed 1.5 percent. The Nasdaq increased 1.8 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0072101

The National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago said its business barometer rose to a 14-month high of 62.1, from 57.1 in August. Consumer sentiment as measured by the University of Michigan rose to a five-month high.

Consumer Spending

A Commerce Department report reignited concern about growth. Consumer spending in the U.S. climbed 0.1 percent in August, less than the forecast of a 0.2 percent gain, on a slump in housing. The advance followed a 0.8 percent July increase.

The government also said its core price index tied to spending patterns and excluding food and fuel, the Fed's preferred measure of inflation, rose 0.2 percent last month. That matched economists' forecasts.

Citigroup Inc., the biggest U.S. bank by assets, said today the Fed's benchmark rate will be cut to 5 percent by March as the slowing expansion diminishes inflation pressures. The firm has previously forecast rates would remain unchanged through June.

Policy makers last week left the target for overnight loans between banks unchanged at 5.25 percent for a second month.

Retailers in the S&P 500 lost 1.4 percent for the top decline among two dozen industry groups. Home Depot had the Dow average's No. 4 loss, declining 43 cents, or 1.2 percent, to $36.27. Nordstrom fell $1.45 to $42.30.

Pulte Homes Falls

Pulte Homes sank 99 cents to $31.86. A measure of homebuilders in S&P indexes declined 2.3 percent.

Research In Motion, maker of the BlackBerry e-mail phone, surged $16.59, or 19 percent, to $102.65 for the stock's biggest jump since December 2003. Second-quarter profit and its third- quarter forecast were more than analysts projected.

Deutsche Bank AG analyst Brian Modoff raised his recommendation on the shares to ``hold'' from ``sell.'' Merrill Lynch & Co. boosted its price estimate on Research In Motion shares to $110 from $100. RBC Capital Markets Corp. increased its forecast to $140 from $100.

About 13 stocks fell for every six that rose on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.47 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 4.9 percent less than the three-month daily average.

Texas Instruments Inc. dropped 64 cents to $33.25. Shares of the world's biggest mobile-phone chipmaker was cut to ``sell'' from ``source of funds'' by ThinkEquity Partners LLC's Robert Burleson. Fourth-quarter revenue ``may be meaningfully below current expectations,'' the analyst wrote.

Eli Lilly Drops

Eli Lilly & Co. retreated 32 cents to $57. The company said it may abandon its experimental drug for blindness caused by diabetes after U.S. regulators considering approval requested a further study.

Hewlett-Packard Co. added 72 cents, or 2 percent, to $36.69 for the top gain in the Dow average. Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd emerged unscathed, investors said, from seven hours of hearings in Washington after pledging to repair the world's second-largest personal computer maker's image and stamp out unethical behavior.

Hurd, fielding questions from U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee members, said he took responsibility for a company investigation into boardroom leaks that grew into a plot to spy on directors and reporters.

S&P 500 shares, called Spiders, slipped 11 cents to $133.58. Nasdaq-100 tracking shares, known by their QQQQ symbol, lost 18 cents to $40.65.

S&P 500 futures expiring in December fell 1.90 to 1345.40 on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Nasdaq-100 Index futures slipped 2.25 to 1671.25.

The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for companies with a median market value of $617 million, declined 1 percent to 725.59. The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, the broadest measure of U.S. shares, fell 0.3 percent to 13,322.49. Based on its slide, the value of stocks decreased by $47.9 billion.

Hopes Of Soft US Landing Boost Markets (FT)

By Michael Mackenzie In New York And Christopher Brown-humes In London

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

A growing belief that the US economy will achieve a soft landing helped stock markets make strong gains in the third quarter and took the Dow Jones Industrial Average to within a whisker of its all-time high this week.

The rally has been driven by the Federal Reserve's decision in August to stop raising rates and a sharp decline in oil and commodity prices that has tempered inflation expectations. Equity markets have so far shrugged aside worries that the slowing US housing market could lead to a sharp fall in consumer spending.

Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital, said: "Lower bond yields, stronger equities and lower energy prices, will cushion the near-term slowdown."

Sentiment has swung markedly since the volatile markets of May and June when equities and risky assets were buffeted by concerns that rising inflation and commodity prices would provoke global central bank tightening.

The rebound began in late July and "pretty much reflects one long Fed pause," said Joseph Di Censo, global fixed income strategist at Lehman Brothers. "The rally in global markets has been predicated upon prospects of a soft landing in the US." The Dow closed in on its all-time record high of 11,750.28, achieved in 2000. The blue chip benchmark has gained 5 per cent this quarter, its best run since the third quarter of 1995. The Dow has risen 9.3 per cent this year.

The broader S&P 500 index also traded at a five and a half year high this week, having gained 5.3 per cent since the end of June.

The buoyancy spread to Europe where the pan-European FTSE Eurofirst 300 index on Friday rose to within a point of its five and a half year peak of 1,405, set in May. The FTSE 100 index spiked through 6,000 yesterday and the mid-cap FTSE 250 breached 10,000, in each case for the first time since May. Germany's Dax index also breached 6,000.

Japan's Nikkei 225 Average has also advanced. It closed at 16,127.58, well short of its high for the year of 17,563 on April 7 but up 13.4 per cent since it bottomed at 14,218 in June.

Global bond markets have also been rallying. In the US, the Lehman Brothers aggregate index, consisting of Treasuries, corporate and high-yield bonds and mortgage and asset-backed securities is up 4.46 per cent, its best quarterly performance in four years.

Beneath The Dow's Surge, Investors Find A Mixed Bag (WSJ)

By Jeff D. Opdyke, Eleanor Laise And Jane J. Kim

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

Big Company Shares Thrive, But Many Are Missing Out; Assessing a Range of Sectors

The Dow Jones Industrial Average is bumping up against a new high, but that likely isn't reflected in the portfolios of most individual investors.

The most visible symbol of the U.S. stock market closed down 39.38 on Friday, 44 points below the peak of 11722.98 it reached in January 2000, in the waning days of the tech-inspired bubble. Still, the Dow gained 2.6% for the month, and more than 4% for the third quarter, making this the best third quarter in more than a decade.

That's profitable news -- if your portfolio consists of nothing but the 30 big-company stocks comprising the Dow. Few portfolios are built that way, however. Most individuals hold stocks found in the Standard & Poor's 500, the Nasdaq 100 and other indices. The bulk of investors own a blend of stocks, many of which aren't helping to drive the Dow toward record highs.

While the Dow nears uncharted territory, the S&P 500 remains some 12% below its early 2000 record, and the Nasdaq Stock Market is more than 55% short of the peak above 5000 it reached in March 2000.

While both indexes have rebounded from lows hit during the bear market, several underlying market sectors haven't fared so well. Some industry groups remain well below their levels when the Dow hit its 2000 peak, as measured by the Dow Jones Wilshire U.S. sector indexes. These industries include telecommunications, technology hardware and equipment, pharmaceuticals and biotech and autos and auto parts. The market's best performers have included oil and gas, aerospace, real estate and tobacco.

The Dow's strong performance comes after a shift in the market this summer, when professional investors began focusing more heavily on large-cap stocks, the big companies such as those that make up the Dow average. The biggest gainer has been General Motors Corp., which is up 70% since the start of the year.

For several years, investors had favored small and mid-cap stocks, which tend to show stronger earnings growth early in an economic recovery.

Walter McCormick, senior portfolio manager at Evergreen Investments, a Boston asset-management company, began early this year shifting more money into large-cap stocks, which now make up 85% of his portfolio, up from 73% a year ago. "If the economies around the world begin to settle in terms of the pace of growth, the advantage shifts to larger, more stable companies," he says.

Still, many mutual-fund investors aren't rushing into the stock market, an indication the Dow's strong run isn't luring Main Street investors. For the last four months, investors have consistently been yanking money out of domestic stock funds, according to AMG Data Services, a research firm in Arcata, Calif. Instead, they've been investing in international stock funds, real estate, utilities and natural-resources funds.

Here's a look at how various corners of Wall Street have performed in the run-up to the Dow's current level, and what the future could hold:

Financials

DOJ_NMG_0072103

Financial-service firms have been strong performers in recent years. The Dow Jones Wilshire U.S. Financials Index has gained 7.6% annually since the Dow hit its last high in mid-January 2000. Analysts say the outlook is still favorable for many parts of the sector, which tends to do well when interest rates are stable or declining. One exception: Mortgage lenders could be hurt by a slowdown in the housing market.

Some economists expect the Federal Reserve, which has paused in its campaign of raising interest rates, to start cutting them next year. That would help shore up banks' profitability in their lending business. That business has been under pressure recently as short-term interest rates have risen above long-term rates, an unusual phenomenon known as an inverted yield curve.

Investment banks such as Goldman Sachs Group Inc. are a favorite of money managers who say they stand to benefit from a pickup in mergers-and-acquisitions activity. Asset managers and firms with big financial-planning practices -- including BlackRock Inc. and Merrill Lynch & Co. -- should benefit from broader trends including increased savings by an aging population, says Elizabeth Bramwell, a portfolio manager at Sentinel Asset Management Inc., a unit of National Life Group.

Dan Chung, chief executive and portfolio manager of Fred Alger Management Inc. in New York, likes UBS AG, which has a big business serving high-net-worth customers who should be somewhat shielded from a slowdown in the economy. He recommends shying away from credit-card and consumer-finance companies that provide services to low-income or subprime customers, given rising concerns over credit issues.

Consumer Goods

Strong consumer spending in recent years has buoyed the sector. Now, amid signs of a slowing economy, investors may want to look at companies making products that people need whether the economy is strong or not. Ms. Bramwell of Sentinel owns shares of firms like Colgate-Palmolive Co. and Procter & Gamble Co., which have been expanding their businesses overseas. "Not only are they coming up with new products, but they've also got new markets," she says.

Shares of companies that make consumer-durable goods -- things like washing machines and other big purchases that consumers buy only once every few years -- could see a hit. Consumers tend to feel comfortable buying big-ticket items when the economy is strong and when they can finance them more cheaply, analysts say.

Retailers

By the same token, retailers that sell affordable products are likely to do well in a slowing economy, while high-end retailers could see some softness. "The Targets and Wal-Marts of the world that sell staples and sell lower-priced goods may be the beneficiaries as people continue to buy those items and continue to search for value items," says Dorsey Farr, partner at French Wolf & Farr, an investment advisory firm in Atlanta.

Retailers that serve middle-market consumers with "scaled-up products at good prices" also should do well. Ms. Bramwell likes Walgreen Co., CVS Corp., J.C. Penney Co. and Federated Department Stores Inc.

Companies that target less-affluent consumers are likely to be hit harder, since wealthier investors are likely to be insulated from a slowdown in the economy, says Alger's Mr. Chung. He points out there already has been some weakness in dollar stores and low-end discounters, while shares of companies such as Coach Inc. have generally done well over the last five years.

Health Care

Health-care stocks have delivered lackluster returns in recent years. The Dow Jones Wilshire U.S. Health Care Index has climbed just 2.3% annually since 2000. Litigation, the threat of generic competition, and a dwindling supply of blockbuster drugs in the pipeline have plagued many companies in the sector.

There have been some bright spots. Health-care equipment and services companies, for example, have gained nearly 13% annually since early 2000.

Yet some money managers are now jumping in to the large pharmaceutical companies, seeing stable earnings even in an economic slowdown. Texas Capital Value & Growth Fund, for example, raised its health-care allocation to 18% from 14% earlier this month. The fund has been buying into big firms like GlaxoSmithKline PLC and AstraZeneca PLC, says Mark Coffelt, president and chief investment officer at Texas Capital Value Funds.

Technology

Technology hasn't fully recovered from the dot-com bust. The Dow Jones Wilshire U.S. Technology Index has delivered average annualized returns of -11.7% since January 2000. The pain in the sector has been widespread, hitting software and computer services companies alike and hardware and equipment.

Investors who want to keep a foot in the volatile sector should diversify their holdings and be prepared to hold on for at least three to five years, says Mark Mowrey, senior analyst at Al Frank Asset Management. Mr. Mowrey sees opportunities in semiconductor stocks, since their chips increasingly turn up in automobiles, phones and other products.

Fred Hickey, editor of the High-Tech Strategist newsletter in Nashua, N.H., says companies overspent on technology in the bubble days and still haven't worked off those excesses. With growth slowing, companies are unlikely to boost their tech spending. One recent sign of trouble: So far in the third quarter, the number of tech companies issuing earnings warnings is three times as high as in the second quarter, Mr. Hickey says.

Industrials

While the broad Dow Jones Wilshire U.S. Industrials Index has slipped on average 0.5% annually since January 2000, the sector has had a number of bright spots, including construction and materials companies, which gained more than 10% a year, and aerospace and defense stocks, which gained about 12% annually. A weak dollar, strong global growth and low interest rates have created a profitable environment for companies selling construction equipment and airplanes to buyers around the world.

Many professional investors expect the good times to continue, barring a severe downturn in the U.S. or developing countries. While stock prices have climbed, earnings have climbed even faster at many companies, meaning valuations still look reasonable to many. And the favorable conditions of recent years, including a weak dollar and interest rates that are still low by historical measures, are widely expected to persist.

"I think the global demand for capital equipment will remain very strong as countries around the world are prospering and building infrastructure," says Ed Yardeni, chief investment strategist at Oak Associates Ltd.

Rick Helm, manager of the Cohen & Steers Dividend Value fund, likes aerospace and defense companies like General Dynamics Corp. and Lockheed Martin Corp., partly because he expects continued strong defense spending.

The Channel Economy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

If you're unsure about the direction of the U.S. economy, don't worry. Most of the "experts" are too, including the gurus at the Federal Reserve. This is what happens at the stage of an expansion that a friend of ours compares to a shoreline river channel: The tide is going one way but the wind is going another, creating a significant amount of chop and turbulence.

The tide in this case is still coming in, with the economy continuing to show underlying strength. While growth in the second quarter was revised downward this week to 2.6% from 2.9%, the main reason was less inventory buildup. In other words, that growth reflected real demand. The third quarter that ends today has also shown few signs of the great slowdown that many of our most quoted commentators have been predicting for months, if not years.

HOT TOPIC

Taking the Temperature of the U.S. Economy1

The job market remains robust, with the unemployment rate at a low 4.7% and weekly jobless claims falling. The big story in many parts of the country has been a labor shortage, especially for skilled workers and where the crackdown on immigrants has reduced the labor supply. Employers are paying more to keep their best employees, which is why wages have begun to rise more rapidly -- as they typically do at this stage of an expansion. Combined with falling gasoline prices, this will help buoy consumer spending in the months ahead.

Meanwhile, corporate profits and business investment keep growing at impressive rates. This has been the case since the 2003 tax cuts became law, raising the after-tax return on capital investment. The GOP Congress hasn't accomplished much this year, but one achievement was its extension of the 15% tax rate on capital gains and dividends for another two years through 2010. (Credit Arizona's Jon Kyl, who almost single-handedly pushed this through the Senate.) This maintains these incentives to invest past the 2008 election, when taxes will be a major battleground.

So what's creating today's choppy waters? The answer is that the economy is now adjusting to the Fed's mistake of keeping monetary policy too easy for too long from 2003 into 2005. The Fed did an admirable job of easing money in the wake of the dot-com collapse and 9/11. But spooked by what Ben Bernanke (then a Fed governor, now chairman) called "deflation," and underestimating the power of the 2003 tax cuts, the Fed let inflation creep back into investor expectations.

We are now living with the consequences of that mistake. A housing boom that in some markets became an asset bubble has begun to come back to Earth -- painfully so for those who stretched the limits of creative financing. Many Americans measure their net worth largely by their home values, so the housing slump also makes them feel poorer. The good news is that prices rose so far so fast that they'd have to fall quite a ways before they reach the declines last seen in the early 1990s. The slump will, however, take a bite out of GDP for some time to come.

The other great adjustment is likely to come as commodity and natural resource prices adjust to tighter monetary policy. Some of our friends keep saying that the rise of gold, oil, iron ore and other commodity prices in recent years was merely a change in relative prices due to rising demand from China and elsewhere. But we've never seen such a rapid price rise that wasn't also rooted in renewed inflationary expectations. Gold only climbs above $700 an ounce from close to $400 in two years when the Fed is creating too many dollars.

Some of these prices are now falling, as the Fed sticks more diligently to its antiinflation mandate. A decline in oil prices will help the economy, but some investors who made big bets on natural resources will be casualties. Just ask Amaranth Advisors, the hedge fund that may have to liquidate after one of its masters of the universe lost $6 billion betting on energy prices. There will surely be other Amaranths, though a silver lining is that its collapse has so far caused barely a ripple in the larger financial system. A few rich people merely lost a lot of money; that's capitalism.

Today's choppy waters are teaching us once again how dangerous it is for the Fed to allow inflation to infiltrate into investment decisions. Capital begins to move based on anticipated price changes, not on underlying economic value or technological promise. The price and asset booms are great while they last, but the workouts are painful.

A useful thought experiment is to imagine how the last four years would have gone without the tax cuts of 2003 to help overcome today's monetary headwinds. Growth has averaged nearly 4% a year, federal revenues have increased by more than $500 billion over the last two fiscal years, and unemployment is low. If tighter money leads to more trouble in the months ahead, let's hope Washington has the wit to cut taxes again.

Spending Fell In August As Income Growth Lagged (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Americans were more frugal in their spending in August as their incomes rose at a slower pace, and one important measure of inflation climbed faster than it has in 11 years, according to a government report released yesterday.

The Commerce Department said in its monthly report on personal income and consumption that American consumers spent 0.1 percent more in August than in July, the smallest month-to-month increase since November. When the figures are adjusted for inflation, spending fell by 0.1 percent.

“Clearly, the consumer spending binge is coming to an end,” said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisers.

In addition, personal income posted its smallest monthly increase since November, rising 0.3 percent. The comparable figure for July was 0.5 percent.

After a number of recent economic reports suggesting that inflationary pressures were easing, the report yesterday, released by the Commerce Department, was a sign that they are not gone for good. While the Fed has said it expects inflation to gradually diminish as a problem, the central bank has not yet sounded the all-clear — and the latest figures indicate why.

Of the many ways to gauge inflation, the one the Fed watches most carefully is the personal consumption expenditures deflator, a figure derived from the personal-spending statistics that excludes food and energy prices. The deflator showed an increase of 2.5 percent in August, compared with August 2005; it was the largest year-over-year increase since April 1995.

Stuart Hoffman, chief economist with PNC Financial, said that the jump was a reminder “that inflation cannot yet be completely written off.”

In setting interest rates over the last several months, the Federal Reserve has weighed two competing factors: a slowing economy and rising inflation. So far, it has deferred to the slowing economy and left interest rates untouched for the last two months, saying that inflation will eventually subside.

Despite yesterday’s surprisingly high inflation numbers, economists said that the Fed’s economic forecast is still the most likely.

Tom Levinson, an economist with ING, said the report gave little reason for alarm. “Headline inflation measures,” he said, “have started to turn lower, and it is unlikely to be too long before the lagging core measures follow suit.”

Meanwhile, there were other signs yesterday that the economic outlook was brightening. The University of Michigan’s index of consumer sentiment rose to 85.4 in September, from 82 in August, showing that Americans were more confident about the state of the economy than they have been since April.

And a measure of economic activity in the Chicago area showed an unexpected increase this month. The National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago said that its business barometer rose to 62.1 in September from 57.1 in August.

U.S. August Spending Rises 0.1%; Core Prices Up 0.2% (Update3) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 30, 2006

By Carlos Torres

Sept. 29 (Bloomberg) -- Consumer spending in the U.S. rose 0.1 percent last month, less than forecast and the smallest gain since November, as the tumbling housing market made Americans more thrifty.

The rise in spending followed a 0.8 percent July increase, the Commerce Department said today in Washington. Incomes rose and the Federal Reserve's preferred measure of inflation accelerated, the report also showed.

Consumers are finding it harder to tap the equity in their homes, a major source of cash in recent years, as the property market cools. Rising incomes combined with the recent drop in gasoline prices may prevent spending from sliding even more in coming months, ensuring the economy survives the housing slump.

``The consumer is not going to cave in," said Mark Vitner, a senior economist at Wachovia Corp in Charlotte, North Carolina. ``Spending will slow, but it will continue to grow at about the same pace as incomes. We are going to see more modest growth. The fall in gasoline prices should give us additional support."

Economists forecast spending would rise 0.2 percent, after a previously reported 0.8 percent July increase, according to the median of 69 estimates in a Bloomberg News survey.

Falling gasoline prices this month helped boost confidence among American consumers, a separate report showed. The University of Michigan's final index of consumer sentiment increased to 85.4, the highest level in five months, from 82 in August. The latest reading compares with a preliminary figure of 84.4 two weeks ago.

Chicago Manufacturing Survey

Manufacturing in the Chicago area this month unexpectedly accelerated as new orders picked up, a survey from the National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago showed. The group said today its regional index rose to 62.1 this month from 57.1 in August. A reading greater than 50 signals growth.

Treasury securities fell after the reports, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year note rising 3 basis points to 4.64 percent As of 10:21 a.m. in New York.

The consumer spending report's price gauge tied to spending patterns and excluding food and energy costs, the Federal Reserve's preferred measure, rose 0.2 percent in August and was up 2.5 percent from the same month in 2005. The year-over-year gain was the biggest since April 1995.

Fed's Comfort Zone

Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke is among policy makers who have said they would be more comfortable with a 1 percent to 2 percent increase in the measure over a 12-month period.

The central bank last week kept its target rate for overnight lending between banks at 5.25 percent for a second month and said inflation will probably moderate as growth slows and energy prices drop.

``The Fed is willing to be patient to allow a slowdown in the economy to take care of its inflation problem," said Avery Shenfeld, a senior economist at CIBC World Markets Inc. in Toronto. ``I don't think core inflation has definitely passed its peak, but it should be by the time 2007 gets under way."

Incomes increased 0.3 percent in August after a 0.5 percent rise. The monthly gain was the smallest since November. The gain in incomes matched the median forecast in the Bloomberg survey.

Because the increase in spending was smaller than the gain in incomes, the savings rate improved to minus 0.5 percent, from minus 0.7 percent in July. A negative rate suggests consumers are dipping into savings to maintain spending.

Disposable Income

Disposable income, or the money left over after taxes, increased 0.4 percent following a 0.6 percent rise the previous month. The gain left disposable income up 8.8 percent from the same month last year. A decline in incomes in August 2005 caused by uninsured losses from Hurricane Katrina dropped out of the year-over-year calculation last month, explaining the jump.

Taking into account changes in prices, spending dropped 0.1 percent last month, the first decrease since September 2005.

Inflation-adjusted spending on durable goods, such as autos, furniture, and other long-lasting items, fell 1.3 percent, the biggest since October, after rising 1.8 percent. Purchases of non-durable goods dropped 0.2 percent after rising 0.3 percent. Spending on services, which account for almost 60 percent of all outlays, increased 0.1 percent after rising 0.3 percent.

Slower sales have prompted General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler unit to announce that they'll make fewer vehicles for the rest of the year than previously estimated.

Home Equity Borrowing

A decline in the amount of cash owners have taken out of home equity may explain some of the drop in spending on durable goods. Homeowners extracted a net $497 billion at an annual rate from home equity in the second quarter, down from $649.2 billion in the first three months of the year, according to figures from James Kennedy, a Fed economist.

``Consumers just have less capacity to leverage the housing market in order to buy autos and other durable goods," Brian Bethune, an economist at Global Insight Inc. in Lexington, Massachusetts, said before the report. ``Things could perk up a little in the fourth quarter, but we are seeing a palpable slowdown from what we saw in the first half" of the year.

Falling Gasoline Prices

Still, rising incomes and falling gasoline prices are a powerful balm for consumers' housing woes, economists said.

DOJ_NMG_0072107

``I don't think the consumer is going to be dragged down too much my housing," said Tim Rogers, chief economist at Briefing.com, a Boston forecasting firm. ``We have personal income growing, and that is always positive."

Americans may be able to stretch paychecks even farther as gasoline prices drop. The average price of a gallon of regular gasoline at the pump fell to $2.34 this week, the lowest since March, according to American Automobile Association.

Retailers have started to benefit from lower fuel costs. The International Council of Shopping Centers this week boosted its September sales forecast to a 4 percent gain compared with the same month last year from a previous estimate of 3.5 percent. The increase would be the biggest since May.

A report this week from the Conference Board, a New York research group, showed consumer confidence rebounded this month after reaching a nine-month low in August.

Clarence Otis, chief executive officer of Darden Restaurants Inc., owner of the Olive Garden and Red Lobster restaurant chains, said last week that September sales would be equal to or better than August results due to improving confidence.

``We're seeing consumer psychology improve in the last month or so," Otis said in a Sept. 20 interview.

Consumer Spending Slows Sharply (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

Energy Costs Pinch Activity As Income Growth Eases; Inflation Measure Surges

High energy prices and slow income growth suppressed consumer spending in August while a key measure of consumer-price inflation hit an 11-year high.

The Commerce Department reported Friday that personal spending rose a seasonally adjusted 0.1% in August from the previous month to $9.36 trillion. That was the lowest rate of growth since November and much slower than the 0.8% gain in July. Adjusted for inflation, consumer spending fell 0.1% in August, the first inflation-adjusted decline since September 2005, when business activity was disrupted by Hurricane Katrina. Analysts said spending was curtailed by declining auto sales, the continuing contraction in the housing market and gasoline prices that topped $3 a gallon in early August.

Personal income, meanwhile, rose a seasonally adjusted 0.3% in August from the previous month to $11.05 trillion. That followed a 0.5% gain in July. Income growth was the weakest in nine months, reflecting sluggish wage growth in August when job creation was modest.

The August spending deceleration suggests that consumers are "definitely stretched," said Nigel Gault, U.S. economist at Global Insight. "Gas prices had been going up [through early August]. They've tried to keep up their spending by reducing their saving. The value of their homes is no longer going up. They're saying, 'Maybe I should be a bit more cautious right now.'"

Some economists, however, say current economic conditions might not be as bad as the August reading on income and spending suggests. They note, for example, that taking July and August together, spending is on track to rise at an annualized rate of about 3% in the third quarter. That is in line with the growth rate over the past year, though slower than the 3.5% growth recorded in all of 2005.

But as housing activity deteriorates, economists expect consumer spending to slow even further later this year, and as a result many have marked down their projections for economic growth for the second half of this year. The consensus estimate of 56 economic forecasters queried in WSJ.com's September survey calls for gross domestic product, adjusted for inflation, to rise at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 2.7% during the second half, compared with 4.1% in the first half. The Bureau of Economic Analysis is scheduled to release an estimate of third-quarter GDP on Oct. 27.

The core personal consumption expenditures price index -- the key inflation gauge followed by the Federal Reserve, which excludes food and energy -- rose 0.2% in August from a month earlier and was up 2.5% from a year earlier. That is the highest year-over-year reading since April 1995, and remains above the 1% to 2% comfort zone preferred by many Fed officials. Still, analysts said Friday that they expect inflation to ease in early 2007 as the broader economy slows. Indeed, the Fed in September left its short-term interest rate target at 5.25% for a second consecutive meeting.

UBS AG economist Jim O'Sullivan suggests that underlying inflation is more stable than it appears because the reading has been exclusively pushed higher by climbing rent costs. Excluding rent, which constitutes about 17% of this core index, core inflation in the eight months through August has climbed at an annualized rate of 2%. That is the same pace as for all of 2005 and "a sign that prices are not broadly overheating," he said.

Separately, the University of Michigan reported that its consumer-sentiment index rose to 85.4 in September, from 82 in August, as falling gasoline prices improved consumer moods.

If lower gasoline prices hold, consumer spending "should look better" than in August, said Mr. Gault, of Global Insight. "People won't have to worry about pouring so much money into their gas tanks."

McClatchy-MSNBC Poll:George Allen Loses Lead In VA Senate Race (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republican Sen. George Allen of Virginia has lost his lead in his bid for re-election and is now tied with Democratic challenger James Webb, a new poll for McClatchy Newspapers and MSNBC showed Friday.

The poll found that the two men each have the support of 43 percent of registered voters, with a third-party candidate supported by 2 percent and the other 12 percent undecided.

The tie underscored how quickly prospects have changed for Allen, once thought to be cruising toward a comfortable re-election that he'd use as a springboard to a bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

The race's importance, however, extends far beyond Allen's own political prospects. It's one of a half-dozen Republican seats that are considered vulnerable to Democratic takeovers; Democrats need to gain six seats to take control of the Senate.

As late as July, Allen looked safe. He led Webb by 16 points, 48-to-32 percent, in a survey by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc., which also conducted the McClatchy-MSNBC poll. Allen's lead had shrunk to 4 points, 46-to-42 percent, earlier this month, according to another Mason-Dixon survey.

A key reason for the race tightening has been enormous publicity over Allen's stumbling responses to questions about his character, surprising missteps for a polished campaigner up against an often awkward challenger.

Beyond the latest flaps, however, Allen grew more vulnerable when the Democrats nominated Webb, a candidate well suited to a right-of-center state that's home to the Atlantic fleet, as well as major Air Force and Army bases. Web, a Naval Academy graduate, is a decorated Vietnam combat veteran and Navy Secretary under Ronald Reagan whose campaign slogan is "born fighting."

Iraq was the number one issue for 23 percent of Virginia voters, followed by terrorism for 19 percent and the economy and jobs for 16 percent.

Webb opposes Bush's policies in Iraq, while Allen defends them.

Virginia voters were divided over what do to about Iraq: 26 percent want to send more troops; 19 percent want to keep the same number; 21 percent want to withdraw some; and 20 percent want to withdraw all U.S. troops. Some 15 percent said they weren't sure what to do.

Also, Allen is closely allied with President Bush, who's lost support in Virginia as he has elsewhere. The poll found that 57 percent of Virginia voters disapprove of the way Bush is handling his job, and 62 percent disapprove of his policies in Iraq. Virginia voted for Bush in 2000 and 2004.

Some 57 percent of Virginians said they think that the nation is on the "wrong track," while only 29 percent said it's going in the "right direction."

Virginians also expressed some desire for dividing government power in Washington between the two parties. The poll found 42 percent of Virginia voters saying they preferred divided government, 36 percent saying they preferred one party to be in charge, and 23 percent not sure.

Questions about Allen's character first arose in August, when he was caught on videotape at a rally referring to a dark-skinned Indian-American in the crowd as a "macaca" and sarcastically welcoming the native-born Virginian to Virginia.

"Macaca" is considered a racial slur in North Africa, where Allen's mother was from. He said that he didn't know the word and had simply made it up, and he subsequently apologized to the young man, who was a campaign worker for Webb monitoring Allen's rally.

In subsequent weeks, Allen reacted angrily when he was asked in a debate whether his mother was Jewish, calling that an "aspersion." Days later, he acknowledged his mother's Jewish ancestry, saying he'd learned of it only in August, when she told him after a Jewish magazine raised the issue.

In the past week, several people, including former college football teammates, accused Allen of using a racial slur for African-Americans in the 1970s, a charge he denies. Previously he'd been criticized for flaunting a Confederate flag as a young man.

It's all taken a toll with voters such as Diane Canary, 45, a homemaker from Roanoke, who said she supports Webb. "We're concerned with recent things that have been said about Allen and with the racist remarks."

In the wake of the Allen flap, Webb also faced accusations that he used a racial slur. He said it might have passed his lips as a youth, but never as a slur directed at anyone. Webb has been criticized for using derogatory language about women in the military, especially in a 1979 Washingtonian magazine article titled "Women Can't Fight."

Webb has had his own missteps on other fronts. He aired an ad featuring praise from the late President Reagan, which drew a rebuke from former First Lady Nancy Reagan.

"That sent a bad message to me," said William Kilpatrick, 64, a retiree from Bluemont who supports Allen. "For him not to honor her request, I didn't think it was that out of line."

HOW WE POLL

The McClatchy-MSNBC Poll is a snapshot of voter opinion at the time it was conducted. It is not a prediction of how people will vote on Election Day.

The poll of 625 registered voters was conducted by telephone from Sept. 23 through Sept. 27. Those interviewed were selected by a random variation of telephone numbers from a cross section of telephone exchanges. That means anyone in the state had the same odds of being called as anyone else. Cell phones were not called.

The margin of error was plus or minus four percentage points. That means that 95 percent of the time, the accurate number could be somewhere between 4 percentage points above our poll number and four percentage points below it. The other 5 percent of the time, the number could be off by more.

The sampling margin of error does not include other variables that could affect results, including the way questions are worded or the order in which they are asked.

Poll: Allen Tied With Democrat In Va. (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, September 30, 2006

U.S. Sen. George Allen's Democratic opponent has closed the gap in the race, reflecting two difficult weeks for the first-term Republican battling claims of racial insensitivity, according to a poll released Friday night.

Allen and Jim Webb each had the support of 43 percent of the respondents, according to the MSNBC/McClatchy Poll conducted by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc.

Twelve percent were undecided and 2 percent backed independent candidate Gail Parker.

Allen, who was positioning himself for a 2008 presidential race as he sought re-election, led Webb by 16 percentage points in a Mason-Dixon poll two months ago.

Allen saw his support in drop in the polls since he singled out a 20-year-old Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent at a nearly all-white rally on Aug. 11 and called him "Macaca," a word considered a racial slur in some cultures.

The latest poll was conducted amid new, widely publicized claims by Allen's former University of Virginia football teammates that, in the early 1970s, Allen often used a racial epithet commonly applied to black people.

Allen said in a Friday night interview on the Fox News Network that Webb and his Democratic allies were fanning the issues to confuse voters.

"The Democrats know that if they can get off on detours and distractions that avoids talking about ideas, issues and the record of performance," he said.

Webb campaign strategist Steve Jarding said the poll shows Allen is in a tailspin.

Accusations Continue To Fly In Racially Charged Contest (WP)

Black Caucus Backs Webb; Colleague Comes to Allen's Defense

The issue of race continued to dominate the Virginia Senate contest yesterday as a group of black lawmakers endorsed Democrat James Webb, while one of incumbent Sen. George Allen's colleagues defended him against charges of racism.

With a little more than five weeks to go before the election, the race between Allen (R) and Webb has gotten nasty, as supporters of each candidate accuse the other of dirty politics.

The race is tightening. A Mason-Dixon poll conducted for MSNBC and released yesterday shows a dead heat, with Allen and Webb each at 43 percent. In July, Allen led by 16 percentage points in the Mason-Dixon poll. His lead was 4 points earlier this month.

The Virginia Legislative Black Caucus, which has been slow to back Webb because of his stance on affirmative action, formally threw its support behind him yesterday. In a statement, the group of 17 black members of the General Assembly charged Allen and President Bush with practicing "the politics of division."

Earlier in the day, Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.) appeared at an event with Allen at which she accused Democrats of trying to smear Allen with charges he used racial epithets during and shortly after college.

"I have never seen . . . the personal attacks in a Senate race I have seen in this one," Hutchison said at a Republican gathering in Tysons Corner. "The people of Virginia are not going to be misled. . . . They are going to leave all this negative blur and say, 'Why didn't this come out before?' "

Since the summer, when he called an Indian American man who works for the Webb campaign "macaca," Allen has been forced to respond to charges of racism. Macaca is a genus of monkey and a racial slur in some cultures.

The macaca furor was heightened by questions about Allen's past, including the fact that he had the Confederate flag at his home and a noose decorating his law office.

Allen's background received further scrutiny this week after acquaintances came forward to allege that he used the N-word directed at black people during his college days and the years immediately after. Allen vehemently denies he ever used the word.

At the event with Hutchison, Allen briefly spoke to about 85 female supporters. He left without taking questions after Hutchison finished speaking. But his wife, Susan, responded to a question from the audience about how the family was "holding up."

"George is famous for saying, 'They haven't killed me yet.' And doggone it, we're still walking and talking," Susan Allen said.

Webb was also dogged this week by charges he had used the N-word. At the urging of the Allen campaign, a Fairfax County man contacted The Washington Post and said Webb told him in 1983 that while a student at the University of Southern California in the early 1960s, Webb drove around Watts and harassed blacks while shouting epithets. Webb denied the allegation, calling it a dirty trick by the Allen campaign.

African Americans, who make up about 20 percent of Virginia's electorate, are a reliable Democratic voting bloc. But Webb has struggled to gain the support of key black leaders because of his stance on affirmative action.

Webb once called affirmative action "state-sponsored racism," but he has since clarified his position. He now says he supports affirmative action programs for blacks but not for other ethnic minorities whose ancestors did not endure slavery.

In making their endorsement, members of the black caucus cited Webb's opposition to the war in Iraq and his economic policies. They also cited Allen's opposition while governor to the creation of a Martin Luther King Jr. Day holiday.

"George Allen has a history of insensitivity to the African American community and a voting record to match," said Del. Dwight Clinton Jones (D-Richmond), chairman of the caucus.

Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, dismissed the endorsement. "What a shock. The black caucus, which is all Democrats, endorsed James Webb," Wadhams said.

Wadhams noted that one prominent member of the black caucus, Sen. Benjamin J. Lambert III (D-Richmond), is supporting Allen. Lambert endorsed Allen last month, citing his support for historically black colleges and universities.

Wadhams also noted Allen has secured tens of millions of dollars for programs and services in predominantly African American communities.

Former governor L. Douglas Wilder, who is mayor of Richmond, said Allen "has put himself in a tough spot."

"This campaign is Allen versus Allen," said Wilder, the state's only black governor. "The problem this raises for the senator is when you are put in a posture of denial, it does create questions."

Wilder says he hasn't decided whether to endorse a candidate, but he hopes the debate shifts to "real issues" soon."

"If you take the N-word and macaca, where do you go from here?" Wilder asked. "The voting public is left in a quandary."

Candidate Has Ad About Opponent's Affair (AP)

AP, September 30, 2006

A Democratic House candidate has launched the first TV commercial to focus on his Republican opponent's affair with a woman who claimed Rep. Don Sherwood abused her.

Chris Carney's commercial features a Republican voter from Sherwood's hometown who speaks directly to the camera and says: "This incident with Don Sherwood just cuts right at the core values of our district."

As he speaks, the phrases "repeatedly choking" and "attempting to strangle plaintiff," taken from a lawsuit filed against the four-term congressman, appear on screen.

The ad does not mention that Sherwood was never charged, and Sherwood's spokesman called the spot misleading.

Carney and Sherwood are locked in a battle for a seat considered safely Republican until last year, when the conservative congressman's five-year extramarital affair became public.

Sherwood admitted to the affair with Cynthia Ore, but denied any abuse. The married father of three reached a confidential settlement with Ore, who sued claiming Sherwood had choked her at his Washington apartment.

Sherwood's spokesman, Jake O'Donnell, said Carney has broken a pledge to refrain from running attack ads.

"Chris Carney said when he first announced he was running that he was going to run on the issues, and was not going to talk about the personal situation. But clearly his campaign has decided to do something different," O'Donnell said. "They're not interested in telling the truth in that ad."

Carney said Friday that the ad focuses on an issue important to voters.

"Wherever we are in the district, the constituents are talking about it," he said. "It's an issue that matters to everyone."

The spot, which began airing in the Scranton/Wilkes-Barre TV market Thursday night, was part of the campaign's weekly ad buy of $75,000. The campaign said it has not determined how long it will run.

Va. Candidate Pleaded In 1970s Assault (AP)

By Sonja Barisic

AP, September 30, 2006

Democratic congressional candidate Phil Kellam said Friday he regrets his actions in an incident that led to him plead guilty to assaulting a woman 28 years ago, when he was a 21-year-old college student in North Carolina.

Kellam, who is challenging first-term Republican Rep. Thelma Drake, said he never touched the woman but lost his temper after almost getting into a traffic accident with her.

"I didn't conduct myself as a gentleman, and I regret that," Kellam told reporters while briefly taking questions after attending a fundraiser. He said he's conducted his life since in a way that "shows that I am a person that is reliable, honest and honors personal responsibility."

Kellam didn't give details about the case, which came to light Thursday on a local conservative Web log, or blog, BearingDrift.com. Kellam questioned why "somebody goes and dredges up something that is a non-issue from 28 years ago."

Kellam campaign spokesman Drew Lankford accused the Drake campaign of being involved in spreading word of the case. He said Drake should fire her campaign manager, Tim Murtaugh, who acknowledged traveling to North Carolina to look into the case but said he did not give the information to the blog.

Murtaugh responded that "Phil Kellam has no room to talk, since he has spent $13,000 looking into Thelma Drake's background."

Lankford said the campaign has researched voting records but not the personal record of Drake, who represents the Republican-leaning 2nd District, which includes Virginia Beach, the Eastern Shore and parts of Norfolk and Hampton.

Lankford said Kellam was driving with his then-girlfriend when a woman who had been tailgating him cut in front of him to go to a convenience store. Kellam, then a student at Elon University, slammed on his brakes, and his girlfriend hit her head on the windshield and her shoulder on the dashboard, Lankford said.

Angered, Kellam walked over to the woman's car, smacked the hood and yelled at the woman to watch where she was going, Lankford said.

He said Kellam pleaded guilty to simple assault, a misdemeanor, at the advice of his lawyer and paid court costs but no fine.

Murtaugh said he went to North Carolina to check out the case after someone anonymously sent the Drake campaign a court document.

Murtaugh said Kellam, the Virginia Beach commissioner of the revenue, should have told voters about this himself a long time ago.

Blogger Jim Hoeft said Friday that "a source who has a source in North Carolina" e-mailed him the court document with Kellam's plea and that the information did not come from anyone connected with the Drake campaign or the GOP.

DOJ_NMG_0072112

Hoeft, who has been involved in Republican politics and worked on several campaigns, said he posted the document because he thought it was relevant to the campaign.

Bush Takes Up Campaigning Duties With Less Political Clout (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush assumes the role of campaigner in chief on Monday, kicking off a month-long drive to help Republicans keep control of Congress.

In the last midterm congressional elections four years ago, the president's efforts paid big dividends for his party, but since then the political ground has shifted. He's still a big draw for Republican fundraisers, but some candidates who proudly campaigned with Bush in the past are keeping their distance now.

Bush's three-day swing through Nevada, California, Arizona and Colorado is packed with closed-door donor receptions, but doesn't include a single open-door event or public rally.

"It's a Catch-22. They're in trouble because of Bush, but they still need Bush to raise money for them," said Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "They want to tap the White House ATM, but they don't want to do it in public."

White House aides scoff at suggestions that Bush is trying to operate under the radar. Nearly all receptions on the president's Western road trip will be open to media coverage, so it's not like he'll slip into town unnoticed. Big public rallies are planned for later, closer to the Nov. 7 election.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush will be on the road almost constantly between now and Election Day. Democrats need to gain six Senate seats and 15 House of Representatives seats to take control of Congress.

"You're going to see a very active travel schedule. He's going to be all over the country campaigning for Republicans," Snow said at a recent breakfast. "There are a lot of candidates saying, `Please, please, please, come to my district or come to my state.'"

A spokesman for Rep. John Doolittle, who'll host Bush at a $2,000-per-person reception in El Dorado Hills, Calif., Tuesday afternoon, said the congressman was eager to have Bush come to his conservative district in north central California. Political handicappers in Washington list Doolittle as likely to win re-election.

"I think it's going to fire up our base. It's created a buzz," spokesman Richard Robinson said.

Still, there's no question that Bush's political stock has plummeted. While he may be welcome in Republican districts, he's become a liability for Republicans in hotly competitive swing districts.

Four years ago, the nonpartisan Gallup Poll showed Bush with an impressive 68 percent approval rating at the end of September. During the same period in 2004, he was headed for re-election with 54 percent approval.

Now, fewer than half of Americans - 44 percent in the latest Gallup Poll - say they approve of Bush's job performance. His numbers are worse in California, where a nonpartisan Field Poll released Friday showed his job approval at 29 percent.

"Californians just aren't moved by Bush," Field Poll director Mark DiCamillo said. "If it's a competitive district, I think it would be a net negative to be embraced by the president."

The new dynamic shows up in campaign ads across the country. In 2002, Bush was featured in countless Republican ads, and even some Democrats touted their support for his tax cuts and his aggressive approach to terrorism. Now, he appears more often in Democratic attack ads than in Republican-sponsored messages.

"We've got a number of commercials where Bush is the star," said Singer, the Democratic campaign operative. "A negative ad this year basically is defined by having George Bush in it. That's the reality the White House is dealing with."

In Arizona, where Bush will stop on Wednesday, Republican Sen. Jon Kyl objected when Democratic candidate Jim Pederson aired an ad depicting him as a "yes man" for Bush. Kyl issued a three-page rebuttal detailing his eight votes against Bush's policies.

While distancing himself from Bush, Kyl embraced maverick Republican John McCain, the other Arizona senator and a frequent irritant to the White House.

Some Republican congressional candidates are trying to keep the focus on local issues, steering clear of the war in Iraq if at all possible. Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., who'll host Bush at a Stockton reception Tuesday morning, doesn't even mention Iraq in the "issues" section of his campaign Web site.

Despite his diminished political appeal, Bush remains a potent fundraiser. He's already raised about $180 million for Republicans in this election cycle.

Robert Benedetti, a political science professor at University of the Pacific in Stockton, said Bush's four-state fundraising trip plays to his strength while reducing the risk of political embarrassment.

DOJ_NMG_0072113

"This is a place, just like an Air Force base or an Army base, where he's not going to get a lot of hecklers," he said of Bush's visit to California's agricultural heartland. "He's always been highly controlled with his events. What they want here are good, positive media events - do no harm is very important to them - and money."

Better Mood At The Gas Pump. What About The Voting Booth? (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

On election day, will voters see their gas tanks as half full or half empty?

Gasoline prices have plummeted in the last month, dropping by nearly 25 percent since mid-July, and despite a recent uptick in crude oil prices, most energy experts still expect the price of gasoline to fall a bit further by November.

Six weeks from the midterm elections, the falloff is comforting the Republican majority up for re-election in Congress, limiting the impact of a potentially damaging issue. But Democrats hope to gain power on Capitol Hill, in part, by hitting on the toll that high energy costs have taken on American consumers and trying to draw connections to what they see as the Bush administration's kowtowing to big oil interests.

A gallon of regular gas now averages $2.33, after rising above $3 in August. But given that even the current lower prices are higher than was common just a couple of years ago, the question of who will benefit politically from the drop is still hotly disputed.

"Nobody thinks $2.50 a gallon is cheap; it's still expensive," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois, who is leading the effort to win a majority in the House. "Guess what? Republicans may be relieved from a political standpoint but their voters aren't."

So, are Republicans worried?

"Absolutely not," said Carl Forti, the spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee. "Right now people are excited they are not paying $3 a gallon anymore, and frankly, so am I. Today, in every place in America, gas is cheaper than a month ago."

The sudden decline has also ignited suspicions that the Republican administration and giant oil companies conspired to cut gasoline prices for electoral gains.

"I think prices are going down now because it's election time but I feel they will go back up again right after," said Roberta Mays, a school bus driver in Knox, Pa.

Her opinion was reflected in a Sept. 15-17 Gallup poll, which found that 42 percent of respondents said that they believed the Bush administration was manipulating the price of gasoline in advance of the fall elections.

And the accusation has provoked a vigorous debate on the Web. On huffingtonpost.com, a left-wing blog, someone commented: "Anybody with any brains KNOWS this government manipulates almost everything here in the States."

The White House press secretary, Tony Snow, even brought up that conspiracy theory at a recent briefing by joking that some people thought "the President has been rigging gas prices, which would give him the kind of magisterial clout unknown to any other human being."

Prices are down largely because of a sharp drop in global oil prices, which peaked in July at $77 a barrel, and, while up slightly this week from recent lows around $60, are still under $63 a barrel.

Much of the drop can be attributed to a big sell-off by hedge funds and other speculative traders, who help determine the price of crude oil and other petroleum-based products on international commodity markets — and not to American oil companies, which control only a fraction of global oil supplies.

While the drop this fall is larger than under ordinary circumstances, it also fits a pattern that sometimes occurs at this time of year. Tom Kloza, publisher of the Oil Price Information Service, said a decline in prices after Labor Day was not uncommon because of lower demand in the months following the summer driving season. Demand then picks up in the winter, often leading to a rebound in prices.

"One of the reasons you don't hear much about gasoline during elections is because gasoline is almost always in retreat at this time of the year," Mr. Kloza said. "If we really want to see a meaningful energy policy in this country we need to change the elections to May." In recent weeks, oil traders have also been comforted by the fact that no strong hurricane has slammed into the Gulf of Mexico, home to a quarter of America's domestic energy supply, and that tensions in the Middle East seem to have eased a little.

Not surprisingly, the sharp decline in gasoline prices has lifted the morale of Americans. Consumer confidence indicators released on Tuesday rebounded from a nine-month low, thanks mainly to the drop in gasoline, which has left many Americans feeling a little wealthier.

The retreat of gasoline prices provides some relief to the Bush administration and Republicans that could help blunt public dissatisfaction with Washington.

"It removes a significant arrow from the quivers of Democrats," said Frank Luntz, a Republican political consultant and pollster. "When prices crossed $3, voters wanted their elected officials to feel as much pain as they felt. Now, all that anger is gone. I don't think it's going to help Republicans but it is no longer going to help Democrats either."

Still, despite the drop-off, many Americans remain deeply disturbed by the price of gasoline. Indeed, today's prices have merely erased the most recent highs and have barely returned to last year's levels.

Ms. Mays, 41, said she recently gave up a job that required a 60-mile commute each day, partly because of the high cost of gasoline. A single mother who is struggling to raise a 10-year-old son, she said the fuel price increase absorbed a large chunk of her $9,000 salary.

"It was almost not worth going to work anymore," she said. "I keep thinking when is gasoline going back to $1 again? It would be nice but I don't think so."

Democrats are hoping that such feelings will translate into a high turnout among discontented voters, enough perhaps for them to win the House and even the Senate.

"Voters see the link" between gasoline prices and chaos in the Middle East and in Iraq, said Paul Begala, a Democrat political strategist. "You don't have to tell them."

"If they pull up at the pump and pay $2.50 instead of $3 a gallon, it's an enormous difference," he added. "Do they say 'Thank you George Bush,' and vote Republican? Perhaps. But I wouldn't want to be the Republican staking my career on that decision."

Political analysts said that while the war in Iraq and the handling of relief efforts after Hurricane Katrina are much bigger factors in shaping public attitudes, many Americans also see gasoline as a sore issue.

While the approval ratings for the Bush administration have risen somewhat from their lows of the early summer, the president's declining popularity has generally mirrored the rise in gasoline prices, said Andrew Kohut, the president of the Pew Research Center.

"Rising gasoline prices have taken quite a toll on President Bush's approval ratings," Mr. Kohut said. "Of course there have been other issues — like Katrina and Iraq — but if you track the rise in gasoline prices it correlates very nicely with Bush's falling ratings."

The question now, he added, "is how much will declining prices obviate that clear negative?"

Gasoline prices, visible to consumers every day, are not necessarily crucial in their own right. But they have acted as a proxy for attitudes toward the general economy, which, Democrats argue, has worsened for the average American under President Bush.

"It's a constant reminder that things are tough," said Senator Jack Reed, a Democrat of Rhode Island. "Everything keeps going up and wages for middle-class Americans have been stuck for five years."

In contrast to the previous energy shocks of the 1970's and early 1980's, however, the recent surge in oil prices did not seriously trip up the economy, sending it over the edge into a recession. The increase was driven by rising global demand, not by a supply shortage precipitated by events in the Middle East, and growth has continued right through the surge in prices.

Indeed, Americans are consuming more gasoline than ever, thanks to a growing population and an expanding economy. But the price increases have imposed a toll.

Gasoline demand in the United States is expected to rise just 1 percent this year, to 9.22 million barrels a day, according to the forecasts by the Energy Information Administration, compared with an annual growth of 1.9 percent from 1992 to 1999. Next year, the agency sees a rise of 1.2 percent in gasoline consumption.

"While gasoline demand has not declined, the growth has certainly declined from its longer-term trend," said Tancred Lidderdale, a senior economist at the Energy Information Administration. "One thing I would suggest is that the impact of high prices isn't immediate. Habits are slow to change."

They are changing, though. Wal-Mart has said that its customers are making fewer trips to its stores. Automakers in Detroit have suffered big drops in the sale of their S.U.V.'s and pickup trucks as buyers turn to smaller, more efficient models. More drivers are carpooling or delaying some trips because of the impact of high prices.

In a New York Times/CBS poll taken in May, 63 percent of respondents said they had reduced their driving because of higher prices; 49 percent said they planned to change their holiday plans because of higher gas costs; 56 percent said that high energy costs had led to cutbacks in household spending.

"It's hard on the middle class, on people like us," Jean Smith, 59, a schoolteacher in Kennett Square, Pa., said this week. She said high energy costs were a burden on her family, which has $15,000 in debt, one son in college and another in the military. She and her husband, also a high-school teacher, earn a combined income of about $75,000 a year.

"Our gasoline and heating oil bills have doubled in the past 10 years," she said, "but our salaries certainly haven't."

Change In Goldman Index Played Role In Gasoline Price Drop (NYT)

By Heather Timmons

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 29 — Politics and worries about oil supplies may have caused gasoline prices to go up at the pump earlier this year, but one big investment bank quietly helped their rapid drop in recent weeks, according to some economists, traders and analysts.

Goldman Sachs, which runs the largest commodity index, the G.S.C.I., said in early August that it was reducing the index's weighting in gasoline futures significantly. The announcement did not make big headlines, but it has reverberated through the markets in the weeks since and some other investors who had been betting that gasoline would rise followed suit on their weightings.

"They started unwinding their positions, and those other longs also rushed to the door at the same time," said Lawrence J. Goldstein, president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation.

Wholesale prices for New York Harbor unleaded gasoline, the major gasoline contract traded on the New York Mercantile Exchange, dropped 18 cents a gallon on Aug. 10, to $1.9889 a gallon, a decline of more than 8 percent, and they have dropped further since then. In New York on Friday, gasoline futures for October delivery rose 4.81 cents, or 3.2 percent, to $1.5492 a gallon. Prices have fallen 9.4 percent this year.

The August announcement by Goldman Sachs caught some traders by surprise. The firm said in early June that it planned to roll its positions in the harbor contract into another futures contract, the reformulated gasoline blendstock, which is replacing the harbor contract at the end of the year because of changes to laws about gasoline additives.

Later in June, Goldman said it had rolled a third of its gasoline holdings into the reformulated contracts but would make further announcements as to whether the remainder would be rolled over. Then in August, the bank said it would not roll over any more positions into gasoline and would redistribute the weighting into other petroleum products.

Goldman Sachs declined to comment. Some traders speculated that Goldman might have been concerned about the liquidity of the reformulated contract and whether other traders would embrace it because there were so few contracts outstanding. The open interest, or number of futures contracts taken out, has increased ninefold in the reformulated contract since then.

Unleaded gasoline made up 8.72 percent of Goldman's commodity index as of June 30, but it is just 2.3 percent now, representing a sell-off of more than $6 billion in futures contract weighting.

Like many market indexes, trading in the Goldman Sachs Commodity Index is publicly available, allowing individual investors and third-party asset managers to participate in that market. The $100 billion invested comes from brokers, fund managers and individuals, probably including some of the same people who were hurt by high gasoline prices earlier in the year.

Goldman's announcement on Aug. 9 was not the only downward pressure on prices that week, market participants stress. And while it may have played a part in sending prices down, the market would never have continued its downward trend unless supplies had loosened up, they say.

Also during that week, climatologists revised their hurricane forecasts, easing fears that oil supplies could be disrupted. And BP said it would still produce some oil from its field in Prudhoe Bay, Alaska, where leaks were being repaired. Meanwhile, the peak gasoline season was ending, and new supplies of ethanol were coming online.

The week started with "everyone talking about $4 gasoline and ended with the market down sharply," said Phil Verleger, an independent economist in Aspen, Colo.

In following weeks, "traders all tried to push themselves through that door," Mr. Goldstein added.

"We saw gasoline fall 82 cents in the wholesale market over a four-week period, which is unprecedented," he said. Mr. Goldstein said that the decline in gasoline prices helped send prices of the whole group of energy-related products down.

Now, rather than highs, these products are hitting lows — natural gas, for example, traded on Wednesday at its lowest price in four years.

Wal-Mart Launches Employee Voter Drive (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Activists Question Retailer's Motives

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. yesterday launched a voter registration drive aimed at its 1.3 million U.S. employees in what it describes as the largest such effort by a private company.

DOJ_NMG_0072116

The kickoff was held in Iowa, a key battleground in the upcoming midterm elections. Workers at Wal-Mart's roughly 3,800 other facilities across the country also received registration forms yesterday. Although the world's largest retailer said it does not want to influence how its workers vote, David Tovar, director of media relations, said the drive was prompted by recent criticism of the company by politicians.

Wal-Mart workers "read the newspapers and see the headlines, just like you and I do," Tovar said. "They recognize there were some elected officials that were saying some things that didn't really represent the company. They wanted to have an opportunity to have their voice heard."

Wal-Mart is working with Democratic strategist Charles Baker of the law firm DLA Piper and Republican strategist Terry Nelson, founder of Crosslink Strategy, on what it has dubbed the Voter Education Program. The company has prepaid postage for voter registration forms in Iowa and several other states. It is also allowing workers whose shifts do not give them three hours to visit the polls to take paid time off to vote. Before the elections in 2004, they received two hours of unpaid time off.

Wal-Mart sent letters to 18,000 Iowa employees in August criticizing Sens. Evan Bayh of Indiana and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Govs. Tom Vilsack of Iowa and Bill Richardson of New Mexico -- all Democrats -- for participating in a bus tour arranged by Wake Up Wal-Mart, which is funded by the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union. Similar letters were sent to workers in New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

The bus tour was designed to attract new members to Wake Up Wal-Mart and draw attention to the company's health benefits package.

Labor groups have accused the retailer of blocking employee attempts at unionizing. They also assert that Wal-Mart runs small companies out of business, depresses wages and does not provide adequate health coverage for its employees.

Wal-Mart Watch, which is backed by the Service Employees International Union, said it supports the retailer's voter drive but was still critical of its political efforts.

"Wal-Mart's employees realize that the company's lobbyists don't represent their personal interests," spokesman Nu Wexler said.

Some activist groups questioned the retailer's motives, citing Wal-Mart's policy of banning voter registration drives conducted by outside parties from its stores.

"If Wal-Mart is truly interested in promoting a just democracy, then customers and employees should be included in registration activities," said Edward A. Hailes Jr., senior attorney with Advancement Project, a national civil rights group organization that works on voting issues.

In the spring, volunteers with Project Vote and the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, a nonprofit group that has been critical of Wal-Mart, attempted to set up voting drives at several Florida stores, said Brian Mellor, the elections counsel for Project Vote. He said they were quickly asked to leave.

Tovar said the company's blanket policy bans such drives because it disrupts customers' shopping experience but that it has made exceptions for some nonpartisan groups.

Wal-Mart Launches Registration Drive (FT)

By Jonathan Birchall In New York

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

Wal-Mart, the largest US retailer, on Friday launched a drive to encourage its 1.3m employees to register to vote, in the biggest operation of its kind ever by a US private employer.

The company has begun distributing voter registration packages – including postage-paid application forms – to more than 17,000 employees at its stores and warehouses in Iowa, with other states due to follow.

In Taking On Fox, Democrats See Reward In The Risk (NYT)

By Lorne Manly

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

THE Fox News Channel doesn't officially turn 10 until this week, but the Democrats have already begun doing their best to spoil the celebrations.

The party crashing began last Sunday, when former President Bill Clinton transformed an interview with Chris Wallace on "Fox News Sunday" into a finger-pointing tirade against what he called a "conservative hit job." Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, quickly released a statement applauding Mr. Clinton for standing up to what he described as a right-wing, bullying propaganda machine.

DOJ_NMG_0072117

In separate appearances on Fox News over the next two days, Lanny J. Davis, a former special counsel to Mr. Clinton, and Barbara Boxer, the Democratic senator from California, mocked the news channel's trademarked motto of being "fair and balanced."

And on Wednesday Paul Begala and James Carville, Democratic commentators for CNN, engaged in more than five minutes of high-decibel debate on Fox with Bill O'Reilly about Mr. Clinton's appearance, daring Mr. O'Reilly to "come out of the closet" and admit Fox News is a "right-leaning, anti-Clinton network."

The attacks represent a new twist on the Democrats' complicated dance with the cable news channel. Though Fox News maintains that its reporting is down the middle, Democrats have long complained that the news channel operates like a public relations outpost of the Bush White House. But never before has that anger built into a mad-as-hell-and-not-going-to-take-it-any-more moment, and spilled over in such naked and sustained fashion onto Fox News itself.

"The Republicans are using Fox News to gin up their base, and now — for the first time — the Democrats are doing it, too," said Steve McMahon, a Democratic strategist with McMahon, Squier & Associates who handled Mr. Dean's presidential campaign.

Engaging Fox News in such an aggressive manner, however, may not be the smartest strategy. If there's a base that needs energizing for these midterm elections, it belongs to the Republicans, and a Clinton-led attack may only revivify them. And so far, there is just one clear beneficiary: Fox News. The news channel has highlighted the contretemps on many of its programs, boosting the ratings in the process.

Democrats do not view Chris Wallace as a partisan gunslinger, as they do some other Fox News personalities. But his questions about whether Mr. Clinton did enough to destroy Al Qaeda ignited simmering Democratic and Clintonian anger.

Democrats had been furious with White House attempts over the last few months to to portray Democrats as weaker on national security than Republicans. And defenders of the Clinton administration were furious about "The Path to 9/11," the ABC docudrama that they claimed depicted the administration in an unfair light. All this fed into last week's reaction, Democratic officials and strategists say. "I think it's important for us to call it what it is," said Karen Finney, communications director for the Democratic National Committee, speaking about the recent incidents. "We can't let conservatives and Republicans get away with painting us in a corner and mischaracterizing who we are and what we stand for."

The incendiary interview appeared on the same day the pessimistic National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq was leaked. And the two events provided an opportune moment to strike, Ms. Finney said.

Soon after the "Fox News Sunday" telecast, Mr. Dean mentioned both items in a combative statement. And the Democratic National Committee followed up Mr. Dean's statement with an e-mail fundraising appeal, complete with a YouTube link to the interview.

"I think you're seeing the beginning of an alternative Democratic approach," a desire to strike back hard, said Mr. Begala, a former Clinton adviser.

"Clinton tapped into something in the Democratic zeitgeist," Mr. Begala said. "We're really tired of being bullied, particularly by Fox."

Democrats have believed, nearly from the moment Fox News began in October of 1996, that the news channel was institutionally biased against them. Fox News officials have disputed such charges, saying the network is merely a corrective to what they contend is a pervasive liberal bias in the news media.

Nonetheless, most Democrats have believed the network could not be ignored. If no one appeared on their shows, who would make the Democratic case? The cable news channel, despite a fall-off in ratings over the past year, still towers over its competitors. And although the viewers who regularly watch Fox News are more likely to be Republican, Democrats and independents still turn up in significant numbers — 20 percent and 17 percent, respectively, compared with 34 percent who are Republicans — according to a recent survey from the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.

Swing voters are important in some states, particularly the Northeast. How they react to the Democrats' more confrontational approach could help determine how far the Democrats get in their efforts to gain control of the House and Senate.

Some Democrats said they believe that a more muscular approach in taking on the Republicans could help them grab onto an issue that has been an Achilles' heel for the Democrats in recent elections: national security.

And that couldn't make some Republicans happier. "I think it puts national security front and center and reminds people that this administration is taking the fight to the terrorists and recognizes the threat America faces," something the Democrats do not, said Danny Diaz, Republican National Committee spokesman.

The Republican National Committee is doing its bit to spread that point of view. After the Clinton interview, it sent talking points to its grassroots membership and to the news media, and ramped up efforts to book people on TV and radio programs to comment on the debate.

DOJ_NMG_0072118

And Fox News executives have not seemed to mind furnishing screen time to Democrats so they can bash the network. (Roger Ailes, the chairman and chief executive of Fox News and Fox Television Stations, was unavailable to comment for this article.)

After all, the ratings don't lie.

The first three days of the week saw primetime and daily increases of 20 percent and 13 percent, respectively, compared with the average over the previous four weeks. And "Fox News Sunday" got its best ratings in three years.

Pastors Guiding Voters To GOP (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

The Christian right seeks out members who might not go to the polls. The focus is issues, but some leaders don't oppose endorsement.

With a pivotal election five weeks away, leaders on the religious right have launched an all-out drive to get Christians from pew to voting booth. Their target: the nearly 30 million Americans who attend church at least once a week but did not vote in 2004.

Their efforts at times push legal limits on church involvement in partisan campaigns. That is by design. With control of Congress at stake Nov. 7, those guiding the movement say they owe it to God and to their own moral principles to do everything they can to keep social conservatives in power.

Preachers "ought to put their toe right on the line," said Mathew D. Staver, founder of Liberty Counsel, a nonprofit law firm that supports conservative Christian causes.

The Rev. Rick Scarborough, a leading evangelical in Texas, has recruited 5,000 "patriot pastors" nationwide to promote an agenda that aligns neatly with Republican platforms. "We urge them to avoid legal entanglement, but there are times in a pastor's life when he needs to take a biblical stand," Scarborough said. "Our higher calling is to Christ."

The campaign encourages individual pastors to use sermons, Bible studies and rallies to drive Christians to the polls — and, by implication or outright endorsement, to Republican candidates. One online guide to discussing the election in church, produced by the Focus on the Family ministry, offers this tip: If a congregant says her top concerns are healthcare and national security, suggest that Jesus would make abortion and gay marriage priorities.

At a recent rally in Pennsylvania, Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson told a crowd of 3,000 that it would be "downright frightening" if Republicans lost control of Congress. If there's a good Christian on the ballot, he said, failing to vote "would be a sin."

The law restricting political activity of churches and charities dates to 1954, when then-Sen. Lyndon B. Johnson pushed it through in a pique of anger over a nonprofit's effort to derail his reelection. Tax-exempt organizations, including churches, may not participate or intervene in political campaigns on behalf of any candidate. Intervention is broadly defined as "any and all activities that favor or oppose one or more candidate for public office," according to the Internal Revenue Service.

That sounds straightforward. In practice, though, there are many ways around the restriction, as the faithful recognize.

"If the pastor is doing the right job, the people will automatically vote for the right person," said Gale Wollenberg, who belongs to a conservative evangelical church in Topeka, Kan.

Perhaps the biggest loophole is that churches can campaign on policy issues — even if that effort benefits a particular candidate. Scarborough, for instance, has spent a great deal of time far from his Texas parish, rallying Christian voters against an initiative promoting embryonic stem-cell research in Missouri. At his events, Scarborough makes a point not to mention Missouri's Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who is in a tight fight for reelection.

But in private, he says candidly that he expects — and hopes — his efforts will give Talent a boost. "If a pro-life candidate benefits from Christians being involved, to God be the glory," Scarborough said.

Pastors can further help their favored candidates by distributing "issue-oriented" voter guides in church, a tactic used for years among secular (often left-leaning) groups such as the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People and adapted to faith communities by the Christian Coalition in the 1990s.

The voter pamphlets are supposed to be neutral, but often present issues through a distinctly partisan lens. A guide distributed by a conservative group in Minnesota in 2004 laid out the candidates' views on aborting "unborn babies." One produced this year by the liberal evangelical group Sojourners describes immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops as the only way to bring peace to Iraq.

Pastors have a right to work directly for candidates on their own time, as long as they don't use church resources. In a recent article aimed at evangelical preachers, Staver wrote that they "should feel free" to go even further and endorse a candidate from the pulpit because he thought the IRS law was unconstitutional. He repeatedly noted that the IRS had rarely sanctioned churches. The Church at Pierce Creek in Binghamton, N.Y., is the only one ever to lose its tax-exempt certification, for sponsoring newspaper ads that opposed presidential candidate Bill Clinton.

Far more often, IRS agents resolve complaints by training church leaders to avoid future missteps, said Lois G. Lerner, who directs the IRS unit for tax-exempt groups. In 2004, the IRS resolved dozens of complaints this way, including such blatant violations as churches donating to a candidate's campaign or placing political signs on their property.

Given the slim chance of serious sanction, "I encourage pastors to exchange their muzzles for megaphones," Staver wrote in the Rev. Jerry Falwell's monthly newspaper, the National Liberty Journal.

Political preaching has been particularly fervent this season in Ohio, where two conservative mega-churches have promoted the Republican candidate for governor, J. Kenneth Blackwell. They've featured him in at least six rallies that blended patriotic appeals with Christian revival.

Yet the latest poll shows Blackwell trailing by 19 points. In part, that's because Ohio voters seem to be in an anti-Republican mood, after scandals involving state GOP politicians. It also shows that a pastor's influence only goes so far.

Many on the Christian right credit their aggressive mobilization, similar to this fall's campaign, with securing President Bush's reelection. And turnout among evangelical voters did jump 9% from 2000 to 2004.

But two religious groups that heavily back Democrats also came out in droves: Turnout was up 15% among Jews and 13% among mainline Protestants who attend liberal churches, according to surveys conducted by John C. Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life. Overall turnout was up 4 points.

"It's really difficult to parse out" the effectiveness of the religious right's mobilization in 2004 "because it was such an intense campaign," Green said. "It does seem to bear fruit, but it varies a great deal from congregation to congregation."

Church-based campaigning may have been most influential in voters' choice of candidate. Bush won 78% of the evangelical vote in 2004, up from 68% in his first presidential bid. And evangelicals were far more likely than any other group of voters to say that religion was the most important factor in their political thinking.

Voter education from the church "can be enormously effective," said Colin Hanna, who directs the Pennsylvania Pastors Network. The group of 850 seeks to mobilize voters against "abortion and other evils," according to its website.

Some of this fall's efforts are aimed at energizing politically active but disillusioned Republicans who might otherwise stay home. But Hanna is particularly eager to reach the 30 million regular churchgoers, and an overlapping group of 19 million evangelicals, who did not vote in 2004. Their indifference to politics is "either a tragedy or a scandal," he said, but he's certain it can be overcome.

Liberals, too, see potential in mingling faith and politics. Black churches have a long history of political activism from the pulpit, dating to the civil rights movement — but their efforts did not boost voter turnout in 2004. This time around, other Christians, including liberal Catholics, are jumping in to try to energize the religious left.

They plan to distribute more than 1 million voter guides urging Christians to evaluate candidates based on issues such as poverty and global warming. A new consulting firm, Common Good Strategies, aims to help Democratic candidates make stronger pitches to communities of faith.

For the most part, however, the left is far behind the right: "They've got organization and discipline that we don't really have yet," said Jack Pannell of Sojourners. "It may take us a generation."

With both the left and the right pursuing faith-based strategies, the IRS issued a warning in February that churches may be in danger of becoming "arms of political campaigns and parties." Agents are looking into about 40 reported violations by churches and other tax-exempt nonprofits. A few are holdovers from 2004, including the high-profile probe into an antiwar sermon at a liberal Pasadena church. But new allegations continue to come in at a brisk clip.

Liberal clergy in Ohio have filed a protest about the pastors' efforts on behalf of Blackwell. On the right, the website http://www.ratoutachurch.org is recruiting volunteers to report partisan activity from the pulpit that favors Democrats.

Melissa Rogers, a visiting professor of religion and public policy at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, N.C., says she expects more complaints as the election approaches. In their zeal to bring politics into the pews, some religious leaders "have made a decision to walk on the razor's edge of the law," she said. "Or over the edge."

The Inside Agitator (NYT)

By Matt Bai

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

Not all states are equal on an election map, and Alaska is one of those less populous states — like Kansas or Idaho or Alabama — that national Democrats almost never bother to visit. For one thing, just getting there presents a logistical ordeal: the journey from Washington takes as long as it would to reach, say, Nigeria, and even then you sometimes need a hydroplane to get around. And more to the point, there aren't a whole lot of people to see once you get there. Registered Republicans outnumber Democrats by a margin of 2 to 1 in oil-crazed Alaska, which hasn't sent a Democrat to the House or Senate in more than 30 years. To put it another way, there were more Democrats in Central Park for the Dave Matthews concert a few years back than there are in the entire state of Alaska — all 656,000 square miles of it.

It seemed somewhat bizarre, then, when Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, chose to make the long odyssey to Alaska at the end of May, near what was the beginning of one of the most intense and closely contested national election campaigns in memory, when every other Democrat in Washington was talking about potentially decisive states like Ohio, Pennsylvania and Connecticut. It was also strange that no one in Democratic Washington seemed to know he was going. Although I had been following Dean closely for months, I found out about the trip accidentally and invited myself along — an intrusion that Dean seemed merely to tolerate. We met up first in Las Vegas, where he was making appearances with

Harry Reid, the Senate minority leader. Dean, who enjoys his image as an unpretentious New Englander, is given to finding his own flights on discount Web sites, so it's sometimes hard for even his own staff to track his itinerary. On the morning we left for Alaska, Dean went missing for a good half-hour. It turned out that he was in the business center of the MGM Grand, where he had been trying to figure out how to print his boarding pass but somehow ended up in an impromptu game of online backgammon with a guy who claimed to be in China.

Touching down in Anchorage, we were greeted by Jonathan Teeters, a 25-year-old former offensive lineman at the University of Idaho who had been hired to help the state party begin to organize Democrats. It took less than 10 minutes, as Teeters drove us through a pounding rainstorm to the state headquarters, for Dean, seated in front, to unleash his usual brand of havoc on a state unaccustomed to it. First, he absently asked Teeters what kind of radio interviews he would be doing during his 24-hour stay and was told that he was booked on the local Air America affiliate, the only liberal radio option in town. This is what party chairmen get paid to do — rally the faithful, collect their money and urge them to vote.

"Bull," Dean snapped, using a slightly more elongated version of the term.

"Huh?" Chris Canning, Dean's personal aide, suddenly looked up from a loose-leaf binder. He seemed to think he had misheard.

"I'm not going to do that," Dean replied firmly, craning his neck to address Canning in the back seat. "I didn't come all the way up here just to talk to people who already agree with us. I want to talk to everyone else. I'm fine with doing Air America, but we have to do something else too. Isn't there some conservative show we can do?" Teeters warned that the few right-wing shows in town could get nasty for the chairman. "If you can set something else up too, great," Dean said with finality. "Otherwise, I won't do Air America."

Then Dean wanted to know how many organizers the state party now had on the ground, and Teeters told him there was just one: Teeters himself. The D.N.C. created his job — along with a position for a communications director — last year as part of Dean's signature program, known as the 50-state strategy. Under this program, the national party is paying for hundreds of new organizers and press aides for the state parties, many of which have been operating on the edge of insolvency. The idea is to hire mostly young, ambitious activists who will go out and build county and precinct organizations to rival Republican machines in every state in the country. "We're going to be in places where the Democratic Party hasn't been in 25 years," Dean likes to say. "If you don't show up in 60 percent of the country, you don't win, and that's not going to happen anymore."

In paying for two new staffers, Dean had, virtually overnight, doubled the size of Alaska's beleaguered state party, which used to consist of only an executive director and a part-time fund-raiser. But now, as Dean considered the vastness of the state's landscape, he decided that one organizer wasn't enough. "In most states, we have three or four," Dean said, thinking out loud. "Seems like you should really have more. We should be able to find that money in the budget."

That night, after meeting with Dean at the sad little storefront office that houses the state party, Alaska's party chairman, Jake Metcalfe, announced to 400 assembled Democrats at a fund-raiser that Dean had just promised to hire an additional organizer for the state. The ballroom erupted in grateful applause as Dean sat there beaming. The members of his staff, gently rolling their eyes, began calling back to Washington, warning the political staff that they would need to find the money for yet another salary in, of all places, Alaska.

In just a few hours, Dean had nicely demonstrated why so many leading Democrats in Washington wish he would spend even more time in Alaska — preferably hiking the tundra for a few months, without a cellphone. It's not that Democrats in Congress don't like the idea of building better organizations in the party's forgotten rural outposts. Everyone in Democratic politics agrees, in principle, that party organizations in states like Alaska could use help from Washington to become competitive again, as opposed to the rusted-out machines they have become. But doing so, at this particular moment and in this particular way, would seem to suck away critical resources at a time when every close House and Senate race has the potential to decide who will control the nation's post-election agenda, and when the party should, theoretically, be focused on mobilizing its base voters — the kind of people who live in big cities and listen religiously to Air America.

It's true that adding a second organizer in Alaska will cost the national party only a modest sum, maybe $35,000 this year, but that same money could pay the salaries for canvassers in Pennsylvania or Connecticut, where a few thousand votes could mean the difference between swearing in Speaker Hastert or Speaker Pelosi next January. Overall, Dean's investment in state parties could cost the D.N.C. as much as $8 million this year, every dime of which could be crucial when you consider that the Republican National Committee says it will pour as much as $60 million into local races to defend its Congressional majorities. (The D.N.C. has pledged to spend $12 million on this fall's races.) With the president's approval ratings stuck around 40 percent, and polls suggesting that the Democrats may have a real chance of rolling back 12 years of Republican rule, numerous Democratic insiders are privately and, at times, publicly deriding the 50-state strategy as an indulgence that could cost them their best and last opportunity to sweep away the Bush era, once and for all.

This conflict between the party's chairman and its elected leaders (who tried mightily to keep local activists from giving him the job in the first place) might be viewed as a petty disagreement. But in fact, it represents the deepening of a rift that has its roots in the 2004 presidential campaign — a rift that raises the fundamental issue of what role, if any, a political party should play in 21st-century American life. Dean ran for president, and then for chairman, as an outsider who would seize power from the party's interest-group-based establishment and return it to the grass roots. And while he has gamely tried to play down his differences with elected Democrats since becoming chairman, it seems increasingly obvious that Dean is pursuing his own agenda for the party — an agenda that picks up, in many ways, where his renegade presidential campaign left off. Now, at power lunches and private meetings, perplexed Washington Democrats, the kind of people who have lorded over the party apparatus for decades, find themselves pondering the same bewildering questions. What on earth can Howard Dean be thinking? Does he really care about winning in November, or is he after something else?

The mere fact that Democrats would consider a "50-state strategy" to be novel — as if a national party might reasonably aspire to something less — says volumes about the rapid deterioration of the party that was, for most of the last century, America's dominant political force. Back when Democrats were the established majority, the state parties were run by bosses who doled out jobs and delivered votes, while the national party, functioning as a subsidiary of whoever happened to occupy the Oval Office, worried about electing presidents. For decades, the party claimed a sizable majority of the nation's governors, senators and congressmen, and in every one of the states where it controlled those seats, there was a centralized organization — a party "infrastructure," in the parlance of today's activists — whose job it was to recruit candidates and make sure voters got to the polls.

All that began to change with the social movements of the 1960's and 70's, which redefined the Democratic Party, in the minds of many rural voters, as mostly a coalition of urban blacks and high-minded intellectuals. From the Deep South up through the populist Plains, voters began abandoning Democratic candidates at the polls, and the old state machines found themselves out of power and starved for patronage. Slowly, the parties in these states atrophied, laying off staff members and allowing their network of local volunteers to dwindle. "We were on the verge of extinction, pretty much," Barry Rubin, the executive director of the Nebraska Democratic Party, told me recently.

When Dean took over the D.N.C. last year, he sent assessment teams, made up of veteran field organizers and former state party officials, to every state. A typical assessment report on one rural state — I was allowed to see the report only on the condition that I not name the state involved — bluntly stated that its local activists were "aging" and that its central committee was "dysfunctional." In most states, there were hardly any county or precinct organizations to speak of. More than half the states lacked any communications staff, meaning that no one was there to counter the Republican talking points that passed from Washington to the state parties to the local media with a kind of automated precision.

For the Democrats, winning presidential elections came to mean doing so without any help from the South or West, and that, in turn, meant cobbling together a relatively small number of so-called battleground states rather than running a truly national campaign. The D.N.C. quit doing much of anything in conservative rural states, and the party's presidential candidates didn't bother stopping by on their way to more promising terrain. Every four years, the national party became obsessed with "targeting" — that is, focusing all its efforts on 15 or 20 winnable urban states and pounding them with expensive TV ads. The D.N.C.'s defining purpose was to raise the money for those ads. The national party became, essentially, a service organization for a few hundred wealthy donors, who treated it like their private political club.

None of this was much on Howard Dean's mind when he set about running for president in 2003 with drab notions of health-care reform and a balanced budget; by the time he made his infamous "scream" speech in Des Moines a year later, however, Dean had become a folk hero for marginalized liberals. How this happened has been largely misunderstood. Dean has been credited with inciting an Internet-driven rebellion against his own party, but, in fact, he was more the accidental vehicle of a movement that was already emerging. The rise of Moveon.org, blogs and "meet-ups" was powered to some extent by the young, tech-savvy activists on both coasts who were so closely associated in the public mind with Dean's campaign. But the fast-growing Internet community was also a phenomenon of liberal enclaves in more conservative states, where disenchanted Democrats, mostly baby boomers, had long felt outnumbered and abandoned. Meet-ups for Dean drew overflow crowds in Austin, Tex., and Birmingham, Ala.; what the Web did was to connect disparate groups of Democratic voters who didn't live in targeted states and who had watched helplessly as Republicans overran their communities. These Democrats opposed the war in Iraq, but they were also against a party that seemed to care more about big donors and swing states than it did about them. Attracted to Dean's fiery defiance of the Washington establishment, these voters adopted him as their cause before he had ever heard of a blog.

"What our campaign was about, not that I set out to make it this way, was empowering people," Dean told me recently. "The 'you have the power' stuff — that just arose spontaneously when I realized what incredible potential there was for people to get active who had given up on the political process because they didn't think either party was helping them."

Over the course of the campaign, Dean turned into an apostle, in politics, of the economic concept of "disintermediation" — the idea that, in the Internet age, voters could connect with candidates, and with one another, without the party acting as the conduit. In a sense, this is what his candidacy was all about. He still believed, though, that only a strong national party could mobilize voters on Election Day. At the Democratic convention in Boston, six months after he dropped out of the presidential race, he met with frustrated delegations from 18 "untargeted" states, meaning that the national party and its candidate, John Kerry, had completely ignored them. Dean was appalled. "The best window we have to talk to Democrats, the time when they pay the most attention, is in the presidential campaign," Dean told me, "and we were just saying to the people of those 18 states, 'We're not interested in you.' You cannot be a national party if you say that to anybody. Anybody."

It didn't take long, after the election, for a new band of Democratic outsiders — some inspired by Dean's campaign, others not — to begin asserting themselves on the local level. In Maryland, Terry Lierman, a venture capitalist who had been one of Dean's campaign-finance chairmen, ran for state party chairman, despite having had no previous involvement in local Democratic politics, and won. In North Carolina, Jerry Meek, a 35-year-old lawyer, took over the state party on a promise of re-energizing county organizations, even though both the governor and the state's leading national figure, John Edwards, strongly backed an inside candidate. Colorado and Arkansas, too, rejected incumbent chairmen in favor of obscure newcomers. In Texas, Fred Baron, a trial lawyer and Democratic contributor, established a privately financed effort to rebuild the Texas state party from the ground up — without the party's consent.

Meanwhile, the bloggers who supported Dean were taking up the same cause, inciting sporadic local rebellions. Chris Bowers, an influential blogger on the leftist site MyDD.com, demanded that the national party focus less on targeting races and more on recruiting candidates to run in every Congressional district in America. Bowers's call for individual activists to overwhelm and rebuild their local parties became a rallying point for the emerging Netroots party-reform movement. Setting his own example, Bowers got himself elected the captain of his local precinct in Philadelphia's 27th Ward and then won a seat on the party's state committee.

The question for Dean was how to harness and aggregate this state-by-state uprising that he had, by example, helped to create. Immediately after dropping out of the presidential race, he formed a political action committee called Democracy for America, whose mission was to raise money for "progressive" candidates seeking local offices, from mayoral and Congressional seats down to the local water board. This was revolt on a small scale, however, and Dean continued to ponder some grander strategy. He admits now that at the time he considered forming a third party, deciding, ultimately, that such ventures never went far in American politics.

Like Ronald Reagan, whose activist insurgency during the 1976 primaries failed to topple the Republican president, Gerald Ford, Dean might have begun work instantly on the next presidential race, building on his support among the Democratic base. But unlike Reagan, Dean had always exhibited more passion for campaigning among the grass roots than he did for the prospect of actually being the nation's president; he seemed less focused on changing the country than he did on changing the party. And the best way to do that, he concluded, was to run for chairman.

Dean, the celebrity candidate in a crowded if rather underwhelming field, campaigned on what seemed like a brazenly political promise to lavish spoils on the forgotten state parties, whose local activists held most of the votes for the chairmanship. The outcome was never much in doubt, although some skeptical Democrats refused to support him. Metcalfe, the Alaska chairman, told me that he supported Simon Rosenberg, a party strategist. "Simon was saying, 'I don't know if I can fund all the states,' and I thought that was honest," Metcalfe said. "Dean said he would give money to all the states, and I thought, That's not going to happen — not out here. I thought I was being realistic. He proved me wrong."

There were awkward moments during Dean's first months in Washington, early in 2005, when he found himself working among the party leaders he had repeatedly maligned. In his first official visit to the newly renovated D.N.C. building, Dean was greeted in the lobby by his predecessor, Terry McAuliffe, a close friend of the Clintons and probably the most gifted fund-raiser in the party's history, whom Dean's supporters had long pilloried as the personification of a party run by hacks and obsessed with corporate money. McAuliffe, a man of maddeningly good cheer, pointed to the new wall-size glass building dedication in the lobby, which featured McAuliffe's name at the very top, followed by a list of contributors. "Now, Howard," he said, "don't you go chiseling that down."

Not long after, Dean sat down with the party's Congressional leaders, Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi, who had tried, ineptly and with almost comical desperation, to find a candidate who could stop him from becoming chairman. Reid and Pelosi promised to work with Dean, but they asked him to resist speaking out on key policy positions and acting as if he were the party's public face. In other words, Dean would be doing everyone in Washington a favor if he would just stay out of sight and raise money.

The latter goal proved challenging. The truth was that neither Dean nor the aides he brought with him from the presidential campaign knew much about the inner workings of the national party, and some of what they assumed they understood, based on contempt for anything they perceived to be the status quo, turned out to be more complicated than it first appeared. Determined to break the grip of millionaires on the party apparatus, Dean's team came into the D.N.C. with a plan to raise huge sums of money online, as Dean had done during the presidential campaign. Dean didn't bother reaching out to many of the party's top contributors, who were as suspicious of him as he was of them. But getting small-dollar donors excited about an established party proved a far more arduous task than getting them excited about an insurgent campaign. The situation grew perilous until, several months into his term, Dean relented and brought in one of McAuliffe's old acolytes, Jody Trapasso, to get the fund-raising operation in order. Trapasso introduced Dean to the big spenders, pushing him to devote a few hours of every day to making calls until the checks started rolling in.

Dean was discovering that he needed to find some Washington insiders to trust, after all — and he found them in what seemed an unlikely quarter. In his primary campaign in 2003, Dean struck up a friendship with Tina Flournoy, a well-respected operative who worked with Al Gore and

Joe Lieberman during the 2000 presidential race and who now held a senior position at the American Federation of Teachers, one of the party's most influential unions. Flournoy was also a charter member of an informal dinner clique whose members referred to themselves, good-naturedly, as the Colored Girls. The core group included several African-American women who had reached the highest echelons of Democratic politics. Donna Brazile, the veteran organizer who managed Gore's presidential campaign, was a regular; so were Minyon Moore, a consultant who worked in the Clinton White House; Yolanda Caraway, a public-relations specialist; and Leah Daughtry, who was McAuliffe's chief of staff (and who was retained in that job by Dean). Guest speakers at their dinners frequently included probable presidential candidates and top members of Congress. During the race for chairman, Flournoy brought Dean in as well, and he quickly clicked with the group.

Dean tapped Flournoy to run his transition team, and although she later returned to her job at the teachers' union, it is now common knowledge among Democrats in Washington that few big decisions are made at the D.N.C. without Flournoy's approval. The Colored Girls, as a whole, are unusually influential with Dean. It's an odd pairing, given that Dean governed one of the whitest states in the country, but what Dean and these women share is resentment, sometimes subtle and sometimes not, of the elite Washington Democrats who have always run the national party. Activists like Flournoy and Brazile have attained star status in the party, but they have never thought of themselves as insiders. This is partly because they are black women in a party dominated by white men — men who often seem to prize them more as symbols of diversity than for their expertise. But it is also because the women came up in Democratic politics as local field operatives — that is, as young organizers who knocked on doors, principally for Jesse Jackson — in an era when all of the power in the party was concentrated in the hands of the Washington consultants who made TV ads and polled the electorate. Dean came to Washington vowing to take power from the insiders and give it, instead, to ground-level activists. "That's our loyalty to Dean," Brazile says. "He gets it."

With help from Flournoy and the others, Dean cultivated an outsiders' culture inside the D.N.C. building. (It is more than symbolic that Dean himself never moved to Washington; he stays at the Capitol Hill Suites a few days a week before heading back to Burlington, Vt.) Dean's political staff hails largely from the state organizations, rather than from Washington; his political director, Pam Womack, formerly ran the Virginia party and the National Governors Association. Top Washington reporters and senior aides on Capitol Hill frequently complain that they now have trouble getting their calls to the D.N.C. returned, while state activists rave about the new responsiveness at headquarters.

Flournoy also introduced Dean to the pollster Cornell Belcher, who became a constant fixture inside Dean's D.N.C. Belcher, a deep thinker and jazz aficionado who wears suit coats with unlaced Converse sneakers, had been an outsider, too, in the sense that he didn't fit into the capital's pinstriped culture and wasn't well known before Dean started taking him to meetings on the Hill. In public appearances, Dean almost always refers proudly to the fact that he has retained a "37-year-old African-American pollster" to shake up the staid Washington crowd. In fact, the main theme of Belcher's work concerns the white middle-class men and women who have deserted the Democrats in recent years. These voters care more about their faith and the character of their communities than they do about individual issues, Belcher says, and Democrats do better with rural and small-town voters when they frame their positions as values rather than as policy prescriptions. This is not an entirely new insight, but to Dean it is critically important. In his mind, it means that any voter in any state can be a Democrat, if only you bother to talk to him, and if only you make the right kind of argument.

The ultimate manifestation of this philosophy, of course, is the 50-state strategy, under which, for the first time, the national party has begun directly financing the staff at all but a few state headquarters. It's probably fair to say that if there hadn't been a quagmire in Iraq or a Hurricane Katrina — if the White House's political fortunes hadn't imploded over the last year — the 50-state strategy would not have aroused much opposition among Washington Democrats. It was only when they realized that they actually had a chance to take back the House, and maybe the Senate too, that Democratic leaders began to ask, with increasing urgency, what it was that Dean was doing with all the party's money.

This fall, the question of who will control Congress is likely to come down to about 40 Congressional districts and some dozen states with close Senate races, including such perennial battlegrounds as Pennsylvania, Ohio and Missouri. Candidates raise most of their campaign funds themselves, but they rely on additional money from Washington to pay for voter-turnout programs and last-minute TV ads. Each party has three separate entities to raise and disburse those dollars: a committee for Senate races, a second committee for House campaigns and the national party headquarters.

For Democrats, the fund-raising environment has improved over the last two years, as Bush has blundered from one legislative or foreign-policy disaster to another and as Democratic donors have seen the prospect of controlling at least one house of Congress — a notion that seemed unthinkable in 2004 — become a possibility. The Democrats who lead their party's Senate and House campaign committees, Senator Chuck Schumer of New York and Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, respectively, have done their parts to make the party competitive. The Democratic Senate committee, which narrowly outperformed its Republican counterpart in 2004, has opened up an even wider margin in this election cycle. The Democratic House committee, which raised only half as much as the G.O.P.'s committee did two years ago, has closed that gap somewhat and, at last count, had virtually the same amount in the bank as its rival. Over at the D.N.C., however, it's a very different story. In 2004, the D.N.C., under McAuliffe, actually raised slightly more money than the Republican National Committee. Since Dean has taken over, however, the R.N.C. has taken an almost 2-to-1 lead in fund-raising, and going into the fall campaign it had more than $39 million stashed away, compared with just over $11 million for the Democrats. For Schumer and Emanuel, this discrepancy between the two parties is like a train coming down the track, and they're the ones sitting in its path. The R.N.C. will dump tens of millions of dollars into individual House and Senate races in the closing weeks, through TV ads and get-out-the-vote operations, and Democrats won't be able to counter it.

In a city rife with unchecked egos, few politicians exhibit the kind of unbridled self-assuredness for which both Emanuel and Schumer are known; to call the two of them pushy would be like calling Tom Cruise excitable. Emanuel, a triathlete who was

Bill Clinton's deputy chief of staff and enforcer, speaks in violent bursts of shrapnel, profanities flying in all directions. Schumer, like his native Brooklyn, can be, by turns, charming or downright dangerous, depending on which route delivers him faster to his destination.

Before this midterm election-year began, but not long after Dean became party head, Emanuel and Schumer decided that if Dean wasn't going to raise anywhere near as much money as his rivals at Republican headquarters, then he ought to at least give them whatever resources he could muster. They went to work on Dean, pleading with him to transfer as much as $10 million to the two committees to help them respond to the Republican TV barrage. Emanuel told anyone who would listen that back in 1994, when Republicans sensed a similarly historic mood swing in the electorate, the R.N.C. kicked in something like $20 million in cash to its Congressional committees. (This argument was impressive, but not exactly true; the R.N.C. spent roughly that much on federal and local races combined in 1994, and little, if any, of that money went directly to the committees themselves.) Dean categorically refused to ante up. Having opposed the very idea of targeting a small number of states and races, he wasn't about to divert money from his long-term strategy — what he calls the "unsexy" work of rebuilding the party's infrastructure — to pay for a bunch of TV ads in Ohio. He wanted to win the 2006 elections as much as anyone, Dean told them, and he intended to help where he could. But Democratic candidates and their campaign committees were doing just fine on fund-raising, and the party couldn't continue giving in to the temptation to spend everything it had on every election cycle — no matter how big a checkbook the Republicans were waving around.

For Schumer, Emanuel and their allies, this rejection was irritating enough. When they heard the stories of how Dean was actually spending the party's cash, however, it was almost more than they could take. Dean was paying for four organizers in Mississippi, where there wasn't a single close House race, but he had sent only three new hires to Pennsylvania, which had a governor's race, a Senate campaign and four competitive House races. Emanuel said he was all for expanding the party's reach into rural states — roughly half the House seats he was targeting were in states like Texas, Indiana and Kentucky, after all — but he wanted the D.N.C. to focus on individual districts that Democrats could actually win, as opposed to just spreading money around aimlessly. The D.N.C. was spending its money not only in Alaska and Hawaii, but in the U.S. Virgin Islands as well.

Democratic insiders began to rail against this wacky and expensive 50-state plan. “He says it’s a long-term strategy,” Paul Begala, the Democratic strategist, said during an appearance on CNN in May. “What he has spent it on, apparently, is just hiring a bunch of staff people to wander around Utah and Mississippi and pick their nose.”

The disagreement with Emanuel and Schumer frayed Dean’s already fragile détente with Washington’s Democratic elite. Since coming to Washington, Dean had worked hard to forge a level of trust with Congressional leaders, subjugating some of his more combative impulses. In particular, he had formed what he thought of as a genuine friendship with Harry Reid. Nonetheless, the party’s elected leaders and their legions of consultants remained uneasy about Dean. They suspected, correctly, that he strongly sympathized with outside forces — militant bloggers, disillusioned donors, Moveon.org — that were fomenting rebellion at the grass roots. It didn’t help that Dean’s younger brother, Jim, a onetime salesman who had taken over the PAC Dean started, Democracy for America, was out there proselytizing for insurgent candidates like Paul Hackett, whom Schumer eventually muscled out of a Senate primary in Ohio, and Ned Lamont, who upended Joe Lieberman in Connecticut. While campaign laws prohibited the Dean brothers from coordinating their activities, Washington Democrats assumed that Jim Dean’s job was to carry out the chairman’s subversive wishes.

In separate conversations, Reid and Pelosi each asked Dean — Reid in his quiet way, Pelosi more stridently — to send some money to the two campaign committees. Dean rebuffed them too. But he did promise that the D.N.C. would help with get-out-the vote campaigns. Emanuel and Schumer then began pressing Dean for a specific field plan — that is, a blueprint for how the D.N.C. would spend money on mobilizing voters, and where. The argument finally exploded during a meeting in May among Dean, Emanuel and Schumer in Dean’s third-floor office at the D.N.C. Emanuel told Dean that the 50-state strategy was a waste of money; Dean shot back that winning elections wasn’t only about TV ads. Emanuel wanted to know what Dean was doing to help in California’s 50th district, where voters were about to hold a special election. When Dean said he had organizers on the ground, Emanuel erupted. <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="41705;159602">“Who?” he demanded. “Tell me their names!” Emanuel, who had a vote at the Capitol, stormed out of the meeting, cursing as he walked down the hall. </object.title>

By now, the situation had as much to do with clashing egos as it did with the elections. “The issue here is not our field plan,” Dean told me. “The issue is an issue of control. I’m the new guy on the block, and they thought they were going to get me writing the check.” For his part, Emanuel, who had been a pivotal adviser in several national elections (he was the model for the character Josh Lyman in “The West Wing”), seemed annoyed that Dean wouldn’t defer to Democrats with more experience. That Dean raised money by talking about the closeness of the 2006 elections — and then spent much of that money in states that had nothing to do with the midterms — made Emanuel, whose office sits a floor below Dean’s in the D.N.C. building, want to reach through the tile ceiling and throttle him. “I’m for a long-term strategy,” Emanuel told me, “but I don’t see how you have a long-term strategy if you take a historic election and walk away from it.”

What was remarkable about this fight, as it dragged on throughout the summer, was just how public it became, and the extent to which it seemed to be pulling influential Democrats into its vortex. Bren Simon, a wealthy Democratic patron from Indiana who has entertained virtually every leading Democrat at her second home in Washington, told me that she warned Emanuel and Schumer that she wouldn’t write them any more checks if they didn’t stop fighting Dean over his 50-state strategy. Then there was the morning early in the summer when Brazile ran into Emanuel on the steps of the D.N.C. building and started loudly lecturing him about his attacks on the chairman, in full view of party employees. Emanuel protested that he just wanted to win back the House. Two of the Democratic Party’s leading strategists — one who had helped run the White House, the other who had managed a presidential campaign — stood there barking at each other on the street.

Underneath this clash of field plans and alpha personalities lay a deeper philosophical divide over how you go about rebuilding a party — which was really a dispute about cause and effect. Did you expand the party by winning elections, or did you win elections by expanding the party? Most party insiders had long put their faith in elections first, arguing that the best way to broaden the base of the party was to win more races. Schumer said as much in a written statement that his spokesman forwarded to me in response to my questions about his differences with Dean. “Our long-term goal is the same — a strong Democratic Party,” Schumer stated. “But we” — meaning he and Emanuel — “believe that nothing does more to further that goal in 2006, 2008 and beyond than taking back the House and Senate so that we can implement a Democratic platform.”

Recent history, though, would seem to undercut this theory. In the 1990’s, the Democrats won two presidential elections behind a popular leader, and yet the party didn’t grow. In fact, Democrats lost ground at every level of government except the White House and cemented their position as the party of coastal states. Steadily investing in political activity on the local level, as Republicans have done for years, seems to Dean and his allies a more realistic way for Democrats to expand the electoral map than simply trying, every four years, to piece together the same elusive majorities. Of course, every Democrat in Washington says he’s for expanding the party’s efforts beyond the familiar 18 or 20 battleground states, but only Dean, among his party’s leaders, has been willing to argue that there is a choice involved, that you cannot actually invest for the long term unless you’re willing to forgo some short-term priorities.

It takes courage, Dean told me, to try something new in the face of failure, which is why Washington Democrats were resisting his plan. "I think politicians are incredibly risk-averse, especially legislating politicians," he said. "This is like deciding to go to a psychiatrist — the risk of staying the same has to be greater than the risk of changing. And right now, in the history of the party, that's exactly where we are. The risk of doing nothing, the same old thing, is enormous. The risk of trying something new is much smaller. The risk of the 50-state strategy is much smaller than if we continue to do what we've been doing."

But you can accept Dean's premise and still wonder whether his 50-state strategy is really the best way to go about building the party. Even some Democrats who support Dean's larger vision have doubts about whether he has built enough accountability into his model for financing state parties. Republicans, as I saw firsthand in Ohio during the 2004 campaign, demand certain metrics of their local organizers. Field workers are expected to sign up so many new voters, or knock on so many doors, by a given date, and people who don't meet their quotas and deadlines can find themselves replaced — even if they're volunteers. Republican staffs in the states are required to take part in an unrelenting succession of conference calls with Washington.

By contrast, Jonathan Teeters, the 25-year-old activist I met in Anchorage, told me that he wished he spoke more often with his superiors at the D.N.C. "It's kind of an as-needed thing," he said. "As far as I can tell, they trust me to get it done. As long as I'm staying in contact, and as long as we're having success, that's how they know we're getting it done." When I asked Teeters how he knew if he was having success, he mentioned having attracted several hundred people to "Democratic reunion" barbecues across the state. "The first thing we have to do is create this energy, so people know we're here and we're active," he said.

Dean has no illusions that the 50-state strategy will succeed in every state. "They're going to make terrible mistakes — I know that," Dean said. "You never make changes without people making mistakes." He said he had visited 46 states as chairman, and each time he goes into a state, he gets some sense of the progress on the ground.

Unlike past chairmen, who mostly traveled to see donors and do some interviews, Dean spends a fair amount of time visiting party offices and mingling with grass-roots activists. His trips to more rural, conservative states, however, the kind of places where a sizable segment of voters go to church and follow Nascar, also raise some complicated issues for his fellow Democrats. Dean is treated like a Beatle by rank-and-file activists who have rarely seen a party leader in their midst, but for the rest of the country, Dean is that lefty who howled on national TV. Some Democratic governors and candidates have avoided Dean when he has been in town, for fear that their opponents would portray them as extremists. Which underscores the peculiar situation of Dean and his 50-state plan: he is the one guy in Washington determined to deliver the Democratic message to every part of the country, but as it turns out, he is also a guy from whom much of America doesn't want to hear it.

It's not that Dean doesn't try his damnedest to make himself palatable to culturally conservative voters. Acting on the advice of Cornell Belcher, his young pollster, he has taken to framing his positions in terms of faith and values, sometimes so transparently that it can make you wince. In Las Vegas, I heard Dean, who is not known to be a religious man, say to a Latino audience, "I don't expect the church to come out for gay marriage, but I do expect that we could say on an issue like this, 'What would Jesus do?' Equal rights under the law is not something that can be abridged by the Democratic Party, because it's really the law under Jesus Christ." The audience stared at him a little blankly, as you might stare at your mechanic if he rolled out from underneath your car and suddenly started speaking Latin.

Fairly or not, Dean has come to embody a species of Democrat that a lot of Americans of both parties find off-putting: the 60's antiwar liberal, reborn with a laptop and a Prius. On the day we landed in Anchorage, Tony Knowles, the former Democratic governor of the state, had just announced that he would run to reclaim the post. This was exciting news for Dean, since he and Knowles had served as governors together, and the two men would be attending the fund-raiser that night. But while we were at the party headquarters, the state party's executive director cautioned Dean, gingerly, that he should probably avoid getting too close to Knowles in public or saying nice things about him from the lectern. "I think he'd prefer to distance himself from the national party as much as he can," the executive director, Mike Coumbe, said.

Later that night, at the fund-raiser, I approached Knowles and asked him if it was true that he felt he needed to put some space between himself and his old friend. "I think they're about to introduce me," Knowles said, glancing helplessly toward the front of the room. "I do want to answer your question." But he was already backing away.

When dean and I last spoke, in August, I wondered aloud if the entire 50-state program wasn't, in a very basic way, inconsistent with the larger philosophy that guided his 2004 campaign. If Dean believed in disintermediation, then why was he spending so much money to strengthen the intermediaries? Weren't the state parties essentially just middlemen between the voters and the Democratic National Committee? What Dean seemed to be creating was a multilevel field organization modeled after the political machines of the 20th century rather than a new party that fostered direct communication between local activists and their leaders in Washington.

"That would be true if we thought we had to be centralized," Dean replied, raising an index finger. In fact, he went on, the Democratic Party needed to be decentralized, so that grass-roots Democrats built relationships with their state parties but had little to do with Washington at all. "State parties are not the intermediaries," he said. "If I get them trained right, they're the principals."

In other words, I suggested, he was talking about "devolving" the national Democratic Party, in the same way that Reagan and other conservative ideologues had always talked about devolving the federal government and returning power to the states. "That's what I want to do," Dean said firmly.

This struck me as a radical idea, and one that went to the heart of what Howard Dean is really thinking. Now that Dean has wrested control of the national party, his real agenda, it seems, is to radically reduce its relevance, in the same way that Grover Norquist and his crowd of conservative activists talk about "starving the beast" of the federal government they now control. Once you understand that, it's easy to understand why Dean isn't troubled by having less cash in the bank than people think he should, and why he isn't concerned about quantifying the success of the state parties he's financing. In Dean's mind, every dollar that goes to Alaska or Mississippi, or even to the Virgin Islands, even if it isn't perfectly utilized, is a dollar that isn't going into the pockets of the Washington syndicate of admen and pollsters who seem to profit more from each election cycle. And that is an end in itself. By shipping the party's money out of Washington as fast as he can collect it, Dean is trying to finish what he started three years ago — namely, the slow dismantling of the Democratic establishment.

This philosophical shift is bound to have consequences for the party's next presidential nominee. Dean argues that the 50-state strategy is actually going to broaden the playing field in 2008. By the time the next nominee is crowned, he says, a field network will already be in place, covering most of the counties and precincts in the United States; flip a switch, and the whole grid will light up with activity, from Baton Rouge to Boise. More than that, rebuilding Democratic ground operations in more states will force Republicans and their nominee to spend millions more dollars in states that the G.O.P. usually takes for granted, dollars that would otherwise be spent in the Midwest or in the pivotal Sun Belt.

This makes some sense, but it's also true that presidential candidates have long relied on the D.N.C. to do two simple things: underwrite TV ads and coordinate extensive field operations in a handful of perennially contested states — so much so, in fact, that every four years the nominee essentially takes over the D.N.C., installing his own strategists and fund-raisers to provide his campaign with air and ground support. If Dean isn't going to relinquish control or shift his resources into battleground states, the next nominee could find himself (or herself) outspent by the R.N.C. — and as piqued at Dean as Emanuel and Schumer are now.

Some more conspiracy-minded Democrats discern in Dean's decentralizing strategy the careful machinations of a shrewd and ambitious politician. After all, if the party's nominee loses in 2008, doesn't that set up Dean, potentially, as the grass-roots choice for 2012? Might this be his real plan — to strengthen the local activists who form his natural base of support while at the same time weakening the Washington apparatus that once tried to derail him?

It's an elegant theory, but it doesn't take into account Dean's basic ambivalence about electoral politics. In Vermont, Dean, a physician and part-time lieutenant governor, turned down the chance to run for governor, taking office only when his predecessor died. He may have run for president, as a former confidant of his once explained it to me, largely because he was looking for something to do. Dean has never evidenced much in the way of Machiavellian ambition. It's easier to imagine him, several years from now, serving as a cabinet secretary, or maybe running a university, than it is to see him rising up to lead a Reagan-like revolt at a raucous nominating convention in Las Vegas or Phoenix.

the more immediate question is whether Dean can make it through this year's elections without becoming a permanent pariah among his party's elected leadership. In September, Dean finally reached a compromise of sorts with Rahm Emanuel. In the end, Dean didn't pull any money from his 50-state strategy, nor did Emanuel successfully pressure him into giving cash directly to the campaign committees. Dean agreed, in principle, to pour about $2.6 million, on top of what he was spending on the 50-state strategy, into field operations in 40 targeted districts. "We have a basic understanding," Emanuel told me, sounding more peeved than conciliatory. "It's not everything I want, but I don't have any time to waste anymore, and I'm not waiting for Godot. I've got to get going." The deal seemed to ensure, at least, that Dean and the House campaign committee would be able to work in harmony through the elections. (Peace talks with Schumer were still going on.) It did not, however, do anything to resolve the underlying, more intractable disagreement: the importance of winning elections versus a longer-term investment in state parties. That argument will continue well after November's referendum on Republican rule.

Nor, clearly, did the compromise do much to endear Dean to his critics in Washington. "I'm not going to be on his holiday mailing list, and he's not going to be on my holiday mailing list," Emanuel snapped at one point during our conversation about Dean. "But this isn't about him or me." If Democrats fall short of retaking the House of Representatives in November, the party's elected leaders will almost certainly blame Dean for the near miss. They will say that he squandered their best chance in more than a decade to control the country. They will say it proves that Dean's risky strategy has badly hurt the party.

And yet, you could make a compelling argument that anything short of total victory in November would prove precisely the opposite. With polls consistently showing voters to be deeply nervous about a protracted war, high gas prices and stunted wages, this is that rare election that should turn less on tactics than on fundamental choices about the direction of the country; in other words, this election season is about the fear and fury of the electorate, not the addition of a few more door-knockers in New Haven or some negative 30-second spot broadcast in Columbus. As the Democratic strategist James Carville told Al Hunt, the Bloomberg News columnist, in August, "If we can't win in this environment, we have to question the whole premise of the party."

Most analysts in both parties now believe that Democrats have better-than-even odds of winning at least the House. But if they don't, rather than dissect the mechanical failures that cost them a few thousand votes here or there, Democrats might be forced to admit, at long last, that there is a structural flaw in their theory of party-building. Even a near miss, at a time of such overwhelming opportunity, would suggest that a national party may not, in fact, be able to win over the long term by fixating on a select group of industrial states while condemning entire regions of the country to what amounts to one-party rule. Which would mean that Howard Dean is right to replant his party's flag in the towns and counties along America's less-traveled highways, even if his plan isn't perfect, and even if he isn't the best messenger to carry it out. As another flawed visionary, the filmmaker Woody Allen, once put it, 80 percent of success is just showing up.

Dean: '08 May Hinge On Race, Immigration (AP-Y)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 1, 2006

Race and immigration could determine the 2008 presidential race, Democratic Party chief Howard Dean told a group of Hispanic leaders Saturday.

Dean said he's trying to encourage the turnout of minority voters who support Democrats, particularly in the Albuquerque, N.M., area, by encouraging their use of mail-in ballots, a tactic he said Republicans have used effectively.

"If that works, we're going to do that in 2008 all over the place, but in the meantime this is a great opportunity for us in 2006," Dean told 225 people attending a luncheon at the party's annual Hispanic leadership summit.

In New Mexico's largely Democratic 1st Congressional District, home to what Dean called a Democratic National Committee pilot project, five-term Republican Rep. Heather Wilson is fighting to get re-elected. Her opponent, Democratic Attorney General Patricia Madrid, grew up in a Hispanic household near the Mexican border.

Democrats hope to turn back the Republican Party's advances among Hispanic voters in recent years. President Bush's efforts to court Hispanic voters have helped double the GOP's share since 2000.

"We can't afford to have 45 percent of Latino population voting for Republican presidents. That diagram has to change," said Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif.

Dean and Solis said issues such as public education, health care, affordable housing, the minimum wage and immigration protection should continue to be party priorities.

DAVENPORT, Iowa (AP) — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, a potential presidential candidate for 2008, called on Democrats to embrace the national security debate in the campaign's closing weeks.

"I am happy to have a national security debate with the Republican Party," Obama said Saturday during his second visit in two weeks to Iowa, which traditionally opens the presidential nominating season. "What we need is a tough and smart national security agenda."

Obama said Democrats must stand up to Republicans' strategy of portraying them as weak on national security. He said Republicans "have a lock on the tough and dumb strategy" that Democrats must expose.

"We can't afford to be bullied because there's too much at stake," Obama said. "The only strategy the other side has is fear. That's what you're seeing and you're going to see more of it."

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., on Saturday launched a new TV ad that compares his nearly 18 years in the Senate with challenger Ned Lamont's relative inexperience.

The 30-second ad features a light bulb and a voice that asks: "Still waiting to hear a new idea out of Ned Lamont? Here's an idea for you."

The bulb lights up and the voice continues, "Experience matters."

In a Quinnipiac University poll released Thursday, voters by a margin of 47 percent to 38 percent said Lamont does not have the "right kind of experience" to serve as a U.S. senator.

DOJ_NMG_0072129

Lieberman, who was defeated by Lamont in the Democratic primary last month and is now running as an independent, has a 10-point advantage among likely voters in the poll. He leads Lamont 49 percent to 39 percent in a three-way race. Republican Alan Schlesinger trails with 5 percent.

Lamont campaign spokeswoman Liz Dupont-Diehl said Lieberman's experience has led to the Bush-Cheney energy bill, increased terrorist activity and the loss of manufacturing jobs.

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney supported plans to reduce illegal immigration from Mexico but said Saturday the U.S. should do more to keep foreign students who come here and earn advanced degrees.

"There's only one condition on getting your Ph.D. here in the U.S. and that is: You leave as soon as you get it," he told New Hampshire Republicans gathered for their annual convention. "Let me tell you, you get a Ph.D. here in one of our great institutions, I want you to stay. ... It makes no sense that we put up a big concrete wall against those who have education and skills but our doors have been wide open to people that have neither."

Romney, a possible 2008 presidential candidate, spoke about a growing gap in technology and education between countries like China and the United States. He described a conversation he'd had with a leader of a Massachusetts high-tech company, who said he expected that in 10 years, 90 percent of his employees will be in Asia.

"I was shocked," said Romney. "China alone graduates seven times the number of engineers that we are."

Outside Groups Spending Millions On Ads (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, Associate Press Writer

AP, October 1, 2006

The images are searing, violent. Smoke and flames pouring from the World Trade Center towers. Bullets ripping through military protective vests.

The scenes are from this year's campaign ad wars, waged outside the control of candidates or political parties.

Heading into the final weeks before the Nov. 7 elections, independent advocacy groups, many financed by a few wealthy donors, are spending millions on ads in some of the most contested states and congressional districts.

Between Jan. 1 and Sept. 26, Republican-leaning groups spent $13.8 million on advertising while advertising on behalf of Democrats totaled $6.3 million, according to the Campaign Media Analysis Group. Throw in the advertising the political parties are paying for, and the Republicans have spent $5 on ads for every $3 spent by Democrats.

That is a significant reversal from 2004, when Democratic groups outnumbered and outspent Republican organizations. Now, some Democratic officials are wondering when their deep-pocketed liberal allies will step in to help.

"If it's there, I haven't seen it," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who heads the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "I can't tell you what happened from '04 to '06 and why some decided either not to participate in this election or not be at the same level."

As election day nears, television viewers have been introduced to Republican-oriented groups with names such a Progress for America, Softer Voices and the Economic Freedom Fund. Their benefactors include Univision founder Andrew Perenchio; conservative philanthropist John M. Templeton Jr. of Bryn Mawr, Pa.; Foster Friess, former manager of the Brandywine mutual funds; and Bob J. Perry, the Texas builder who helped finance the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth that attacked Sen. John Kerry's Vietnam record during the 2004 presidential race.

Progress for America is credited with helping President Bush's re-election with a powerful ad evoking the Sept. 11 attacks. The GOP-leaning group now is running ads in Missouri and Ohio that support the war in Iraq.

The Economic Freedom Fund, bankrolled by Perry, is running ads in congressional districts in Iowa, Indiana, Georgia and West Virginia.

Softer Voices, backed by Friess and Templeton, has spent $850,000 in an ad campaign in Pennsylvania on behalf of Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, who is running behind Democrat Bob Casey.

So far, most of the Democratic advertising help has come from MoveOn.org, a liberal group has been raising smaller contributions as a federally regulated political action committee.

MoveOn spent most of its advertising money in March, targeting congressional districts that were not yet considered vulnerable for Republicans but have since become competitive. Right now, MoveOn is only advertising in two New York congressional districts and one in New Hampshire.

Democrats have gotten help from VoteVets, a PAC formed by military veterans who are critical of the Iraq war. The group is focusing on Santorum and Republican Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Conrad Burns of Montana.

The VoteVets ads accuse the senators of not supporting legislation to get better equipment for U.S. troops. The ads have been small buys, but have benefited from media coverage because they dramatically portray a sharpshooter firing through a protective vest.

A group of Democratic strategists has tried to raise about $20 million for an October advertising blitz. The effort, called the September Fund, is being led by Harold Ickes, a former aide to President Clinton and an adviser to Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y.

In a letter circulated to potential donors this month, the organizers said: "While we have achieved unprecedented unity, it is only meaningful if we can mobilize the power of progressive donors to ensure sufficient financial resources are available."

Among those solicited was billionaire financier George Soros, a donor to liberal causes who contributed more than $20 million to defeat Bush in 2004. Soros has put more than $2 million into this election, much of it toward get out the vote efforts. In an interview this month on CNN, Soros said he did not plan to spend as much as 2004.

"That was an exceptional situation," he said.

Democratic Party officials said outside groups such as the September Fund are organizing too late. "If it was September '05, I'd feel better," Emanuel said.

This year, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has run the biggest ad campaign: $7.3 million on behalf of Republican candidates and $1.2 million on behalf of business friendly Democrats in primary contests. But the chamber had to stop those ads on Sept. 7, to abide by a legal prohibition on the use of union or corporate funds for electioneering ads 60 days before the vote.

Just in September, Progress for America has aired three rounds of ads linking the war in Iraq to the broader effort to combat terrorism. The ads area appearing on national cable networks and were broadcast statewide in Missouri and Ohio.

The first ad showed images of jet planes slicing into the World Trade Center Towers. The narrator warned, "These People Want to Kill Us." A new ad features Iraq war veterans describing the war's successes. None of the ads features politicians nor voices support for or against any elected official.

"A lot of people turn off political ads when they see a candidate," said Stuart Roy, a GOP consultant working with Progress for America. "These ads have a longer lasting effect than those that mention a candidate."

Still, some ads can backfire, and operatives from both parties have mixed views on their effectiveness.

Michael Steele, the Republican candidate for Senate in Maryland, was forced to repudiate a radio ad by an independent group supporting his candidacy that claimed Martin Luther King Jr. was a Republican and that Democrats initiated the Ku Klux Klan. Steele called the ad "insulting to Marylanders."

"Independent expenditures are overrated mostly because you're operating outside the strategic framework of the campaign," said Steve Elmendorf, a former top aide to one-time House Democratic leader Richard Gephardt and deputy campaign manager in Kerry's presidential campaign. "Sometimes they just create clutter."

MoveOn's executive director, Eli Pariser, said this election will be won on the ground, not the airwaves.

"For all the talk about ads," he said, "this is not a persuasion election as much as it is a turnout election."

Of Party Dues And Deadbeats On Capitol Hill (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — To move up the ladder in Congress, you must do more than win votes. You are, quite literally, expected to pay your dues.

If you are a rank-and-file member of the House, the amount is up to $100,000. If your ambitions are to preside over a powerful committee, the duty is $300,000. For a top party leader, the tally can climb beyond $600,000.

Make those checks payable to the Republican or Democratic Congressional campaign committees.

Whether or not they are in competitive races, lawmakers are asked to mount vigorous fund-raising drives to fill their own campaign chests. Then they dole to the party, which spreads the money to the most competitive campaigns in the country.

Four years after Congress tried to reduce the influence of money in politics by rewriting the rules of how campaigns are financed, Republicans and Democrats alike have found myriad replacements for the river of financial contributions known as soft money.

The practice of paying what the parties refer to as dues is not illegal, and it is not an entirely fresh notion by either party. This year, Democrats are hoping to glean about $33 million in dues from their House members, an amount that would be about one-third of their fund-raising goal. That makes the dues an important piece in the Democrats' strategy to overtake the Republican majority.

As members of Congress scurried to finish their business in Washington before heading home for the final stretch of the midterm election campaigns, leaders of both political parties were placing an unusually tight squeeze on colleagues who have not settled their bills.

With five weeks remaining in the race, nearly half of the House Democrats are in arrears. Even a month-by-month installment plan — let alone the prospect that they could regain control of the chamber if they can out-hustle the Republicans — has not provided an incentive for Democrats to pay what they owe.

"Some people make a lot of money for the party, others make a lot of issues," said Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio, who contributed for the first time this week, but still owes $115,000. "I work on the issues side. That's where I excel."

The delinquency statements that Democrats sent via overnight delivery to representatives' homes throughout the year have been supplanted by telephone calls or personal visits from party leaders.

Representative Luis V. Gutierrez, Democrat of Illinois, said he had no intention of paying his dues of $250,000, assessed because of his seniority on the Financial Services Committee. But after a two-minute telephone conversation with the minority leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, he changed course and sent in a check for $15,000.

"It's kind of hard to ignore," Mr. Gutierrez said in an interview, conceding that before Ms. Pelosi rang his cellphone, he had not given a nickel. "I still owe $225,000. Thank God it doesn't affect my credit score when I go get a mortgage."

It could, however, affect what committee assignments are passed out when Congress convenes in January. Several members said they had been told by party leaders that their positions could be on the line if they fail to contribute.

Last weekend, Ms. Pelosi made more than 50 telephone calls to members of her caucus, chiding them to pay their dues. Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois and chairman of the Congressional Campaign Committee, has barred Democrats from using the telephones at party headquarters if they had not paid at least some of what they owed.

"This is not my job," said Mr. Emanuel, recalling the message he repeats again and again to fellow Democrats. "This is our job."

Strong-arm techniques, though, can backfire. So last week, in the final Democratic caucus before the recess, both Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Emanuel softened their language. Still, they distributed a spreadsheet, laying out for everyone to see how much — or how little — members had given to the party.

The grid showed that Representative Maxine Waters, Democrat of California, had contributed $47,500. As a chief deputy whip of the party, she owes a total of $250,000.

Ms. Waters said she did not take kindly to humiliation or intimidation.

"Nobody puts the screws on me. I don't allow that," Ms. Waters said in a brief interview during a long evening of debate on the House floor. "I'm not trying to prove anything to anybody. Some years I've raised a lot, some years I've not raised so much, so I'll do whatever I do."

At the same time, contributions from more than a dozen Democrats have far exceeded their dues. Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York contributed twice as much as his $300,000 assessment and Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania has nearly doubled his $250,000 requirement. Both men have their eye on leadership positions.

"When I see what some of these guys have to do to scratch for money, it's really too bad," Mr. Murtha said. "They can't raise the money, so we help them out."

At least once a quarter, Democrats receive a fund-raising report card. To increase the motivation — or, perhaps, to embarrass them in front of their peers — the statement also points out how much money is available in individual campaign bank accounts.

The most recent document, for example, pointed out that Representative Robert E. Andrews, Democrat of New Jersey, had a balance of $2,054,562 but had paid only $40,000 of a $125,000 bill.

"I've held on to my money because New Jersey politics can be volatile," said Mr. Andrews, who has told some Democrats that he had been keeping a close watch on his state's Senate race if Senator Robert Menendez stumbles. "But there's no doubt I'll be contributing the full amount."

For Republicans, each member of the House is expected to make a contribution to the Battleground Program. The amounts range from $70,000 to $600,000, depending on the member's position. Since July, when the program began, party leaders said, about 90 percent of the members have contributed to the program, which they hope will raise $22.5 million.

There is no public disapproval for those who do not participate. Arm-twisting is conducted privately, which is why Republican officials said at least five members were summoned this week for a meeting with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois; the majority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio; and the majority whip, Roy Blunt of Missouri.

"Oftentimes Wall Street gauges a business's future success by the number of employees investing in their company," said Representative Eric Cantor, Republican of Virginia, who heads the House program. "I view Battleground the same way."

In the Senate, neither the Republicans nor the Democrats employ a rigorous system of dues and contributions.

Many senators raise more money for their respective party committees than their colleagues in the House, but committee assignments in the Senate depend on a tradition of seniority.

DOJ_NMG_0072132

Still, in the House, where financial contributions and other demonstrations of party loyalty can trump seniority, not all longtime Democratic members believe this year's strong push to collect dues will ultimately raise, or lower, a member's prospects of winning an influential committee seat.

"No Democrat really believes that if you're going to be the chairman and you don't give the money that you're going to lose your seat," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts. "If you're a Republican, you do."

Showing some admiration for Republicans' efficiency, Mr. Frank said: "They threaten. We shame."

Mr. Frank has surpassed his dues of $300,000. His current tally? $310,700. And if Democrats win in November, he is poised to become chairman of the Financial Services Committee.

Democrats Less Sure About Recapturing House (WT)

By Donald Lambro, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

Some Democratic election strategists are less confident than they were a month ago about recapturing the House in November as a result of tighter party-preference polls that show Republicans rallying behind their embattled party.

"I'm not as confident of the House switching as I once was," a Democratic campaign consultant said last week.

But other Democratic congressional campaign advisers point to about two dozen congressional races where Republican incumbents are facing aggressive challenges that they say could return Democrats to power if there is a voter-turnout surge in November demanding change.

And the resignation Friday of Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, gave Democrats another opportunity to pick up an open seat.

Mr. Foley, who stepped down after press reports that he sent sexually explicit e-mails to an underage former male page, had been considered a shoo-in to win a seventh term in the heavily Republican 16th District. His Democratic challenger, Tim Mahoney, a businessman, has been aggressively campaigning for more than a year, and Republican officials acknowledged it would be difficult for a new candidate to become well-known in the five weeks before Election Day.

Democrats need to win 15 additional seats to take control of the House, and in a tight election, Mr. Foley's seat could put them over the top.

But recent surveys by Gallup and other pollsters have shown Republicans closing the Democrats' yearlong advantage as President Bush and his party sharpen their campaign messages on terrorism, Iraq and the economy and as voters begin focusing more closely on the elections.

"I think in a lot of places where there really isn't a competitive race at hand, Republicans are finding their way back into the electorate and are voting for their own," said Alan Secrest, a veteran campaign consultant and pollster who is advising Democratic House candidates across the country.

"But in the hot races, the competitive races where we're working, they remain as competitive as they were. So I believe the Gallup numbers showing a tightening in the generic polls can be true, even as the truly competitive races remain so," he said.

However, another Democratic campaign adviser, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the Republicans' stronger poll numbers in the part- preference surveys could make the Democrats' efforts to win back the House "a steeper climb."

"I expect things to tighten up," the campaign adviser said.

These concerns were confirmed last week by a top election forecaster who closely monitors the House's most competitive races.

"There has been a slight uptick in national GOP numbers, and that could help in a number of tight races, particularly in Republican-leaning districts that have been regarded as in play," campaign analyst Stuart Rothenberg told his newsletter subscribers.

Mr. Rothenberg said he thinks that "Democrats are now poised to net 15-20 seats, which would narrowly return the House to their control." But, he added, "they don't have much of a margin for error."

Mr. Secrest doesn't see the Democratic erosion that Gallup found last month in its national poll of likely voters ,which showed the party preference vote in a "dead heat."

"In the competitive races we are working in, the Democratic opportunity [to take back the House] is undiminished," he said.

Ace Of Base (NYT)

By Mark Halperin

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072133

BILL and Hillary Clinton have been known to cite a quip widely attributed to Einstein: "The definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting a different result." George W. Bush and Karl Rove live by an alternative dictum: Why do things differently when you like the results you have been getting?

In the 2002 and 2004 national elections, the president and his top political adviser won by margins provided by conservative voters who shared the White House's view that the country should continue to move right. Although the president is not on the ballot in November, the Bush-Rove model animates the Republican Party's election strategy for 2006.

Yet two years of controversy over the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina, and the perils of high gas prices and low poll numbers, have led many to believe that the Republicans' strategy of fighting from the base has worn out its welcome. Therefore, this view holds, a campaign that appeals to moderates, one waged from the center, is the only way for the party to maintain control of the House and Senate.

Interesting theory, but it probably won't work. If the Republicans want to keep their majorities in the midterm elections, their best chance is to stick with the old, base-driven Bush-Rove electoral strategy.

Why? In the eyes of the Bush team, America is a polarized country, one where there are fundamental divisions worth fighting over. A president — and a party — should not worry about slender margins of victory or legislative control. The goal is to accumulate just enough power to use the energies and passions of the base to effect ideological change in the nation's laws and institutions, even if — sometimes especially if — those changes might be at odds with majority public opinion.

For the Republicans, this brand of politics works because the United States in many ways remains a fundamentally conservative nation. Polls consistently indicate that there are more staunchly conservative Americans than liberal ones. Republican politicians, therefore, have the advantage of being able to proudly announce what they really think. They can go on offense.

The party is helped, of course, by superior financial resources. And the Republicans have mastered micro-aiming rousing messages to ideologically sympathetic voters. These messages, generally on hot button issues like gay marriage and abortion, stir the kind of emotion and anger that provide the energy in Bush-Rove politics.

It's important to note, though, that this strategy depends on something else: the inability of Democrats to play by the same rules, to go on offense.

If Democrats in Congress took a secret ballot, it is safe to say there would be overwhelming support for a variety of positions that, in theory, could rally the party's base: a timely withdrawal of American troops from Iraq; a tax increase for the wealthy; universal health care; and increased rights for homosexuals. These are all positions in line with the activist wing of their party. And yet most Democrats will not openly espouse such policies, concerned that backing them could hurt their chances in 2006.

If they actually articulated what was in their hearts, Democrats worry that they would be marching into a buzz saw of negative political commercials and White House-led attacks. Democrats rightly believe that such attacks would energize the conservative base and also eat into their support among centrist voters. But their chosen alternative — in which they swallow their true beliefs on important national issues — demoralizes their own base.

If you have any doubts about the confusion of the Democrats, just look at the party's midterm strategy. On the one hand, Democrats are reluctant to push for liberal policies that would motivate their base. But the core of their enunciated message — both vowing to stop the president's right-wing policies and blurring their differences with Republicans on highly charged issues — has in recent elections been a recipe for defeat. Such equivocation is the kind of themeless pudding that does not match up well with the conviction of the White House message and is uninspiring to both the Democrats' base and the center.

For months, the president was in severe political peril, with approval ratings regularly hovering around 30 percent, in large measure because he was missing the support of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents that is essential to his majority. Despite conservative disaffection with the White House over the past year on issues like spending (and even, in some cases, on Iraq), the latest polls show the G.O.P. base is coming home — and just in time. Base support is headed toward 90 percent, just about where it was before the 2002 and 2004 elections.

The speeches the president gave about national security leading up to the fifth anniversary of 9/11 re-engaged the base and raised his overall approval rating to around 40 percent. He also has shifted the debate back to his favored playing field: national security.

Although some Democrats are energized by the aggressive posture struck last week by Bill and Hillary Clinton on national security, the couple's visibility seems to be energizing the Republican base as well, perhaps more so.

As in 2002 and 2004, the Democrats have been baited into a heated discussion on terrorism and Iraq, blocking out debates that would be more favorable to their cause, like Social Security, the economy and gas prices. The Clintons have whipped up Democrats into a frenzy to fight back, but on Capitol Hill and on television they are largely fighting back on Republican terrain.

This is exactly what happened in the last two elections: Mr. Bush and Mr. Rove fired up the base on national security, taxes and social issues and found a way to win a majority of the electorate, even as they lost the allegiance of a majority of the country over all. The national security debate, the visibility of the Clintons and the momentum the Republicans gain from Mr. Bush's rising poll numbers — all of these echo previous election cycles.

Critics of the Bush administration assert that the politics of the base has run its course, and that the Iraq war, the partisan zealousness and the conservative social policies of the administration have made voters yearn for a more centrist, bipartisan government. But Mr. Bush's opponents may be imprudently lulled by the current storyline and broad national polls, both of which miss the power and consequence of a Republican base that may have one more victory to give.

Parties For Pay Fill D.C. Calendar (KCS)

By Matt Stearns

The Kansas City Star, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON | Lonely lobbyist: The oxymoron of the season.

Every day, faxes and e-mail pour across lobbyists' desks, requesting the pleasure of their company — and that of their checkbooks — at dozens of campaign fundraisers.

Breakfast invitations. Lunches. Cocktails. Dinners. Even hunting and golfing trips.

The Kansas City Star asked one lobbyist for a Fortune 500 company to save a week's worth of fundraiser invitations in the final days of the current congressional session in the heated run-up to the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

How many invitations did he get? About 200. How many of the events did he attend? Eleven.

Did he feel like an ATM sometimes? You bet.

The lobbyist was offered the chance to nibble sushi and stone crabs with Rep. Connie Mack, a Florida Republican. Join the Mooseburger Oktoberfest with Rep. Don Young, an Alaska Democrat. Listen to bagpipes at Scotch Tasting Reception (kilt optional) hosted by Rep. John Campbell, a California Republican. And "dove shoot, sporting clays, bow and rifle deer hunting, fishing, horseback riding and golf" over a weekend on a 6,000-acre South Carolina plantation, courtesy of Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham.

That the party-and-pay carousel continues unabated shows that the lobbying scandal that rocked Washington earlier this year has changed nothing, said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group.

And because lawmakers require ever greater piles of money to finance their campaigns — PAC cash given to congressional candidates this election cycle totaled about a quarter-billion dollars by July — they don't have much interest in real reform, she said.

"What has driven me nuts about lobbying reform is all the onus has been put on lobbyists, as if members of Congress are these babes in the woods," Sloan said. "That is so not the case."

Fundraising invitations often list members' committee assignments right under their names, Sloan said.

"It's intended to say, 'Do you have any clients with interests in front of me?' "

Attendees come with checks because they support a member of Congress' work and agenda, said Chuck Knapp, a spokesman for U.S. Rep. Todd Tiahrt, a Kansas Republican.

In September, the congressman was host of the second Todd Tiahrt European Driven Pheasant Hunt at the Flint Oak Hunting Resort near Fall River. The event was a benefit for Tiahrt's leadership PAC.

Cost: $2,500 per attendee.

Leadership PACs help a member gain influence within the caucus," Knapp said. "That's beneficial to the congressman in his work representing the district."

Graham's hunting, fishing and golfing extravaganza, to benefit his political action committee, was even pricier: $5,000. It was limited to 25 participants.

To Mary Boyle, a spokeswoman for Common Cause, a nonpartisan government watchdog group, such weekend trips are particularly troubling.

"They're meant to be sold as this opportunity to get real snuggly-close with a member of Congress," Boyle said. "That's what lobbyists are buying: access and influence."

The more typical events in Washington, where animals are not ducking for cover, cost a lobbyist at least $500, or $1,000 from his employer's PAC.

At least no lobbyist will go hungry.

DOJ_NMG_0072135

On one typical September weekday, there were seven fundraising breakfasts and two lunches held at restaurants, Capitol Hill town houses owned by members of Congress or big companies and clubs associated with the Democratic and Republican parties.

The evening hours offered more than a dozen receptions and dinners around Capitol Hill and downtown Washington. Among them: the second fundraiser of the day for Sen. Jim Talent, a Missouri Republican.

Tiahrt also had his annual Fall Steak Out, that day, and U.S. Rep. Kenny Hulshof, a Missouri Republican, offered an "intimate dinner" at Bobby Van's Grill.

Perhaps most intriguing of all: "Pirates of Key West Night" at the Capitol Hill home of Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a Florida Republican.

As Common Cause might say: Arrghh!

Presidential Hopefuls Boost Florida Candidates, Look To Help Themselves (FLSUNSEN)

By Anthony Man, Political Writer

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 1, 2006

Presidential candidates are flocking to Florida, hoping to boost their parties' candidates for governor and Congress -- and their own dreams of reaching the White House.

Two of the most prominent prospects, Democrat John Kerry and Republican Rudolph Giuliani, just completed South Florida swings. Even though the 2008 election is more than two years away, Broward and Palm Beach counties will be filled with presidential candidates in the five weeks between now and Election Day.

"We're going to be seeing more of them. We've gotten a lot of calls and e-mails from their staffs," said Shane Strum, Broward Republican chairman. "They're going to crop up real quick."

The interaction between national and state candidates is the ultimate symbiotic relationship, like the tickbird feasting on insects from the back of cattle. While the presidential candidates garner publicity and build networks of supporters for their own campaigns, the gubernatorial and congressional candidates also enjoy the publicity and use the visitors to help attract donors to fundraising events.

Kerry, the Massachusetts senator who lost the 2004 presidential election, stopped in five cities Saturday for four candidate fundraisers and two news conferences. Most of his events weren't big, public gatherings.

It was different with Giuliani, the former New York mayor who was propelled to superstar status for his leadership after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. He has the ability to attract far more television cameras than even a candidate for governor might get on his own.

Outside a fire station in Dania Beach on Wednesday, Giuliani was the big draw for a rally at which he endorsed fellow Republican Charlie Crist's campaign for governor. As the event wound up, retired Miami-Dade firefighter George Carbonell of Miramar yelled out his political hope: "Giuliani for president."

Carbonell, a registered Democrat, said his cry of support wasn't premeditated or planted by political operatives. Giuliani demurred, saying later he wouldn't make any decisions until after the November elections.

Kerry said Saturday that he would make a decision in late 2006 or early 2007.

He said his mission Saturday was to help elect Democrats, but said he hopes there is some political benefit. "Of course you hope that it's positive, but I can't predict. I can't tell you what's going to happen," he said.

Average voters like Carbonell aren't the motivation for visits by prospective presidential candidates.

More important is winning the support of people such as Mitchell Berger and William Scherer, both Fort Lauderdale lawyers.

Berger is a prominent national political fundraiser and finance chairman for Democratic gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis. Scherer is a prominent Republican fundraiser, reaching pioneer status for raising at least $100,000 for George W. Bush's 2000 campaign. In 2004 Scherer was a Bush ranger, raising at least $200,000.

Scherer, who said he won't pick a presidential candidate until after the gubernatorial election, is raising money for Crist this fall. The presidential candidate visits provide opportunities for people like Scherer and Berger to see the prospects up close, helping them evaluate whom they want to work for.

Bryan Miller, a lawyer who works in Fort Lauderdale and West Palm Beach, leads the Democratic Professionals Council, a regional group of moderate and business-oriented Democrats.

Miller said the presidential hopefuls are working with gubernatorial and congressional candidates and appearing before his group because Broward and Palm Beach counties are full of wealthy donors who can help fund their campaigns.

"They're down here to build fundraising bases," Miller said.

Miller and Mitch Ceasar, the Broward Democratic chairman, said Florida's role in determining the presidency is another factor.

"Of all the big states in the country, there's only one swing state," Miller said. "Just do the math and Florida is the juggernaut in any presidential election."

California and New York are solidly Democratic and Texas is solidly Republican. Neither Republican red nor Democratic blue, Florida can go either way, and the state's 27 electoral votes are a tenth of what's needed to win the presidency.

"Florida is the only swing mega-state in the country," Ceasar added.

Another reason national figures in both parties want to help elect a governor is the value of the governorship in the presidential contest in two years, Berger said.

Berger said Bill Clinton almost won Florida in 1992, despite devoting little effort or money on the state, because Democrat Lawton Chiles was governor. In 2000 and 2004, President Bush benefited from his brother, Gov. Jeb Bush.

"Florida is a pivotal state," Scherer said. "Having the governor and the Legislature would make it far more friendly for a Republican candidate for president than it would be the other way around."

Democrats see it the same way. "The national party thinks that having a Florida governor is worth about five points in a presidential race," Miller said.

It's part of the way candidates build their networks of supporters.

"As long as it stays a purple state, that's a place the presidential candidates have to come," Miller said. "We're talking about a very crowded presidential field in 2008, and that makes it all the more important to be out early."

Romney Directs GOP Cash To Campaign States (BOS)

By Rick Klein, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As chairman of the Republican Governors Association, Mitt Romney has directed the organization's largest contributions to candidates in three states that are key to any presidential run, enhancing his exposure in politically important precincts as he prepares for a 2008 run for president.

The heavy investment in those three states -- Florida, Michigan, and Iowa -- underscores the extent to which Romney is using the governors ' association to build his presidential résumé. Romney is traveling the nation under the auspices of the association and getting to know the deep-pocketed donors who play crucial roles in presidential candidacies.

Romney, as chairman, plays the primary role in recommending which races receive funding, though all decisions are approved by an executive committee of the governors' association.

Florida, Michigan, and Iowa each have competitive governors' races, and Romney said in an interview that each funding decision was based on the merits.

Still, in a year in which even Romney concedes that Republicans are highly likely to suffer significant losses in governor's races nationally, some of the choices of where to send the association's money have raised eyebrows in political circles.

Two weeks ago, Romney traveled to Florida to deliver a $1 million check to Republican gubernatorial nominee Charlie Crist, even though polls have shown Crist holding a steady lead.

Even without the governors' association's contribution, Crist had nearly tripled the fund-raising kitty of his opponent, Democrat Jim Davis, suggesting the association's money might be better spent in other contests.

Also getting $1 million is Dick DeVos, who is running for governor in Michigan, a closely divided state that holds early presidential primaries -- and where Romney's father served as governor.

Though DeVos's race against Democratic Governor Jennifer Granholm is tight, DeVos is hardly strapped for cash, since he has already pumped more than $16 million of his Amway fortune into the race.

``We laughed at the Michigan money," said Jennifer Duffy, who tracks governors' races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. ``It's like Romney's third home state, after Utah and Massachusetts."

Romney is directing about $750,000 to Iowa, where Representative Jim Nussle, the chairman of the House budget committee, is locked in a campaign that's widely considered a toss-up.

While the tightness of the election makes the state a good target for governors' association money, the donation is noteworthy for its size, given that Iowa is a sparsely populated state with low advertising costs.

Romney has paid frequent visits to Iowa, which has the first presidential nominating contest in the nation, including a series of stops last week.

DOJ_NMG_0072137

``If Nussle wins, it gives [Romney] a friend in the governor's seat here, which can be useful as you look forward to the caucuses," said Peverill Squire , a political science professor at the University of Iowa. ``Even more important than that, it gives him a presence here, and elevates his profile among party activists. That's how you put together a campaign organization."

Romney said each contribution represents a strategic decision based on the 2006 races, not his own ambitions. Some states, including Michigan and Florida, were given more money in part to reward major donors in those states, Romney said. Iowa, he added, represents perhaps the GOP's best chance for replacing a Democratic governor with a Republican.

``States that have provided a lot of money to the RGA have generally gotten more money back," Romney said. ``I'm sure when this is over, people will say, `Why did you send it there?' But we're sending money where we think it can best be spent."

Though the association declined to release its full spending figures, Romney himself has identified Florida, Michigan, and Iowa as the top three recipients so far. As a 527 organization, the RGA is required to file quarterly reports with the IRS, and third-quarter fund-raising and spending won't be released until mid-October.

RGA officials said the association also has spent heavily in states that don't figure as prominently in presidential campaigns. Romney said the group is making sizable investments in Wisconsin, Oregon, Colorado, and Maryland, among others.

By the end of the election cycle, Romney said, between 10 and 12 states will have received cash infusions of roughly similar amounts, though he declined to name the states or the amounts so as not to reveal strategy. He said he hopes those states include Massachusetts, where his lieutenant governor, Kerry Healey, is running to succeed him, but he has recused himself from decisions involving his home state.

At the same time, the governors' association has essentially written off governors' seats in New York and Ohio, and given little attention to Illinois. The association has passed up the chance to make big donations to Republican efforts to unseat Democratic incumbents in states that are historically friendly to the GOP. These include Kansas, Oklahoma, Wyoming, Tennessee, and Arizona.

The organization has given virtually nothing to Republican candidates in New Hampshire and South Carolina, two of the most important states in the presidential calendar, but where incumbents have big leads. Republican Governor Mark Sanford of South Carolina appears safe, as does Democratic Governor John Lynch of New Hampshire.

Despite Romney's efforts, polls and analysts say Republicans are likely to have a net loss of between four and eight governorships this year. If they lose four or more, they'll lose their majority status among governorships for the first time since 1994.

``The math would suggest we lose quite a few governorships," Romney said. ``We hope to do better than that, obviously."

By contrast, Romney's counterpart at the Democratic Governors Association, Bill Richardson of New Mexico, is predicting a banner year for Democrats in the 36 governor's races that will be decided Nov. 7. Richardson, like Romney, hopes to use the platform of the governors' association to boost his 2008 presidential prospects

Citing the most recent public polls, Richardson said Democrats are in a position to turn a 22-28 deficit in governorships into at least a 28-22 advantage. Richardson said Democratic pickups are likely in Massachusetts, New York, Maryland, Ohio, Arkansas, and Colorado. He said Democrats also stand good chances to take over from Republicans in Nevada, Alaska, Minnesota, and others.

``Two-thirds of the country is at stake, and we will get to a majority of governorships," Richardson said.

The factors driving the major trends in the governors' races are beyond Romney's control. Low approval ratings for President Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress are harming Republicans up and down the ballot. Romney has also been hampered by a rash of retirements among Republican governors -- including his own.

It all suggests an inauspicious debut on the national stage for Romney, who has become an increasingly public face on behalf of GOP gubernatorial candidates this year. But analysts say the losses are unlikely to significantly harm his presidential chances.

The most important task of a governor s' association chairman is raising money, and Romney has maintained Republicans' historic cash advantage in governors' races, with the RGA raising $25.9 million -- a record for a nonpresidential year -- compared with the DGA's $17.9 million.

Because of his success bringing in money, Romney is unlikely to face recriminations for his leadership, even if the election turns out to be a bloodbath for Republicans, said Jeffrey Berry , a political science professor at Tufts University.

``Elephants have short memories, I suppose," he said.

Since taking over last November, Romney has retooled the RGA to eliminate its policy functions, allowing him to focus exclusively on fund-raising.

Even if Republicans falter on Election Day, Romney will end up glad he took on the RGA job, predicted Mickey Edwards, a former Republican representative who now teaches at Princeton University.

DOJ_NMG_0072138

The travel has given Romney national exposure, and kept him in close contact with the moneymen and GOP powerbrokers who are crucial to the presidential nominating process, he said.

``It's been a big plus for him," Edwards said.

Romney Says He Must Obey Law On Marriage For Out-of-state Gay Couples (BOS)

By Michael Levenson, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. -- Governor Mitt Romney all but admitted defeat yesterday in his effort to appeal a Suffolk Superior Court ruling that allows gay couples from Rhode Island to get married in Massachusetts.

``I have to follow the law," a resigned Romney said in an interview at the Republican State Convention in Concord, N.H., where he delivered the keynote address. ``This is a nation of laws, even if I don't like them."

The governor's concession was made a day after Attorney General Thomas F. Reilly said he would not appeal the decision, despite a letter Romney had sent urging him to do so. The decision disappointed Romney as he looks to solidify his conservative credentials for a potential 2008 presidential run.

For the first time, the ruling makes it possible for gay couples from outside Massachusetts to come to the state and be granted marriage licenses. Issued Friday by Judge Thomas E. Connolly , the decision said Romney and Reilly cannot use a 1913 law to block Rhode Island couples from marrying in Massachusetts because Rhode Island's laws do not explicitly ban gay marriage.

Romney, who has said he does not want Massachusetts to become ``the Las Vegas of gay marriage," said the only option left is for Congress to approve a Constitutional amendment to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman. The amendment would then need the approval of three-fourths of the states.

President Bush has also called for such an amendment, but Congress has not approved it. Romney yesterday reiterated his call for a similar amendment to the Massachusetts Constitution, which he hopes to place on the ballot in November 2008.

``Let the citizens decide," Romney said. ``And I'm confident that if the citizens decide it in the privacy of a voting booth, they'll protect traditional marriage."

At the convention, held at the Capital Center for the Arts, several hundred Republicans enthusiastically applauded Romney, who delivered a speech in which he spoke about his experience managing the 2002 Winter Olympics, urged the nation to produce more scientists to compete with Asian nations, and expressed support for the ``sanctity of marriage and the foundational nature of the family."

``You and I agree on something about that, and that is my Supreme Judicial Court made a monumental error in saying that our Constitution in Massachusetts requires people of the same gender to marry," Romney said as Republicans cheered. ``I disagree with them on that. I think John Adams would disagree with them on that, as well."

Marriage, he said, is not a relationship ``just about adults."

``Marriage is primarily about the development and nurturing of children, and every child deserves a mother and a father," Romney said to more cheers and applause.

Romney has been trying to lock up support in New Hampshire, where the early primary makes it an important state in presidential elections. Last week, the Commonwealth PAC, a political committee Romney is using to help lay the groundwork for a possible presidential run, signed up Tom Rath , a former New Hampshire attorney general, as its senior adviser. The committee has also doled out more than $100,000 to the New Hampshire GOP.

Wayne Semprini , the party's chairman, told delegates yesterday that Romney gave $60,000 to the state party this summer, when money was so tight ``the lights were flickering" at party headquarters. He also reminded delegates that Romney owns a home in New Hampshire, on the shores of Lake Winnipesaukee.

``We do love the state, as you all know," Romney's wife, Ann , said in brief remarks to the convention.

Delegates said yesterday that they were impressed with Romney.

``I think his message was excellent," said Norm Olsen , 54, of Portsmouth . ``He has some real experience in solving big problems."

Democrats Work The Factory Floor (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

Hillary Clinton is the front-runner for the next Democratic presidential nomination, but suddenly this is John Edwards's party. If you look across the states where the party is being defined in 2006, you find candidates who sound a lot more like him than her.

DOJ_NMG_0072139

Democrats are running strong Senate campaigns in the upper South (James Webb in Virginia, Harold Ford in Tennessee), in the big job-loss states (Bob Casey in Pennsylvania, Sherrod Brown in Ohio, Claire McCaskill in Missouri) and even in a few places out West (Jon Tester in Montana). And in each case, the candidates are running as factory-floor populists who would throw up if they had to sit through a Renaissance Weekend.

Senator Clinton is a well-educated professional who was influenced by the values politics of the 1960's and 70's. But most of today's strong Democratic candidates are traditionalist manly men who give the impression that if they had been involved in the Chicago riots, they would have been on the side of the cops, not the hippies. The Claritas research firm segments the country into different psychodemographic clusters. Today's most prominent Democratic candidates are more Mines and Mills than Towns and Gowns.

The Democrats were once a free trade party. But Sherrod Brown wrote a book called "Myths of Free Trade: Why American Trade Policy Has Failed" and most of this year's strong Democratic candidates rail — like John Edwards — against outsourcing and trade agreements. Their core issue is the economic resentment of the struggling middle class. Brown recently explained the political strategy to a gathering of liberal journalists: "I know that trade issues work with white male, nonunion, culturally conservative voters because they know how anxious trade issues have made them and their families."

Many of this year's prominent candidates are also surprisingly nationalist on immigration, playing off concerns about declining wages. "I do believe we must gain control of our borders," Webb said during a debate. "We also must gain control over corporate America's use of illegals. This, along with the Iraq war, has been the major failure of this administration."

On social issues, most of them are not exactly singing from the hymnal of the highly educated coastal elites. "I believe marriage should only be between men and women," Ford declares on the stump. "I don't know any better; that's how I was brought up. We didn't have any choice. Where I grew up, when you awakened on Sunday, you went to church. ... I learned the faith thing the old-fashioned way."

On Iraq, most are leaning toward the Edwards position. Unlike Senator Clinton, Edwards has disavowed his earlier support for the war. He calls for an immediate withdrawal of 40,000 troops and complete withdrawal within a year or so. But several candidates are careful to show they are not in the pocket of the A.C.L.U. Both Sherrod Brown and Harold Ford voted with President Bush on the military tribunal bill.

In sum, their message is a long way from the globalized Third Way politics Bill Clinton and Tony Blair exemplified in the 1990's. It's also a long way from the secular, multicultural liberalism that has alienated religious voters in droves.

Will it work politically? There's some evidence that it can. Michael Barone of U.S. News & World Report has noticed that so far Democrats are doing surprisingly well in rural America, where this economically progressive, socially traditionalist populism goes down well. Moreover, if Brown's economic populism can't win in a factory-decimated state like Ohio in a political climate like the one we have now, then it can't win anywhere, ever.

And yet Democrats have reason to worry long term. This message is based on a sort of economic nostalgia, what The Economist called a "rose-tinted version of the 1950's and 1960's" — when the middle class prospered, families cohered, America dominated, unions thrived, Islam was invisible and immigrants were Irish and Italian.

This nostalgia is certainly common today. In their must-read book, "Applebee's America," Doug Sosnik, Matt Dowd and Ron Fournier quote an anxious Michigan voter: "This is going to sound silly, but I wish things were like they were when we were growing up. ... I wish I could go back in time. We had stable lives. Mom could stay home, and we could afford it. Life was slower."

But nationwide, and in the decades ahead, can a politics that evades the modern realities of Islamic extremism and the skill-based global economy really be the basis of a majority movement? I doubt it.

The Imperial Impulse (NYT)

By Max Frankel

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Whatever the worth of Michael Lind's prescriptions for American foreign policy, his glance back at our performance over the last 15 years is helpfully damning. The essence of his complaint concerns our pursuit of hegemony, which he describes not only as a desire for international dominance but also as a lust for unchallengeable power that is bound to wreck the American economy and enfeeble our democracy.

The imperial impulse is an aberration in American history, Lind contends in "The American Way of Strategy," and is due primarily to the fact that our success in the cold war was achieved through our total domination of the anti-Soviet coalition. The resulting hubris produced not merely the current mess in Iraq and the resentment of much of the world, he warns, but a pattern of behavior that bodes ill for the American way of life — our independence among nations and our domestic freedom from government regimentation.

Although Lind angrily traces our quixotic campaign to reorder the Middle East to the theologies of the neocon right, he blames the leaders of both political parties for the underlying failure, once the Soviet Union collapsed, to adopt "a more modest and solvent" foreign policy. "Instead of welcoming the emergence of a peaceful multipolar world, America's bipartisan foreign policy elite in the 1990's and 2000's sought to convert America's temporary cold war alliance hegemony into enduring American global hegemony."

Our misguided ambition, Lind observes, was to monopolize military strength, to discourage other great powers, like Japan, China, Russia and Germany, from arming for their own defense. We felt entitled, even obliged, to punish upstart "rogue" regimes that wanted weapons of mass destruction, with preventive war if necessary. Other signs of overreaching, he thinks, were the expansion of NATO into Eastern Europe (to deny Germany and Russia a sphere of influence there) and the war against Serbia (to reassert America's dominance in Europe and to keep the Russians out of the Balkans). Washington's current agitation against North Korea's nukes and missiles, he suggests, bespeaks not a fear of attack but concern that Japan and South Korea would also soon want advanced weapons and thus upset the American protectorate.

Implying that even the easy defense of Kuwait should not have been an American obligation, Lind writes that the gulf war of 1991 fully committed the United States to a "grand strategy of global hegemony." He thinks it led directly to the disastrous attempt of the present Bush administration to turn Iraq into an American client state and military base so as "to intimidate Iran and Syria, and to create a safer environment for Israel." Moreover, with new bases also in the former Soviet republics of Central Asia, America intended to command vital trade and oil routes and manage the "soft containment" of China and Russia.

In sum, the hegemonists were looking to transform overwhelming military superiority into diplomatic and economic pre-eminence, leaving other nations dependent or disadvantaged and America secure for the indefinite future.

What the pursuit of hegemony really guarantees, Lind argues most persuasively, is national bankruptcy, an imperial presidency, the erosion of our freedoms and diversion of precious resources. These are not just the temporary costs of the ill-fated Iraq venture, he contends, because hegemony requires commitment to three burdensome and permanent policies: (1) dissuasion — forever spending much more for our military than all other nations to keep them safely inferior; (2) reassurance — continually protecting other sizable powers and their interests, with military interventions as needed; and (3) coercive nonproliferation — regularly threatening or punishing states that attempt to disrupt the decreed American order.

You don't have to subscribe to every element of Lind's critique to judge it a shrewd and plausible indictment of the drift of policy since the cold war. And you can surely dismiss the first half of his book, which argues that before the cold war, all our wars, foreign policies and territorial expansions were inspired by maneuvers to produce or restore global balances of power. This glib history is mere prelude to the power-balancing that Lind finally presents as the essential antidote for hegemony. His way, in other words, has long been a proven "American way of strategy" — a clumsy phrase by which he stakes a claim to naming rights, a leg up, perhaps, in the rhetorical competitions of the think-tank punditry.

(Lind is a sometime journalist, public official and polemicist currently serving as the Whitehead senior fellow at the New America Foundation. He has been a protégé of leading conservatives as well as a renegade; has written for The New Republic, The New York Review of Books, The New Yorker, Harper's Magazine and The New York Times; and has used his frequent books to challenge prevailing opinion in diverse fields.)

"The American Way of Strategy" challenges not only the neoconservatives now dominant in Washington but also centrists like Michael Mandelbaum, who some months ago presented a rival treatise entitled "The Case for Goliath." It defended American dominance as essential, even if unappreciated, because it provides a virtual global government, offering other nations necessary regulation, stability and security.

Lind's case against Goliath is forceful but repetitive, and it culminates in only a vague and facile formula for a less taxing American posture. The United States should lead "a concert of power," he says, defining it as "a kind of hegemony shared among a number of great powers." Uncle Sam, as concert master, would rule alone over North and Central America but combine with different nations to manage different regions — with China, Japan and Russia in Northeast Asia; with China, Japan and India in Southeast Asia; with China, India, Russia and maybe Iran and Turkey in Central Asia; and so on.

If all these proud lions actually worked in concert, Lind would ask them to enforce peace and order, "not to produce liberty, democracy and the rule of law in every country." But he expects them also somehow to eliminate terrorism, prevent the spread of major weapons, rescue disintegrating states, end ethnic cleansing, manage energy supplies and protect the environment.

To stimulate such sweeping cooperation, Lind urges that we stop isolating Russia in Europe and threatening to fight China over Taiwan. He does not say what will happen if his regional teams fall out of balance and into conflict. And he concedes that no foreseeable concert can work in the Middle East, where the "least bad" option now, after retreat from Iraq, is for the United States to act as an "offshore balancer," arming others to preserve an equilibrium. That hardly addresses our problems if Egypt or Saudi Arabia succumbs to radicals or Iran eludes balancing.

DOJ_NMG_0072141

Still, Lind's main theme survives his porous prescriptions. The United States alone cannot afford to police the world, never mind democratizing it. And even if prudently conserved, our relative power among nations is destined to decline. So long as jealously sovereign nations refuse to submit to a higher level of law and order, we had better learn to share the travails of living in a condition of global anarchy. For indeed, there's no point in saving America at the cost of the American way of life.

Angelides Vs. Bush (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

Gubernatorial candidate might consider campaigning for governor instead of against the president.

'GEORGE W. BUSH! George W. Bush! George W. Bush!" By now you've probably seen the commercial featuring Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger leading a chant for President Bush at a campaign rally. That was two years ago. In Ohio. Intended to persuade Californians to vote for Democrat Phil Angelides for governor, the spot instead raises the question of who he's running against and which job he's running for.

What can the governor of California do about Iraq? Not much, but that hasn't stopped Angelides from trying to convert California's robust antiwar sentiment into votes. "As governor, I will do everything in my power to bring our state's National Guard troops home from Iraq," he said Tuesday. The proposal is a nonstarter both legally — the Supreme Court has ruled that a governor cannot block a National Guard deployment just because he doesn't like the purpose — and politically.

The last candidate to campaign for governor by running against the president was Arianna Huffington in 2003. She received 0.6% of the vote. California, then as now, is a state confronted by myriad public policy challenges, including a decrepit infrastructure, a huge population of illegal residents and air and water pollution. It is these issues voters want and deserve to hear about.

California is big and exceptional enough to occasionally impersonate a nation, especially when its desires and regulations conflict with those in Washington. And it's hard to argue that the state has been shy about asserting itself lately.

Few other Republican governors have wandered further from the Bush reservation than Schwarzenegger, on issues such as the environment, immigration and stem cell research. While Angelides was spending the week on college campuses railing against "the Bush-Cheney-Rumsfeld excuse for a foreign policy," the governor was signing a historic anti-global warming bill into law.

Of course, Schwarzenegger's recent embrace of Democratic issues, in sharp contrast to his "girlie man" rhetoric of 2004 and his failed union-bashing of 2005, does raise the question of what his true principles are. At the very least, his tenure as governor leaves him open to charges of zigzagging. That's a case Angelides could make. At least then the discussion would shift to what the chief executive of California should be doing about the problems of California.

Bush Hails 'Free' Kazakhstan (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

He stresses his alliance with the leader of the nation, which rights groups have criticized.

WASHINGTON — Seeking to encourage Kazakhstan to embrace democracy, President Bush on Friday characterized the oil-rich Central Asian country that faces continued criticism from human rights organizations as "a free nation."

With President Nursultan A. Nazarbayev at his side in the Oval Office, Bush said the United States and Kazakhstan shared a goal of defeating "extremism" and supporting "the forces of moderation throughout the world."

Nazarbayev, who first visited the Oval Office as Kazakhstan's chief executive when Bush's father was president, has become one of the current administration's favored allies in a troubled region, with officials downplaying questions critics have raised about his commitment to democracy and about government corruption.

Giving his guest a verbal pat on the back between their formal meeting and lunch, Bush said, "I have watched very carefully the development of this important country from one that was in the Soviet sphere to one that now is a free nation."

Though Kazakhstan is seen as more open and economically progressive than some of its neighbors, Nazarbayev in July signed legislation tightening controls on the news media, drawing criticism from the West. His country's human rights record has also been assailed.

Asked whether Bush or his aides gave Nazarbayev a list of specific reforms to pursue, or raised complaints about the course of political freedom there, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said: "There was an encouragement for the government of Kazakhstan to pursue a democratic path."

Another White House official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to publicly address the conduct of a diplomatic meeting, said Nazarbayev, who was reelected nearly a year ago with more than 90% of the ballots amid opposition complaints of voting irregularities, "has a vision toward greater democracy, civil society, and freedom."

The official acknowledged that the U.S. needed to "push and enable" democracy in Kazakhstan and that it was working with the government there "to develop greater press freedom."

In the Oval Office, as he and Bush posed for photographers, Nazarbayev said that "in economics, in energy partnership, in policy, in war on terrorism, we've truly become close partners."

Kazakhstan has been a strong economic performer among developing nations, helped by oil riches that have fueled growth of about 9% a year since 2000.

In a written statement, the two countries agreed to extend cooperation in such areas as anti-terrorism, reconstruction in Iraq and Afghanistan and development of energy resources.

Bush Praises Kazakhstan President (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, September 30, 2006

President Bush heaped praise Friday on the president of Kazakhstan, a Central Asian country important to the United States as an oil supplier and war-on-terror ally but which has a political system that stifles dissent.

U.S. concerns over President Nursultan Nazarbayev's heavy-handed rule did not come up when the two leaders appeared before reporters after their nearly hourlong Oval Office meeting. Instead, the two were all compliments in brief comments that came before Bush hosted a private luncheon for Nazarbayev in the White House residence.

Bush thanked Nazarbayev for supporting the U.S.-led war in Iraq, for his willingness to fight terrorists and to help neighboring Afghanistan become a stable democracy, and for his "commitment to institutions that will enable liberty to flourish." Bush offered support for Kazakhstan's desire to join the World Trade Organization.

"I have watched very carefully the development of this important country from one that was in the Soviet sphere to one that now is a free nation," Bush said as the two sat side by side. "I appreciate your leadership, Mr. President."

White House officials had said beforehand they could not gauge how big a part of the agenda Nazarbayev's democratic record would be Bush's private meeting with him, and there was no immediate comment on the content of their talks.

Nazarbayev expressed gratitude for U.S. support for Kazakhstan's independence from the Soviet Union 15 years ago.

"In economics, in energy partnership, in policy, in war on terror, we truly become close partners," he told reporters, speaking through a translator.

His highest concern appeared to be the turmoil in nearby Afghanistan, where the Taliban has regrouped, illegal drug cultivation is rising and the democratic government remains fragile.

"Nobody in Central Asia will feel safe and peace if we are surrounded by countries populated with terrorist people and if we be surrounded by countries where some people crave to put their hand on the nuclear weapons which Kazakhstan renounced in the past voluntarily," Nazarbayev said.

That renunciation, in which Nazarbayev decided to dismantle the atomic arsenal he inherited from the Soviet Union, earned him acclaim Thursday night at a dinner put on by the Kazakh Embassy and the Nuclear Threat Initiative, which seeks to reduce the global threats from nuclear, biological and chemical weapons.

Nazarbayev said in his dinner speech that thousands of Kazakhs suffered from the radiological fallout from Soviet nuclear testing in his land that lasted more than 50 years. The testing took place in populated areas, he said. When an explosion occurred, he said, "people were told it was an earthquake."

He challenged the United States and other nuclear powers to follow his example and make their countries nuclear-free.

Kazakhstan, a vast country north of Afghanistan and Iran that is nearly the size of Western Europe, is expected to pump 3.5 million barrels of oil a day in the coming decade. It is also a very friendly country for the United States in a part of the world where pro-American sentiment is not widespread.

But it is also known internationally for a political system in which dissent is stifled.

Nazarbayev has been his country's only leader since it achieved independence in December 1991 and has brought stability and prosperity. Like those of most other Central Asian nations, however, Kazakhstan's record on democracy and protecting human rights is regarded as poor.

Nazarbayev was re-elected with 91 percent of the vote in December balloting that international observers called flawed. The 2004 parliamentary vote produced a legislature without a single opposition lawmaker.

The New York-based Freedom House and other groups that support democracy and protection of human rights had called on Bush to make the issue a priority in their meeting.

Kazakhstan Touts Itself As Nuke-free Model (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0072143

By David R. Sands, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 30, 2006

Kazakhstan's President Nursultan Nazarbayev said yesterday that his country's plan to dismantle its vast Soviet-era nuclear weapons programs could serve as a model for solving the confrontation over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Mr. Nazarbayev spoke with a small group of reporters at Blair House after an Oval Office meeting and working lunch with President Bush. It was the Central Asian leader's first official visit to Washington in five years.

The Kazakh leader, whose human rights record has been sharply criticized by some U.S. groups during his visit, also said Mr. Bush had offered his support for Kazakhstan's bid to chair the 55-nation Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) in 2009, which would be a diplomatic first for a former Soviet republic.

"Of course, in order to meet that objective, we have to accomplish a lot by 2009 and we are eager to do so," Mr. Nazarbayev said, speaking through a translator.

American and Kazakh energy officials announced yesterday an agreement to "down-blend" Kazakhstan's remaining stocks of highly enriched uranium, which can be used for nuclear weapons, and to convert a Kazakh research reactor so it can operate on the safer, low-enriched uranium for civilian power needs.

Mr. Nazarbayev, who has led his country since it gained independence in 1991, called Iran a "very close neighbor," and said he explained to hard-line Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in a recent talk the benefits Kazakhstan had won by voluntarily giving up its weapons, test sites and other nuclear assets inherited after the Soviet collapse.

He said his country in return had received security and territorial guarantees from the United States and other major powers, as well as major American financial aid to eliminate existing weapons stocks and transform its facilities to peaceful uses.

"I told the president of Iran, 'Isn't that a shining example for Iran to follow?'" Mr. Nazarbayev said.

Mr. Ahmadinejad continues to defy U.N. demands that he halt Iran's efforts to enrich uranium.

The 66-year-old Mr. Nazarbayev displayed the balancing skills that have helped keep his large, resource-rich and lightly populated country an island of relative stability and prosperity in the troubled Central Asian region.

He noted that Kazakhstan also has extensive political and economic ties with Russia and China, even as it rates as a "strategic partner" of the United States.

The country's vast oil and gas reserves and its image as a model Muslim ally in the U.S.-led war on terror have boosted Kazakhstan's standing with the Bush administration, which has generally softened its public criticisms of the country's democratic shortcomings.

"I have watched very carefully the development of this important country from one that was in the Soviet space to one that is now a free nation," Mr. Bush told the Kazakh leader yesterday in the Oval Office, "and I appreciate your leadership."

A joint statement by the two leaders did not mention the U.S. stand on the OSCE chairmanship.

In an apparent reference to the government's closing last spring of two U.S. advocacy groups promoting democratic parties and institutions in Kazakhstan, the statement said Kazakh officials supported such groups and "will take the necessary steps to facilitate their legal functioning."3

Mr. Nazarbayev received a relatively warm welcome in Washington, a reflection of his country's political progress and an economy producing strong growth and expanding opportunities for foreign investors.

Just before the visit, Mr. Nazarbayev's government signed an accord to transport Kazakh oil through the new pipeline across Armenia, Georgia and Turkey, a route that bypasses Russia and has been strongly supported by the U.S. government.

During his visit, Mr. Nazarbayev also met with the heads of major U.S. corporations considering new investment in the country, including ExxonMobil, ConocoPhillips, and Halliburton.

Mr. Nazarbayev said General Electric had just signed a major deal to locate a factory in Kazakhstan.

The OSCE and Western civil rights groups have criticized restrictions on last year's presidential campaign, which gave the president a new seven-year term with 91 percent of the vote.

The country also has been shaken by the violent deaths of two opposition leaders in late 2005 and early 2006.

Analysts said Mr. Nazarbayev is genuinely popular despite the government's tight oversight of the press and political dissent, in large part because of rising prosperity.

But the recent violence suggests that the delicate balance of competing factions within the country's ruling elite, with Mr. Nazarbayev as the ultimate arbiter, is under growing stress, according to Daniel Kimmage, Central Asia analyst for Radio Free Europe-Radio Liberty.

Mr. Nazarbayev in the interview acknowledged his country's democracy is "not perfect," but said his government has made a conscious decision to make economic development the first priority after independence.

As for getting 90 percent of the vote, he switched briefly to English to joke, "I am sorry."

DOJ_NMG_0072144

"I wish it could have been less so you all would believe in it," he said, "but do you expect me to go to people and say, 'Don't vote for me. Vote for that guy.?'"

Jagshemash, Premier Bush (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Borat Sagdiyev, the Kazakh television reporter with the bushy mustache and cheap gray suit, showed up at the White House this week with an invitation for the man he calls the "mighty U.S. warlord."

He wanted to invite "Premier George Walker Bush," along with "other American dignitaries" like Mel Gibson and O.J. Simpson, to a screening of his new documentary about his anti-Semitic, misogynistic, scatological trek across America, followed by a cocktail party/summit meeting, no doubt featuring Kazakh-mopolitans made with fermented horse urine.

"We'll make discussion of cooperation between the two countries at Hooters," Borat told a befuddled White House guard.

Borat, of course, is Sacha Baron Cohen, the successor to Peter Sellers, a wildly original and brainy Cambridge grad and observant Jew from a distinguished British family. His HBO characters, the rapper Ali G, the fashion reporter Bruno, and Borat, collide with reality, exposing prejudice and puncturing pomposity.

The real Kazakhstan dictator was honored by President Bush at a state dinner this week. Nursultan Nazarbayev may have a corrupt and authoritarian regime where political opponents have been known to die very, very suddenly, but, hey, he's got oil and he's an ally in the war on terror. Respec', as Ali G would say.

So Mr. Cohen popped up as well, loping around D.C. to promote his new movie, "Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan." The satirist held a news conference in front of the Kazakh Embassy — as real officials inside fumed — to proclaim that any protestations that Kazakhstan treats women equally or tolerates all religions are "disgusting fabrications" by "evil nitwits" in rival Uzbekistan.

Mr. Cohen is a genius at turning reality into farce, taking lowbrow humor to high places, but he has met his match in W.

With the publication of parts of the classified intelligence report showing that the Bush administration has expanded the terrorist threat, as well as the books "State of Denial" by Bob Woodward, "Hubris" by Michael Isikoff and David Corn, and "Fiasco" by Thomas Ricks, all detailing the bumbling and infighting of Bush officials on Iraq, it's a tossup as to where we can find the most ludicrous, offensive and juvenile behavior — in the new Borat movie or the Bush White House. Let's compare and contrast:

At a Southern society dinner, an etiquette coach teaches Borat how to excuse himself to go to the bathroom. But when he returns to the table with a toilet doggie bag, no one laughs.

W. and Karl Rove "shared an array of fart jokes," Mr. Woodward writes. A White House aide put a toy that made a flatulence sound under Karl's chair for the senior staff meeting on July 7. When they learned of the terror attacks in London, the prank was postponed. But several weeks later, "the device was placed under Rove's chair and activated during the senior staff meeting. Everyone laughed."

Borat likes to wrestle guys naked. Karl liked to show W. his battery-powered "Redneck Horn," blasting obscenities and insults like "Hey, hogneck, who taught you how to drive?" in a Southern drawl.

Family values in Borat's comic portrait of Kazakhstan are reflected by his sister, an incestuous hooker, the town rapist, a cow in the bedroom, and the annual Pamplona-like "Running of the Jew."

Mr. Woodward writes about Bush family values, or the "Running of the WASP." Even though Poppy Bush found his old G.O.P. nemesis Donald Rumsfeld "arrogant, self-important, too sure of himself and Machiavellian," the author notes, W. chose Rummy as defense chief, feeling "it was a chance to prove his father wrong."

Borat had a fantasy life in which he would bag — literally — Pamela Anderson and yoke her happily ever after to a plow on his farm. Dick Cheney had a fantasy life in which he would bag Saddam's W.M.D. by occupying Iraq. In July 2003, Vice and Scooter Libby pored over fragments of intelligence intercepts, trying to figure out where on earth those elusive W.M.D. were. Mr. Woodward notes that Cheney staffers even called the chief weapon hunter with satellite coordinates for possible hidden caches.

Borat thinks Pamela is silly to object to animal torture, just as Vice thinks the press is silly to object to prisoner torture.

After much chaos, Borat gives up on Pamela and marries a prostitute. After much chaos, and even though Laura wants Rummy out, W. sticks with him at Vice's insistence.

No doubt. For lowbrow antics and silly stunts, W. is the clear winner. Respec'.

Rice Hopes To Rescue Gaza Border Pact (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood And Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072145

Deal she brokered last year to ease Palestinian crossings has gone nowhere. She'll tackle the finger pointing in a visit next week.

JERUSALEM — American officials declared a big breakthrough last year when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice brokered an agreement between the Israelis and Palestinians to ease the flow of people and goods in and out of the Gaza Strip.

But with Rice poised to return here next week, the pact lies in tatters amid ongoing violence and mutual finger pointing between Israel and its neighbors.

Forged in November after intensive, wee-hours diplomacy by Rice, the accord sought to improve freedom of movement as a way to jump-start the battered Palestinian economy and give Palestinians more control over the Gaza border crossings in the wake of Israel's pullout from the territory several months earlier.

Besides laying out the terms of more open access through the main crossings at Karni, between Gaza and Israel, and Rafah, between Gaza and Egypt, the agreement called for bus convoys between Gaza and the West Bank and foresaw eventual development of a seaport in Gaza and reconstruction of its damaged airport.

But few provisions were carried out, and the main Gaza crossings have remained constricted or shut, leaving Palestinian farmers unable to export crops and deepening a sense of confinement felt by many of the territory's 1.3 million residents. The United Nations said in a recent report that the flow through Karni was lower than when the accord was crafted.

"The crossings agreement has joined the great pile of sand in which the Mitchell, Tenet, Zinni and the road map plans have been buried," Israeli journalist Aluf Benn wrote in July in the daily newspaper Haaretz, referring to earlier U.S. initiatives.

Israel and the Palestinians blame each other for the collapse.

The Palestinians say Israel stalled in implementing the agreement; the Israelis attribute their continuing hesitancy to security concerns, including renewed rocket fire from Gaza and the June capture of an Israeli soldier that resulted in an Israeli military incursion.

During her swing through the Middle East, which begins Monday in Saudi Arabia and includes a stop in Cairo, Rice hopes to rescue the crossing agreement as a part of her mission to find ways of renewing the peace process. She is to meet with leaders of moderate Arab states, Palestinians and Israelis to discuss the aftermath of the war in Lebanon, Palestinian-Israeli issues, Iran and Iraq.

Israeli and Palestinian officials say they want to salvage the border agreement, though Israel appears to favor a less sweeping version. In addition, European Union officials are considering whether to renew the assignment of monitors who have been posted at the Rafah crossing.

Freedom of movement is one of the most problematic day-to-day issues for Palestinians. The crossings deal was seen as a way for both sides to win: The Palestinians could develop the Gaza economy through increased trade, and Israel would gain security and further international support for its Gaza pullout the previous summer.

Under the agreement, the Karni crossing, which serves as the main cargo portal between Gaza and Israel, and Rafah were to operate "continuously."

The Rafah crossing was to be turned over to the Palestinians, with Israel keeping track of who entered from Egypt by way of live video and data feeds.

In addition, the two sides were given a month to work out arrangements for bus convoys to carry Palestinians between the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which have been largely isolated from each other because of Israeli travel restrictions.

The Palestinian side would be responsible for guarding crossings from militant attack, and was to cooperate with Israeli and U.S. officials on security issues.

The Palestinians were also to crack down on the smuggling of weapons and explosives at Rafah, a chaotic border town where tunnels have been built for sneaking arms and contraband into Gaza.

But the deal began to unravel almost as soon as Rice left town. Discussions over the bus convoys quickly ran aground. When a suicide bomber killed five Israelis in Netanya, Israel said it was not ready to move forward.

Facing repeated rocket fire by Gaza-based militants, Israel kept the Karni crossing closed during much of the winter, the harvest season for export crops such as carnations, cherry tomatoes and strawberries. Unable to get their products out of Gaza, Palestinian farmers left them to rot or sold them at a loss in Gaza. Losses were estimated at $30 million.

Since then, Karni has been open only irregularly. An average of 30 to 40 truckloads a month make their way out of Gaza through the crossing — well short of the accord's goal of 400.

Some farmers have become so discouraged they skipped the planting season a few weeks ago, said Saad Khatib, trade policy advisor for Paltrade, a private-sector group that promotes Palestinian trade overseas.

Palestinians say the crossings agreement has failed because Israel didn't want to cede control of Gaza's borders in the first place. "There's no will on the Israeli side to improve this process," Khatib said.

Rafah was largely open until militants burrowed under the border into Israel and captured Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit on June 25. His fate remains unknown. In response, Israel launched a broad military incursion, its first in Gaza since the pullout, and has kept the crossing mostly closed since.

Israeli officials defend the closures on security grounds, whereas Palestinians charge that they are punitive. Israel, in turn, accuses the Palestinians of undermining the border agreement by failing to take steps to improve security around the crossings.

Salvoes of Kassam rockets into southern Israel have continued on and off — evidence, the Israelis say, of the inability of Palestinian authorities to assert control over the border. However, Palestinian police were able to thwart a militant attack on Karni in April.

Complicating matters, the victory of militant group Hamas in January's parliamentary elections also brought an end to most of Israel's dealings with the Palestinian government, though the crossings fall under the jurisdiction of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who is a member of the Fatah movement. Unlike Hamas, Fatah does not call for Israel's destruction.

"From Israel's national security perspective, it's not in our interest to see Gaza as a failed state," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

"The agreement was part of something bigger. The agreement failed because something bigger failed…. The crossings can't be seen in isolation."

American security coordinator Lt. Gen. Keith Dayton has proposed a plan for improving security at Karni through construction of more facilities, training of Palestinian security forces and possibly deployment of international observers.

But experts on the Middle East caution that Rice's new mission is unlikely to achieve lasting success without a broad new agreement on security and other issues.

"You could arrange to have Rafah opened by next Monday. But the question is, will it stay open?" said Aaron David Miller, a public policy scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center in Washington. "If this is one of the top objectives of her trip … it may turn out to be a difficult trip."

Turkey Trying To Bridge The Gap With The West (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

Given deteriorating relations with the West and increasing ambivalence at home over alliances with the U.S. and Europe, Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, will have plenty to talk about during trips to Washington and London and a visit from the German chancellor this coming week.

Straddling a strategic divide between East and West, the mostly Muslim country of 70 million people remains committed to its partnership with the U.S. and to its quest to join the European Union. But both of these traditional pillars of Turkey's foreign policy are coming under pressure as rising numbers of Turks believe they stand more to lose than to gain from getting closer to the West.

This perception alone, whether it is right or wrong, should cause alarm in Washington and across Europe, because many policy makers believe that Turkey's vibrant economy and relatively stable democracy -- both rare in the Middle East -- make it essential to keep the country fully within the West's strategic orbit.

Ankara's relations with Washington have recovered somewhat since Turkey banned the U.S. from using its territory as one stage for the 2003 invasion of Iraq. But plenty of bad blood remains, once again mostly because of Iraq. The Turks are outraged by what they see as U.S. inability to restrain Kurdish separatists who attack Turkish soldiers and use Northern Iraq as a haven.

In Turkey, where military service is compulsory and where every family has a relative in uniform, every soldier's death has immense resonance and further stokes anti-U.S. anger. "The U.S. hasn't done anything to help us," says a senior Turkish official. A recent poll showed that only one in five Turks feels warmly toward the U.S. Washington has started taking the issue seriously enough to appoint a special envoy to help address the separatist problem, and Turkey has welcomed the move. Privately, Turkish officials say they need to see concrete results. "Over the last three years, the U.S.-Turkish relationship has deteriorated markedly," writes Richard Haas, president of the Council on Foreign Relations.

A similar deterioration has marked Turkey's relations with the EU. Turkey is negotiating to join it, but against a rising tide of public opinion both in Europe and at home. Many Europeans, exhausted after admitting scores of Eastern European states to the union, view Turkey's membership with skepticism, saying the country is too big, too poor and too culturally different to enter the EU. The Turks, who never lacked national pride, view Europe as inherently biased against admitting their mostly Muslim country into their mostly Christian club.

This past week's EU decision to accept Bulgaria and Romania, despite the two countries' serious domestic problems, only confirmed Turkey's view that it is being held to a tougher standard. As Turkey's EU talks get more difficult and touch on sensitive issues -- such as the deadlock over the divided island of Cyprus and European criticism of Turkey's human-rights record -- more Turks are beginning to question the wisdom of joining.

The silver lining for the U.S. and Europe is that Turkey is so deeply integrated into the Western economic and political structures that a complete rupture is extremely unlikely. But if the Turks continue to perceive that the West isn't meeting their concerns, they will be more likely to elect leaders whose support for Western policies cannot be taken for granted.

U.N.-Israel Encounter Highlights Discord (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

An encounter between a U.N. tank patrol and an Israeli army unit near the border underlines the uncertainty in south Lebanon, with Israel reluctant to pull out the last of its troops and Hezbollah warning of impatience with Israeli truce "violations."

French peacekeepers on Thursday blocked the path of an Israeli armored personnel carrier and two Humvees that crossed into Lebanon, said an Associated Press photographer who saw it. Although the hour-long incident was resolved amicably, it marked the first such known encounter.

The peacekeeping force has said it expects Israeli troops to leave Lebanon under the U.N. cease-fire resolution by Saturday. Israeli military officials said Thursday that the pullout would most likely come after the Jewish holy day of Yom Kippur on Monday.

Israeli officials have been reluctant to withdraw the last of their troops, now thought to number several thousand after peaking around 30,000 at the end of the 34-day war with Hezbollah. They cited disagreements over the deployment of Lebanese and U.N. forces in southern Lebanon, which has long been a stronghold of the Shiite Muslim militants of Hezbollah.

But Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora on Friday stressed the need for Israel to withdraw completely in a telephone call to Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice, Lebanon's state-run news agency reported.

The U.N. resolution calls for 15,000 peacekeepers to work with an equal number of Lebanese soldiers to prevent another outbreak of fighting. It mandates a full Israeli pullout and requires the south be kept weapons-free except for arms approved by the Lebanese government.

Israel wants Hezbollah guerrillas disarmed, but neither the U.N. force nor the Lebanese military is eager to take on the task. The Iranian- and Syrian-backed Hezbollah says it will not disarm until a strong central government capable of defending Lebanon is in place.

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah has said guerrillas have shown patience with what he called Israeli cease-fire violations. But last week, he warned: "Be sure that we will not be patient for long if the (Lebanese) government abandons its role of protecting the land and the people."

Incidents on the ground could heighten tensions, as Thursday's encounter showed.

Israeli troops still stationed on a hilltop on the edge of the border village of Marwaheen had set up checkpoints in recent days on a stretch of road below their base and running parallel to the border fence, residents said.

On Thursday, French peacekeepers also were near the village.

Peter Dejong, an AP photographer, said four French Leclerc tanks painted white were on patrol in the area when an Israeli armored personnel carrier and two Humvees drove into Lebanon through a border gate.

The last French Leclerc tank in the patrol stopped, backed up about 150 yards and blocked the path, a narrow strip of tarmac extending from the gate.

The French and the Israelis then spent several minutes speaking to their commanders by mobile phones and two-way military radios.

Later, the two sides engaged in an animated conversation. Finally, the Israelis drove back to Israel in the troop carrier and the two Humvees.

Malak Sheetowy, a 19-year-old resident of Marwaheen, and her neighbor Marlene Ghanam gave a similar account Friday, saying the faceoff lasted about 60 minutes.

Israel's army confirmed that its troops came close to the French peacekeepers but said there was no confrontation. Israeli troops have been in the Marwaheen area since the cease-fire took effect Aug. 14 and will stay until the zone is transferred to peacekeepers, the army said.

Alexander Ivanko, spokesman for the U.N. peacekeeping force, said French peacekeepers "observed an Israeli violation of the Blue Line" — the U.N.-demarcated line between Lebanon and Israel.

Ivanko said the encounter was peaceful and there was no tension. "I checked with the French colonel and he told me it was amiable. ... They exchanged a couple of words and everyone went his way."

In Jerusalem, Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said he didn't know about the incident, but said that "Israel is honoring all its obligations" under the U.N. resolution and will continue to move toward its full implementation, including the withdrawal of Israeli troops.

Marwaheen, a Sunni village that survives on tobacco and olive crops, made headlines when vehicles carrying residents fleeing this summer's war came under missile fire that killed 12.

There are two U.N. bases in the village, one of which is 150 yards from a hilltop held by Israeli troops. An Israeli tank and an armored personnel carrier could be seen at the hilltop post.

Marwaheen's roughly 200 residents — about half the prewar population — were visited Friday by U.N. officials accompanied by bodyguards and interpreters to seek information on Thursday's incident.

Adnan Ghanim, a member of the village council, said he suspected the Israelis were trying to expand their hold on the area. "They wanted to move back into the village," he said.

Tobacco farmer Moussa Obeid had similar concerns.

"It is not clear yet what these U.N. troops will do to protect us from the Israelis," he said, pointing to the Israeli position. "This is occupation. Look how close they are to us."

Tens Of Thousands Of Hamas Members Rally (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Tens of thousands of Hamas supporters marched in the Gaza Strip on Friday to show their backing for the militant group, even as its efforts to form a national unity government appeared stalled.

Hamas, which won Palestinian parliamentary elections in January, has dropped in popularity in recent months as international sanctions against the Palestinian government and an Israeli military offensive in Gaza have worsened already intense poverty.

Thousands of people marched through the town of Jebaliya in northern Gaza, wearing green Hamas baseball hats and waving green Hamas flags. One banner carried by the marchers read: "Yes to our government, no to all the mercenaries trying to sabotage it."

"The aim of this demonstration is to send a message to the world and to those in our society that the Palestinian people are standing with their elected government. They are rejecting the unjust and unfair siege and all attempts to carry out an internal coup against this government," Hamas lawmaker Mushir al-Masri told reporters.

After Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority, Western governments and Israel cut off financial ties with the government, demanding the militant group recognize Israel, renounce violence and respect previous agreements signed with Israel.

The cutoff in foreign aid has prevented the Palestinian Authority from paying full salaries to its 165,000 employees for six months. Many civil servants responded by going on strike and calling for the resignation of the Hamas government.

The Palestinians' situation further deteriorated after Hamas-linked militants attacked an Israeli army post June 25, capturing a soldier, and Israel responded with a wide-scale offensive in Gaza.

In an effort to end the economic embargo on the government, Hamas officials have tried to form a coalition with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah Party. However, efforts to form the national unity government have stalled because of Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel.

Al-Masri said Hamas remained committed to forming the coalition. "We are going to move ahead with the president, because there is no choice," he said.

Also on Friday, Israeli soldiers killed two Palestinian teenage brothers in the northern Gaza Strip, the army and Palestinian security officials said. The attack occurred in a field near the town of Beit Hanoun, which is often used as a staging base for rocket attacks on Israel.

Palestinian hospital officials said Anwar Hamdan, 16, and Hamam Hamdan, 14, were riding bicycles to inspect rocket launchers in the field when they were killed.

The army said the two were targeted because they had come to the field to collect launchers used to fire rockets in the past week. In recent months, Palestinian militant groups have sent children to collect the rocket launchers, believing they would be less likely to be attacked.

Late Friday night, an Israeli airstrike destroyed the home of a local Hamas leader in southern Gaza, officials said. There were no reports of casualties. The owner of the home, a senior member of Hamas' military wing in the area, received a call from the army about 15 minutes ahead of the blast telling him to evacuate the building, Hamas officials said. Rescue crews rushed to the area to search for wounded.

The army confirmed the airstrike, saying it had targeted a weapons storage facility. It said it warned people to stay away from the structure ahead of the attack to avoid civilian casualties.

The army has carried out a number of similar airstrikes since launching an offensive in Gaza in late June after Hamas-linked militants tunneled into Israel and captured an Israeli soldier.

Things Go Better With Rights (WSJ)

By Zahi Khouri

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

In 1995, I moved from a comfortable life in America to Ramallah, Palestine, to invest in the most American of businesses there. I was instrumental in bringing Coca-Cola to the Middle East in the early 1980s; after the Oslo Peace Accords were signed I decided to launch the Coke franchise in the West Bank and Gaza.

Over the last decade, the business has grown. Today, Coca-Cola employs hundreds of Palestinians and sells 10 million cases of Coke a year.

As a Palestinian American, this was more than a moneymaking venture. Each gleaming bottle, with that red Coca-Cola swirl in both Arabic and English, would be a miniature ambassador from America. And each potential investor who saw that Coke was successful might decide to invest as well. It seemed the perfect strategy: to promote American interests while helping to build an economy that could serve as the foundation of a viable, independent Palestinian state.

Following the peace accords, scores of other Palestinian Americans moved to the West Bank and Gaza. Professors came to teach at universities. Doctors came to help modernize the healthcare system and treat patients. Artists came to exhibit and perform. Other business professionals came to invest, modernize the economy and create jobs. Each, in their way, wanted to help build an independent Palestine. Each served as the real ambassadors of America, so different from the American-made Apache helicopters and F-16 fighter jets Israel uses to rain destruction on the Palestinian economy, cities and villages.

But Israel has decided that we Americans are not welcome. Many, like me, have lived in the West Bank for more than a decade. Unlike American Jews -- or Jews from anywhere -- who can receive instant citizenship upon arrival, we are unable to obtain residency. Instead, we Christian and Muslim Palestinians must rely on our American passports, renewing our tourist visas every three months. A hassle, yes, but the only way to stay in Palestine, often in the homes our families have inhabited for generations.

Since Hamas assumed government authority after democratic elections this year, Israel has begun to deny Palestinian Americans the right to enter. We are left to wonder why.

This new policy could be another turn of the screw to pressure Hamas. It could be manufactured as a painless concession for future negotiations. It could be one more tactic in Israel's drive -- which began in 1948 with the expulsion of more than 700,000 Palestinians -- to empty as much land of as many Palestinians as possible.

We do not know the reason for denying entry to Palestinian Americans. But we do know the result. In addition to breaking families apart -- for example one spouse with children in the West Bank, and the other unable to return from visits to the U.S. -- it is discouraging investors. It is driving out the very people the U.S. State Department, the World Bank and other international organizations encouraged to return. We are the ones building businesses, creating jobs and inspiring hope for a better future.

Using the pretext of security, Israeli policies of home demolitions, land confiscation, restrictions on movement and construction of the separation wall have choked the Palestinian economy. According to the U.N., more than 540 checkpoints and other structures impede movement throughout the West Bank, and crossings into Gaza are rarely open. Gaza represents 30% of the Palestinian economy. Yet we cannot ship goods from the West Bank to Gaza. And Gaza cannot import raw materials for processing, even though it possesses a talented labor force. Israel has also been refusing to turn over nearly $55 million a month (now totaling roughly $400 million) in Palestinian tax revenue. With the cutoff of international aid, this has led to a humanitarian catastrophe. Since March, Palestinian Authority employees -- about one-quarter of the labor force -- have not received their salaries.

Israel will not gain security by creating Mogadishu next to Silicon Valley. Only an open and thriving Palestinian economy can lay the foundation for a sustainable peace.

Our humanitarian crisis is not the result of a natural catastrophe. There was no tsunami, earthquake or drought. We helped to build nations. We have the natural resources and human capital to build a thriving, stable Palestinian economy as well. We do not need international handouts. We need the free movement of people and goods. We need unrestricted gateways between the occupied Palestinian territory and the rest of the world.

DOJ_NMG_0072150

American policy makers have tremendous influence with Israel. They should use it to insist on freedom of movement of people and goods, and to maintain access for Palestinian Americans and Palestinians with other foreign passports to continue to play a role in economic development. A vibrant Palestinian economy serves the interests of all -- Palestinians, Israelis and Americans.

Out Of The Mouths Of Aides (NYT)

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

It has taken five and a half years, but at least some of President Bush's aides have begun to acknowledge the patently obvious: There needs to be a serious effort to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Without one, the United States has no chance of salvaging its battered reputation in the Islamic world. No chance of rallying moderate Arab leaders to fight extremists or contain Iran. And no chance of ensuring Israel's lasting security. We just hope that Mr. Bush will now make the long neglected peace effort a central priority for the remaining years of his presidency.

With Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice traveling to the region next week, Mr. Bush should give her an explicit mandate to press Israel, and not just the Palestinians, for real compromises. He should also give her the authority to talk to adversaries, and not just friends, about how to support the effort.

For years, Mr. Bush's advisers have woven an entire mythology about how Middle East peace required tanks on the road to Baghdad, rather than diplomats on planes to Jerusalem, Ramallah and Damascus.

So it was surprising to hear one of Ms. Rice's closest aides, Philip Zelikow, the State Department counselor, tell a think-tank audience that some sense of progress on the Arab-Israeli dispute is "just a sine qua non" for getting moderate Arabs and the Europeans to cooperate on Iran and the region's many other dangerous problems. "We can rail against that belief. We can find it completely justifiable. But it's fact," Mr. Zelikow said.

We fear that Mr. Bush and his secretary of state haven't yet caught up to that. As Ms. Rice prepared to leave, other aides said that the most she would do would be to rally support for the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, and to solicit ideas on how to revive peace talks.

Ms. Rice should use this trip to commit herself to negotiating a comprehensive cease-fire. She can start by telling the Israelis they need to immediately end targeted killings and halt all settlement construction. Ms. Rice needs to make clear to the Palestinians that while words are important, she is less concerned with rhetoric than the ability and willingness of any Palestinian government to halt, rather than abet, all attacks on Israel.

Washington is already encouraging Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, to meet with Mr. Abbas, for more symbolic support. Ms. Rice should instead tell all sides that President Bush's goal is a full resumption of peace negotiations — and that he will commit the full resources of his presidency to the effort.

Ms. Rice should be willing to go to Damascus — or send a top aide — to tell President Bashar al-Assad that relations can improve if he restrains his clients Hamas and Hezbollah. The Europeans — who have been desperate for the United States to engage — should make the same trip to warn of real punishments should he refuse.

The lesson of this summer's disastrous wars in Lebanon and Gaza is that the time for listening tours and tactical steps is far past. We hope that Mr. Zelikow's bosses start paying attention.

Woman Accused Of Supporting Terror Group (AP)

By Daisy Nguyen, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

A naturalized U.S. citizen from Iran who was found in Iraq was indicted Friday on charges of providing support to a terrorist organization that seeks to overthrow the Iranian regime, federal prosecutors said.

Zeinab Taleb-Jedi, 51, then a resident of Herndon, Va., went to Iraq in 1999 to attend a training camp run by the Mujahedin-e Khalq, or MEK, the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles said in a statement.

MEK, also known as the People's Mujahedin of Iran, and its affiliates were deemed foreign terrorist organizations by the U.S. State Department in 1997. The designations bar anyone in the United States from providing material support.

The group was founded in Iran in the 1960s and moved to Iraq in the early 1980s to base its activities against Iran's government. The group had sided with Iraq in its 1980-88 war against Iran.

The State Department says the MEK groups were funded by Saddam Hussein, supported the seizure of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran in 1979 and are responsible for the deaths of Americans in the 1970s.

Taleb-Jedi was discovered by coalition forces at a camp called Ashraf Base about 40 miles northwest of Baghdad, the U.S. attorney's office statement said. It was unclear when.

DOJ_NMG_0072151

U.S. forces took control of the camp and sent many members back to Iran on condition that they leave MEK, said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the attorney's office.

"An investigation reveals that she played an active role at the camp," Mrozek said.

Taleb-Jedi was indicted by a federal grand jury in New York City on one count of providing material support to a foreign terrorist organization. She faces up to 15 years in federal prison if convicted.

She was being prosecuted in New York because her plane landed at John F. Kennedy International Airport on March 31 upon her return from Iraq. The case was handled by Los Angeles-based prosecutors who have been involved in MEK-related investigations since the 1990s.

She was assigned a public defender in New York and released on bond.

Taleb-Jedi immigrated to the United States from Iran in 1978 and became a U.S. citizen in 1996, the government said. Her aliases include Nayer Taleb-Jedi or Nire Taleb-Jedi, according to the two-page indictment.

The attorney's office did not release any information on the woman's occupation.

Some members of Congress in recent years have advocated the group's removal from the terrorism list because of its stance against the Iranian regime and because it doesn't pose a direct threat to the U.S.

Venezuela And Nigeria, Both OPEC Members, Say They Will Cut Their Oil Production (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Some members of OPEC are getting really nervous about oil at $60 a barrel.

Two of the oil cartel's 11 members, Nigeria and Venezuela, said yesterday that they would make voluntary cuts in their production in response to oil prices that have fallen nearly 20 percent from their peak two months ago.

The modest move, which amounts to less than 200,000 barrels a day, comes after days of mixed signals from some OPEC officials who have been increasingly concerned about the rapid drop in prices.

Nigeria's oil minister, Edmund Daukoru, who is the OPEC president this year, recently said the price of oil was "very low." Both countries, traditional price hawks within the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, said their cut was part of an informal deal agreed to at OPEC's last meeting this month to pare output if prices declined.

Yesterday's announcement was initially shrugged off by oil traders who say there was still plenty of oil supplies on the market. But the confusion around OPEC's position helped push up the price of crude oil on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Oil futures for November delivery pared initial losses and closed at $62.90 a barrel, up 14 cents.

Since they last met in Vienna, OPEC representatives have become anxious as they watch crude oil futures decline rapidly from a midsummer high of $77.03 a barrel.

Mr. Daukoru has been in contact with other OPEC ministers to discuss falling oil prices, which briefly dropped below $60 a barrel in intraday trading for the first time in six months on Monday. But OPEC denied there had been a shift in policy.

One delegate from a Persian Gulf country, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not entitled to talk about his country's policy publicly, had a calmer view.

"We are not currently concerned," he said. "The prices are currently manageable and fair. We're not overly alarmed by the prices. It's the market working."

Demand for crude oil typically declines after Labor Day, and it is not unusual for oil prices to drop once the summer driving season is over. Consumption tends to pick up again with the first winter cold.

"We are not going to push extra oil in the market or force it down our customers' throats; we just respond to demand," the delegate said.

Still, despite assurances from Saudi Arabia and others that they would keep markets amply supplied with oil, the contradictory statements from senior OPEC representatives have raised doubts about the oil cartel's strategy.

Whether Nigeria and Venezuela actually reduce their output or not, the mixed messages have at least succeeded in one way: oil traders have been persuaded that OPEC will step in to defend prices, and, therefore, the recent price decline has slowed.

OPEC's acting secretary general, Mohammed Barkindo, who is also a senior Nigerian official, told the energy publication Platts that he had met with Saudi Arabia's oil minister this week in Riyadh and that Saudi Arabia was already cutting its production as part of the informal agreement. Saudi Arabia has not commented on any change in policy.

It will take a much larger drop in prices for OPEC to step in formally with a cartelwide production cut. Saudi Arabia, OPEC's largest and most influential member, is apparently comfortable seeing crude oil fall to around $55 a barrel. Further declines, however, might provoke action by OPEC.

"While apparently fanciful, reports of an imminent output cut reflect two hard facts: stocks are building faster than expected and several producers have an incredibly low pain threshold when it comes to price drops," Antoine Halff, an energy analyst with Fimat, wrote in a note yesterday. "However, more price declines will likely be needed before OPEC producers decide on any coordinated move."

Venezuela, which pumps about 2.5 million barrels a day, said it would cut its daily output by 50,000 barrels, starting tomorrow. Nigeria said it would trim its exports by 5 percent at the same date, amounting to a reduction of about 120,000 barrels a day. Nigeria produces about 3.8 million barrels a day. It is notable that these two countries are taking the self-appointed role of managing the market since neither is currently meeting its OPEC production quota.

Nigeria's production, for example, is hundreds of thousands of barrels short of its peak because of social unrest in the Niger Delta, while Venezuela has experienced lower output for some time.

"They are trying to influence the psychology of the market," said Larry Goldstein, an oil analyst and the president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation in New York. "Although they are reacting to the reduction in demand, they are trying to convince the market that they are actually anticipating it by making cuts ahead of the market. But they are simply reacting to it, which is how markets should operate."

Venezuela And Nigeria Cut Oil Output (FT)

By Carola Hoyos In London

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

Venezuela and Nigeria, both members of the Opec oil cartel, on Friday announced that they would reduce their oil production by as much as 200,000 barrels a day to shore up prices.

Several other key members of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries were said to be furious about the unilateral decision.

Nevertheless, data due to be released in the next few weeks are expected to show those other members, which include Saudi Arabia, Iran, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates, are also reducing output but keeping quiet about the measure.

Saudi Arabia and Kuwait are both allies of the US, the world's biggest oil consumer, and do not want to be seen trying to boost prices that are still relatively high at $60 a barrel.

Nonetheless, they are concerned about the speed with which prices have slipped from $75 over recent weeks and want to ensure that their oil, which trades slightly below the price of international benchmark crudes, does not fall below the $50 mark.

To that end, and because refineries are demanding less oil because of scheduled maintenance closures, Saudi Arabia is seen as having already cut production by 200,000 barrels a day, with another 200,000 being cut by Kuwait, Iran and the UAE.

Nigeria is cutting 120,000-150,000 barrels a day, while Venezuela is expected to cut 50,000 b/d. The total cuts would reduce Opec production to 27m b/d, a 600,000 b/d fall in two months. But oil prices did not rise significantly on the news.

Nigeria is already producing fewer barrels than its Opec quota allows because of militant attacks on oil facilities in the Delta region.

Neil McMahon, analyst at Sanford Bernstein, said: "I can't see it [the move by Nigeria and Venezuela] stabilising the price for long because Opec could turn on the tap again at any moment." He noted that spare oil capacity had doubled in just a year and is now at 3m b/d.

He said the price fall had been prompted by a slowdown in demand. The US Department of Energy this week showed US demand in July had fallen by 1.3 per cent from a year earlier.

Bolton Rips U.N. Deputy Over Comments (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

The U.S. ambassador to the U.N. on Friday accused the No. 2 U.N. official of discrediting the United Nations by criticizing American and British diplomacy over Darfur, his latest attack on the deputy.

The ambassador John Bolton demanded Deputy U.N. Secretary-General Mark Malloch Brown apologize over comments that appeared in Friday's editions of the Independent newspaper in London. He criticized President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair for threatening Sudan over its refusal to allow U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur.

"The Sudanese know we don't have troops to go in against a hostile Khartoum government; if Sudan opposes us there's no peace to keep anyway; you're in there to fight a war," Malloch Brown said. "It's just not a credible threat."

Malloch Brown said those threats allowed Sudan to portray itself as "the victims of the next crusade after Iraq and Afghanistan," and said the U.S. and Britain "need to get beyond this posturing and grandstanding."

DOJ_NMG_0072153

Bolton said Malloch Brown's remarks could undermine the U.N. Security Council's demand that the U.N. take over from an underfunded African Union force that has been unable to stop the violence in Darfur. Sudan has so far refused to give the U.N. control of the mission.

"Let me say these remarks bring discredit to the United Nations and are a stain on its reputation," Bolton told reporters at the U.N. "It's a terrible signal to the government in Khartoum and should never have been uttered," he added later.

"We are proud that we have called the attention of the international community to the tragedy in Darfur. We are proud of our efforts to bring relief to that tragedy. And to have Mr. Malloch Brown attack those efforts, as I say, brings great discredit to this institution," he said.

Few U.N. officials seem to spark Bolton's ire more than Malloch Brown. In June, the American ambassador said Malloch Brown, a Briton, made a "very, very grave mistake" for a speech in which he argued that the U.S. employs stealth diplomacy at the U.N. — relying on it, yet refusing to defend it before critics at home.

And in an interview with USA Today earlier this year, Malloch Brown himself said Bolton was "a real force here, but in a way that provokes a lot of reaction and opposition from others."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Friday that the United States was proud to have kept the pressure on Sudan.

"Rather than focusing on what the U.S. or the U.K. or others might be doing, he might apply himself to the task at hand rather than giving speeches," McCormack said of Malloch Brown.

Extremist Islam May Be Rising In Morocco (AP)

By John Thorne, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Little would seem to connect a soldier, a shopkeeper, airline pilots' wives and a woman known for helping people in need. But all have been named as suspects in a purported Islamic terrorist plot, suggesting extremism may be leaping Morocco's class divides.

In all, Moroccan authorities arrested 56 people last month for allegedly being part of a network that was planning attacks on military and tourist sites in hopes of bringing down the government of this North African monarchy.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States and suicide bombings two years later that killed 33 people in Casablanca, this country's economic capital, Moroccans have grown accustomed to police crackdowns on Islamic militants.

Thousands have been detained, drawing frequent accusations of abuse and forced confessions at the hands of police.

What's new in the latest case is the wide range of people accused. Middle-class women and security force members allegedly formed the core of a group that authorities say called itself Ansar al-Mehdi, or Supporters of the Mehdi — a divine figure in Islamic tradition who will establish justice on Earth before Judgment Day.

Previously, Islamic extremism was most evident in Morocco's urban slums like Sidi Moumen, the cinderblock jungle in Casablanca where many of the 2003 suicide bombers lived. If the charges are true, the new case would suggest Muslim militancy is spreading into the middle class.

Penetration of the army would be a particular blow because the Western-equipped force has traditionally stood as a pillar of state power. After the sweep, King Mohammed VI fired the head of military intelligence and the head of Morocco's general security forces.

Morocco ended compulsory military service this month, but officials said it had nothing to do with the Ansar al-Mehdi revelations.

Officials have released little information about the Mehdi suspects and their alleged targets, divulging just a few names. The Justice Ministry says judges are preparing for public hearings originally planned for mid-September but now delayed until late October.

Two of the four female suspects are wives of Royal Air Maroc pilots, and Interior Minister Chakib Benmoussa alleged they were recruited by alleged Ansar al-Mehdi chief Hassan Khattab to carry out suicide attacks in Morocco.

Khattab spent two years in jail for involvement in the May 2003 suicide bombings.

Another woman in custody, Fatima Zahra Rehioui, 51, is described by authorities as a central figure in the alleged plot. In a rare news conference in August, Benmoussa said Rehioui was a confidant of Khattab and knowingly gave him $17,280 for terrorist activities.

Rehioui's lawyer tells a different story, describing her as someone who helps people. Attorney Khalid Idrissi said Khattab asked Rehioui for the money so he could see a doctor about a heart condition and she gave the money freely, with no questions asked.

"She's known as a very charitable woman who helps poor families in her area, especially during Ramadan and at other religious festivals," Idrissi said.

Moroccan authorities say that Badr Bouziki, a 27-year-old shopkeeper, also was deeply involved with Ansar al-Mehdi and that he helped test explosives in forests near Sale, just outside the Moroccan capital, Rabat.

"I know that he's not guilty," said one of Bouziki's relatives. He asked not to be further identified, saying he feared possible government reprisal.

The relative said that Bouziki is not particularly religious and that his arrest at a bus station while visiting relatives in north-central Morocco came as "a complete surprise."

When he visited Bouziki in jail, the relative said, the suspect complained of torture and showed signs of beatings.

Mohamed Khalouki, 27, whose family lives in an outlying village of Sale, is one of five soldiers arrested in the terror sweep.

"We know the truth: He has nothing to do with Ansar al-Mehdi," said Khalouki's sister, who also said she feared being quoted by name.

Growing up amid dusty fields, stands of pine trees and patches of rubbish, Khalouki sought purpose in military service, choosing to enroll at a military school at age 12, his family said.

Drawn early to music, he became a drummer in the army band, traveling to Europe for concerts and shifting his ambitions to a musical career. Denied permission to quit the army, he deserted in 2005 and was captured this year, serving three months in jail, the family said.

"On the day he was supposed to get out, I went to pick him up, but he wasn't there," a brother said. Khalouki had been transferred into police custody for alleged involvement with four fellow band members in Ansar al-Mehdi.

Teacher In Hiding After Attack On Islam Stirs Threats (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

PARIS, Sept. 29 — A French high school philosophy teacher and author who carried out a scathing attack against the Prophet Muhammad and Islam in a newspaper commentary says he has gone into hiding under police protection after receiving a series of death threats, including one disseminated on an online radical Islamist forum.

The teacher, Robert Redeker, 52, wrote in the center-right daily Le Figaro 10 days ago that Muhammad was “a merciless warlord, a looter, a mass-murderer of Jews and a polygamist,” and called the Koran “a book of incredible violence.”

The Redeker case is the latest manifestation in Europe of a mounting ideological battle that pits those who believe Islam and the Prophet Muhammad can be criticized in the name of free speech against those in the Muslim community who believe no criticism can be tolerated.

A recent speech by Pope Benedict XVI that seemed to link Islam and violence caused such an uproar in the Muslim world that the pope issued a rare expression of regret.

The pope expressed regret for the reaction to his remarks after Muslims demonstrated against him around the world. Just this week, a Berlin opera house decided to cancel performances of the Mozart opera “Idomeneo” because of security fears over a scene showing the severed head of the Prophet Muhammad. The decision prompted an outpouring of protest about what was seen as the surrender of artistic freedom.

In his commentary, Mr. Redeker compared Islam unfavorably to Christianity and Judaism, although he admitted that the history of the Catholic Church was “full of dark pages,” and he criticized the hostile reaction to the pope’s remarks.

“Jesus is a master of love; Muhammad is a master of hatred,” Mr. Redeker wrote, adding, “Whereas Judaism and Christianity are religions whose rites forsake violence and remove its legitimacy, Islam is a religion that, in its very sacred text, as much as in some of its everyday rites, exalts violence and hatred. Hatred and violence dwell in the very book that educates any Muslim, the Koran.”

Immediately afterward, Mr. Redeker, who teaches in a public high school near Toulouse and is the author of several books on philosophy, began to receive death threats by telephone, e-mail and through the online Islamist Web site known as Al Hesbah, a password-protected forum with ties to Al Qaeda. The forum published photos of him and what it said was his home address, directions to his home and his cellphone number, according to the SITE Institute, which tracks violent Islamist groups.

That day’s issue of Le Figaro was banned in Egypt and Tunisia. Mr. Redeker was denounced by a commentator on Al Jazeera television.

“I can’t work, I can’t come and go and am obliged to hide,” Mr. Redeker told Europe 1 radio in a telephone interview from an undisclosed location on Friday. “So in some way, the Islamists have succeeded in punishing me on the territory of the republic as if I were guilty of a crime of opinion.”

DOJ_NMG_0072155

Mr. Redeker, who has kept in contact with news agencies by cellphone and e-mail, said that his wife and their children had also been threatened with death. He told Europe 1 that his wife was in hiding with him, but he was less clear about his three children, saying that one of them had been forced to move and that another was in a boarding school.

Asked to describe the sort of threats he had received, Mr. Redeker replied, "You will never feel secure on this earth. One billion, three hundred thousand Muslims are ready to kill you."

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin on Friday called the threats "unacceptable," adding: "We are in a democracy. Everyone has the right to express his views freely, while respecting others, of course."

The Interior Ministry has confirmed that Mr. Redeker is under police surveillance, and that counterterrorism experts have begun a preliminary investigation into the threats, which the ministry has described as "dangerous." Mr. Redeker complained in the radio interview that he had to arrange his own logistics and "find a place to sleep at night or live for a day or two."

One of the threats came from a contributor to Al Hesbah, who wrote, "It is impossible that this day pass without the lions of France punishing him."

The contributor called on his Muslim brethren in France to follow the lead of Muhammad Bouyeri, who murdered the Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh after he made a film denouncing the plight of abused Muslim women.

"May God send some lion to cut his head," the contributor said of Mr. Redeker, whom he described as a "pig."

Mr. Redeker's situation echoes that of Ayaan Hirsi Ali, a Somali-born Dutch politician who collaborated with Mr. van Gogh on the film and has been relentless in her criticism of some Islamic practices. The subject of numerous death threats from radical Islamists, she was put under the protection of bodyguards in the Netherlands in 2002, and currently has security protection in Washington, where she recently became a fellow at the conservative American Enterprise Institute.

In the Figaro commentary, Mr. Redeker wrote, "Islam tries to dictate its rules to Europe: opening swimming pools at certain hours exclusively for women, forbidding the caricature of this religion, demanding a special diet for Muslim children in school cafeterias, fighting for wearing the veil in school, accusing free thinkers of Islamophobia."

Mr. Redeker, who has written against Islam in the past, does not shy from controversy. At the time of the American-led invasion of Iraq, he criticized French pacifists, and he has written extensively about how watching sports competitions is worse than opium. His new book, "Depression and Philosophy," is about to be published.

At first, Mr. Redeker did not speak out about the threats. In an e-mail message to The New York Times last Tuesday, he said it was not the right time to talk about his plight.

Then, in an interview with the local Toulouse newspaper, La Dépêche du Midi, published Thursday, Mr. Redeker described the death threats, adding, "What is happening to me corresponds fully to what I denounce in my writing: the West is under ideological surveillance by Islam."

That interview set off a public defense of Mr. Redeker in the name of free speech and condemnations of those who threaten him, which snowballed Friday after his radio interview with Jean-Pierre Elkabbach, the president of Europe 1, who is the host of a popular interview show.

Philippe de Villiers, a far-right politician, wrote President Jacques Chirac a letter on Friday asking that Mr. Redeker be given "shelter — as a symbol — at the Élysée Palace, which is the palace of the republic, rather than let him wander," according to Agence France-Presse.

Le Figaro, in an unusual front-page open letter on Friday signed by the editor and the publisher, said, "We condemn with the greatest conviction the grave attacks on freedom of thought and freedom of expression which this affair has provoked."

On Thursday, Education Minister Gilles de Robien was less forceful. He expressed "solidarity" with Mr. Redeker, but cautioned that a "state employee must show prudence and moderation in all circumstances."

But two large teachers' unions in separate statements on Friday threw their support behind Mr. Redeker's right to speak freely, though one of them made clear, "We do not share his convictions."

Mr. Redeker said that he had no second thoughts about what he wrote. "No regrets," he said in the radio interview. "I have given a lot of thought in writing this text."

New Script On North Korea? (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

Groups Hope Stark Prison Play Spurs Pressure on Pyongyang Regime

WASHINGTON -- As international concern about North Korea's nuclear program intensifies, human-rights groups and Christian activists in the U.S. are unveiling a new weapon near here Wednesday in their campaign to dislodge dictator Kim Jong Il: a musical.

DOJ_NMG_0072156

"Yoduk Story," a smash hit in its initial run in South Korea earlier this year, tells the story of star-crossed lovers imprisoned in North Korea's most notorious prison camp. Few protagonists in the nearly three-hour drama survive Yoduk's dungeons and torture chambers. The main character, a North Korean singer, is raped, impregnated and eventually commits suicide. The play's unflinching portrayal of Pyongyang's gulags -- including floggings and amputations -- is viewed as a crucial tool by activists in pressuring governments to take a more aggressive approach toward confronting North Korea over religious persecution and human-rights abuses.

"The play is a cultural nuclear bomb against Kim Jong Il," says Suzanne Scholte, president of the conservative Defense Forum Foundation of Virginia, which is helping to stage the drama. It opens a three-night run Oct. 4 at the Strathmore, a theater in suburban Maryland.

The drama behind the play's journey to Washington is as intriguing as the on-stage script. Many of the human-rights, Christian, and Korean-American organizations promoting "Yoduk Story" have also been active in shaping broader U.S. policy toward North Korea in recent years. A coalition of these groups lobbied the White House to enact in 2004 the North Korean Human Rights Act, which binds Washington to process more expeditiously North Korean asylum seekers into the U.S. The bill also established a special presidential envoy to monitor North Korean human rights, currently Jay Lefkowitz, an attorney and former top White House aide to President George W. Bush. Mr. Lefkowitz will be attending the opening-night performance of "Yoduk Story."

The machinery behind the play's U.S. run is in many ways a microcosm of the human-rights and faith-based organizations that are increasingly seeking to drive American foreign policy. Many of the cast's 30 members are boarding at parishes in the Washington area for the East Coast run. And a national network of Korean-American churches, the Korean Church Coalition for North Korean Freedom, is calling on its members to buy a sizable block of the 6,000 seats currently on sale for the play's four-night run in Los Angeles next month.

Many Americans who have participated in the growing coalition of activists interested in North Korea believe human rights and refugees will ultimately be the defining tools in U.S. attempts to combat that country's dictatorship. They are seeking to use radio broadcasts, film and the Internet to turn the current trickle of North Korean refugees into a torrent that could potentially cripple the North Korean regime. "The key is how we can get a critical mass" of refugees, says Michael Horowtiz, a scholar at Washington's conservative Hudson Institute, who helped draft the North Korean Human Rights Act.

The creative force behind "Yoduk Story" is its director and chief financier, 37-year-old Jung Sung San, himself a North Korean defector. Mr. Jung narrowly escaped a 13-year prison term in Yoduk in 1994, after North Korean military police arrested him for listening to South Korean radio broadcasts. He was headed toward Yoduk's expansive prison site 70 miles northeast of Pyongyang, he said in an interview, when his vehicle overturned in a rain storm and he escaped. He eventually resettled in Seoul, after fleeing through China, Russia and Hong Kong.

A student of film in Pyongyang and Russia, Mr. Jung took up jobs writing and editing for television and film after his resettlement in South Korea. But his father's execution in North Korea in 2002 caused a major transformation in his life, he says. He contemplated suicide, after being told his escape was the reason for his father's death. But he eventually embraced Christianity and vowed to work to expose North Korea's system of gulags.

"I decided to let the world know about the prison camps" across North Korea, says Mr. Jung, a sprite man whose straight black hair is tinged with orange streaks. "We have a duty to save these people" who are still there.

The end result was "Yoduk Story," which Mr. Jung says he partially funded by offering up his kidney as collateral for a loan. He also faced stiff opposition from the South Korean government, which has been reluctant to antagonize North Korea as Seoul seeks economic and political engagement in an attempt to moderate Pyongyang's behavior. But the musical often sold out this year, as conservative political groups and Christian activists flocked to the play. It also received the blessing of senior South Korea politicians, such as former South Korean President Kim Young Sam.

From its conception, though, "Yoduk Story" was envisioned as a drama for the American public, Mr. Jung says. President Bush has shown a particular interest in the plight of North Korea's political prisoners, publicly disparaging Kim Jong Il for running a gulag and advising White House staff to read the memoirs of one of Yoduk's few escapees, Kang Chol Hwan. Mr. Bush last year gave a private Oval Office audience to Mr. Kang -- who is a consultant to "Yoduk Story" -- and the play's producers have sent invitations to the president, first lady and a number of cabinet sectaries to attend one of next week's performances.

The White House said it is unlikely Mr. Bush will attend. But an aide said Mr. Lefkowitz is looking forward to attending the event and addressing the cast and crew of "Yoduk Story."

Longer term, Mr. Jung has ambitious plans to bring "Yoduk Story" and other tales about North Korean life to film. Promoters of the play, meanwhile, hope its performance here will lead to even greater pressure on the U.S. government to confront North Korea's concentration camps and to accept those who have suffered into the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0072157

"It's an issue everyone should be concerned about," says Adrian Hong, the founder of Washington-based LiNK, or Liberty in North Korea, which is also supporting "Yoduk Story." "Americans have a place in their hearts for the oppressed."

Thai Military Leaders Say They Retain Power To Remove A Civilian Government (NYT)

By Seth Mydans And Thomas Fuller, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

BANGKOK, Sept. 29 — Thailand's junta said Friday that it would not interfere with the workings of the interim government it has promised to appoint. But it said it reserved the right to fire the government in exceptional circumstances.

Thai newspapers quoted a high-ranking official as saying that the civilian government would be headed by Surayud Chulanont, 62, a respected former general who is close to the palace.

The appointment of the prime minister must be formally approved by King Bhumibol Adulyadej before it is announced, and on Friday the official, Auditor General Jaruvan Maintaka, backed away from her earlier statement. Still, there were hints from other officials that it was true.

General Surayud is known as a nonpolitical soldier who worked to professionalize the force when he was army chief. One of his oft-quoted comments is, "I always think that politics and I don't fit together."

Also on Friday, the junta announced a military shuffle that consolidated its control over the armed forces, sidelining officers loyal to Thaksin Shinawatra, the prime minister who was ousted in a coup on Sept. 19.

At a briefing for foreign reporters, Gen. Winai Phattiyakul, one of the six officers of the junta, said that Mr. Thaksin had been trying to gain personal control of the military by promoting his supporters and that the coup leaders were concerned about a split in the armed forces.

At the briefing, a senior Foreign Ministry official said the junta, calling itself the Council for National Security, would retain what he called "a partnership rather than a hierarchical relationship" with the civilian government.

The junta has "no power to issue any order whatsoever in the running of the government, except in security," said the official, Krit Garnjana-Goonchorn, the permanent secretary of the Foreign Ministry.

Nevertheless, he said, an interim constitution would give the junta the power to fire the civilian government. He cast this as a progressive move, saying the constitutional power would remove the need for any future coups.

"The power is there in reserve," he said. "If things did not work out, the Council for National Security would not have to resort to nonpeaceful means to effect change."

The interim government is to hold office until a new constitution is drawn and a new Parliament is elected, the coup leaders have said. At the briefing, the officials said the drafting of a constitution should take no longer than nine months, somewhat accelerating a timetable that was given earlier.

Although he is a former general, General Surayud has played a civilian role as a member of the Privy Council, the top advisory body to the king.

On Thursday he said he backed the coup, saying the generals had been forced to move because of the impending possibility of bloodshed, referring to an intensifying conflict between supporters and opponents of Mr. Thaksin. "The most important matter is to build unity in the country," he said.

In the military shuffle announced Friday, Mr. Thaksin's supporters and relatives have mostly been removed from commands and transferred to inactive positions or attached to agencies that put them outside the chain of command.

A struggle over promotions appeared to have been one of the sparks for the coup, as Mr. Thaksin tried to put his allies and relatives in positions that would have given him personal control over the military.

Some analysts saw this as a final step in Mr. Thaksin's attempt to secure personal control over the workings of government, having already co-opted the Senate, much of the judiciary and the independent agencies that were intended under a new Constitution as a check on executive power.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has described the coup as "a U-turn" for democracy in Thailand, and the United States has suspended $24 million in military aid under a law that forbids assistance to a country where a democratically elected leader has been deposed in a coup.

But the Foreign Ministry official, Mr. Krit, said this was a minimal response in accordance with United States law and added, "I think they are measuring their response, keeping their eye on what's developing on the ground."

Thai Military May Pick General As Interim PM (FT)

By Amy Kazmin In Bangkok

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072158

Thailand's military leaders appear poised to install a retired general and close adviser to the country's revered monarch as interim prime minister, as they seek to fend off international criticism of the coup d'etat that ousted Thaksin Shinawatra as prime minister.

Gen. Surayud Chulanont, former Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces and a member of the privy council of King Bhumibol Adulyadej, was reportedly chosen to head the interim administration, after the generals ruled out other potential candidates, including several with stronger economic backgrounds.

The coup-makers have refused to officially confirm their choice, as protocol requires the king to assent to the candidate before it is publicly announced. But in an apparent slip, Jaruvan Maintaka, who is probing corruption allegations against the now deposed government, said late Thursday that Gen. Surayud would get the job, while other army officials have also dropped broad hints in that direction to Thai reporters.

The coup-makers are expected to name a new premier over the weekend or early next week, as they seek to fulfill their initial promise to transfer power to a civilian government within two weeks.

Gen. Surayud, a known nature-lover who embodies the virtues of humility and respectfulness that Thais traditionally admire in their leaders, won accolades for his leadership of the army, and his efforts to de-politicise the armed forces.

But while the coup-makers insist he has been a civilian since his retirement several years ago, his appointment could heighten the concerns of the international community, already dismayed by the military's seizure of power.

The US on Thursday night suspended $24m in military aid to Thailand, an action required by US law in the aftermath of a coup. But despite international condemnation of the coup – and calls for a quick restoration of democracy, Thailand has so far faced remarkably few repercussions in its relations with the outside world, due to the bloodless coup.

Still, the army has been on an offensive to persuade the outside world that they had no choice but to take control - to prevent a looming violent confrontation between supporters and opponents of the highly divisive Mr Thaksin.

The coup took place a day before Mr Thaksin's critics were due to hold a massive demonstration, despite reports that some government ministers were organising counter-demonstrations with the aim of provoking clashes. The army itself was also reportedly split, raising concerns that factions of the army could end up in conflict.

"If you are driving a train, and you see it may derail or collide with another train and cause damage or loss of life, it make sense if you stop or make a sharp turn to avoid tragedy," Gen. Winai Phattiyakul, the secretary-general of the military's governing council, told foreign journalists on Friday. "That is why we made the decision to have political change."

However, Gen. Winai insisted that the coup-group, which calls itself the Council for Democratic Reform, has no intention of retaining power, and that "we are looking for free and fair elections ahead."

He also said that the interim premier will have a free hand to choose his own civilian Cabinet to run the government for the next year, although the coup group will retain the right to remove the premier should any problem arise.

Over the weekend, the council is unveil an interim constitution, which outlines a seven- to nine-month process for the drafting of a new permanent constitution, before the country holds fresh elections.

Reports: Thailand Selects Interim Leader (AP)

By Grant Peck, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Thailand's coup leaders are likely to appoint a respected former army commander as interim prime minister until promised elections next year, newspapers reported Friday.

Retired Gen. Surayud Culanont, 63, was the ruling military council's top choice to fill the position, major newspapers in Bangkok reported. A formal announcement was expected in the coming days after a draft constitution is approved by the king.

Thailand's auditor general, Jaruvan Maintaka, was quoted as confirming the appointment in a posting on the Web site of the government's Public Relations Department. "Yes, definitely, Gen. Surayud is the prime minister. He is the suitable person," she was quoted as saying.

However, when contacted by The Associated Press later Friday, she denied making the comments. "I didn't say so," she said, without elaborating.

Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, who led the coup that ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, told reporters that a draft constitution has been completed and sent to the Royal Palace. He said he hoped the constitution would be approved by King Bhumibol Adulyadej this weekend, followed by the formal announcement of the prime minister.

The expected appointment of Surayud was likely to be welcomed by many Thais.

Over a 40-year career in the military, Surayud garnered a reputation for effectiveness, tact and incorruptibility, the latter a trait not shared by some past Thai military officers. Upon his retirement in 2003, he was appointed to the Privy Council, the top advisory body to the king.

DOJ_NMG_0072159

During his career, he fought Thai communist insurgents and dealt with the sensitive situation along the embattled Cambodian border during the 1980s. He was regarded as being close to the U.S. military, which praised him throughout his career.

A devout Buddhist, Surayud spent time as a monk after leaving the army and often said he had no intention of entering the political fray.

The coup leaders accused Thaksin of corruption and seized power in a bloodless takeover Sept. 19 while he was abroad, vowing to name a civilian prime minister within two weeks.

Large demonstrations early this year demanding his ouster reflected a polarized Thai society, and many Thais have greeted the coup as a resolution of a national crisis.

The United States, which has decried the coup as a setback to democracy, on Thursday suspended $24 million in assistance to Thailand.

The coup leaders, meanwhile, tightened their grip on power by sidelining officers in the military who had been key Thaksin supporters.

In an annual reshuffle of top-ranking officers announced Friday, a number of officers loyal to Thaksin were removed from commands and transferred to either inactive positions or attached to agencies that take them outside the chain of command.

An announcement in official media said the king endorsed the changes.

Two members of the ruling council — Gen. Winai Phattiyakul and Gen. Boonsang Niempradit — were given more powerful positions. Winai, secretary-general of the military council, is to become permanent secretary of the Defense Ministry, while Boonsang was promoted from deputy supreme commander of the armed forces to supreme commander.

Five other army generals who had opposed Thaksin also received promotions.

Winai said he had spoken with Thaksin and that the former prime minister had "decided to leave politics and will take a rest with his family." Thaksin, who is currently in London, had no current plans to return to Thailand, his party said Friday.

Thaksin's only public remarks since being ousted came in a prepared statement two days after the Sept. 19 coup in which he said he wanted to take a "deserved rest" from politics, and was planning to work on research and development and carry out "possible charitable work for Thailand."

The military has already said that Thaksin is welcome back in Thailand, but that a return right now might not be appropriate because of political tensions.

Retired General Seen As Thailand's New Premier (AFP)

By Thanaporn Promyamyai

AFP, September 30, 2006

Thailand's ruling junta has picked a former army chief to be the new prime minister, local media and a government official said, more than a week after the coup that ousted Thaksin Shinawatra.

At the same time, the military -- which refused to confirm or deny the name of their reported pick -- said it was reserving the right to sack the premier under an interim constitution due to be published this weekend.

General Surayud Chulanont, 63, now an advisor to the revered king, had been chosen as the successor to Thaksin, state-run Radio Thailand reported on its website citing auditor general Jaruvan Maintaka.

The choice was "quite certain," it quoted her as saying, adding that he "is the most suitable for the job, given his qualification and his seniority."

Surayud's name was also splashed across the Thai media, although a military source, who asked not to be named, said he had in fact turned the offer down.

The junta's secretary general threw his support behind Surayud and said he figured "on the list" but that no names had been sent for royal approval.

"If it is General Surayud, I like him and I respect him," General Winai Phattiyakul said. "He may be my choice, but I do not have the power to choose the prime minister."

Winai indicated Surayud's army past would not be a bar to getting the post of premier. "We really consider that a retired general is a civilian," he said.

Thailand's new military leaders pledged after taking power on September 19 to appoint a new premier within two weeks to guide Thailand towards elections in October 2007.

"The endorsement of the prime minister and handing down of the Royal Command is expected to take place on Sunday at Government House," said junta spokesman Palangoon Klaharn Friday.

The other main candidate has been former World Trade Organization chief and current head of the UN Conference on Trade and Development, Supachai Panitchpakdi, who has refused to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0072160

Whoever their choice, the generals have reserved the right in their interim constitution to sack him.

"The power is in reserve, as it were," said the permanent secretary of the foreign ministry, Krit Garnjana-Goonchorn.

The junta already plans to rename itself the Council for National Security and keep a close eye on the premier and his government.

"If things didn't work out the Council for National Security would not have to resort to non-peaceful means to effect change," Krit said, although adding he did not foresee any condition where they would have to use their power.

The coup, although welcomed by many Thais for ending months of political turmoil, has met with international condemnation.

The United States, Thailand's biggest trading partner and a close ally, on Thursday said it would cut 24 million dollars in military aid in protest.

"The United States continues to urge a rapid return to democratic rule and early elections in Thailand," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

Krit, of Thailand's foreign ministry, brushed off the measure, saying there was "no going back to square one" after decades of democracy.

Thailand's junta on Friday also announced a raft of promotions for military officers who backed last week's coup while sidelining Thaksin supporters.

The changes were announced in an annual reshuffle which had become a point of tension under Thaksin because of fears he was trying to cement his control over the armed forces by promoting loyalists.

A junta spokesman also said the military planned to withdraw tanks and troops from Bangkok by October 4 and hand over security operations to the police.

Surayud was in 1998 appointed the army's commander-in-chief and has been credited with professionalising the force that had been notorious for smuggling, political meddling and human rights abuses.

He retired in 2003, ending a 38-year military career, after he clashed with Thaksin, who had sidelined him to the less influential post of supreme commander.

Surayud then became a Buddhist monk for three months before joining the Privy Council, the inner circle of advisors to King Bhumipol Aduljadeh.

The general -- who has previously said the military should stay out of politics -- said Wednesday he would consider the job if offered to him, in part because he feared possible clashes between Thaksin supporters and opponents.

'We Complied With The Law' (NSWK)

By Sonia Kolesnikov-jessop

Newsweek, September 30, 2006

An executive at Singapore's state-owned investment firm discusses the deal that triggered Thailand's political crisis. The company line: don't blame us. WEB EXCLUSIVE

It was the deal that crystallized Thailand's anger. Last January, Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra sold his family telecommunications empire, Shin Corp., to Singapore's government-investment fund, Temasek. The price: $1.9 billion—a sum Thaksin's family pocketed tax-free. In hindsight, the deal was the beginning of the end for Thailand's tycoon-turned-prime minister, who was toppled in a military coup on Sept. 19. Yet the deal that brought him down remains an enigma—both for its complex structure and because Temasek stayed silent as Thailand's political crisis unfolded. During spring political protests in Bangkok, effigies of Temasek CEO Ho Ching were burnt in the streets. More recently, Thai regulators have focused on whether Temasek breached a 49 percent limit on foreign holdings in strategic industries and have been investigating whether some of the consortium companies served as proxies for Temasek to gain control of Shin Corp.

Now, however, the company has come forth with its side of the story. On Sept. 28, Temasek managing director for strategic development Jimmy Phoon revealed key aspects of the transaction that will have an impact on new investigations into Thaksin's alleged corruption. Two key details stand out: he says Temasek was not informed that the sale was structured so that the prime minister's family would avoid taxes, nor was payment made into offshore bank accounts, as has been reported. Phoon insists that Temasek's motivations were purely commercial, rejects the notion that Temasek ignored glaring political risks and bears no responsibility for the Thai crisis. He spoke with NEWSWEEK's Sonia Kolesnikov-Jessop in Singapore. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: Why did you buy Shin Corp.?

Jimmy Phoon: We felt it was a very well run company with sound fundamentals. We believe it's a very good investment that will give us good returns. Moreover, we partnered with reputable co-investors such as Siam Commercial Bank. Underlying the investment is our belief in Thailand's growth potential. In particular, if you look at the telecom industry, the growth will be driven not just by [Thailand's economy] but also by the growing size of the middle-income class.

DOJ_NMG_0072161

Who advised Temasek on the Shin Corp. deal?

Goldman Sachs was our international adviser and Hunton and Williams was our domestic advisor on the legal side. SCB Securities also advised us on the takeover offer in Thailand.

Did you receive any independent political risk analysis?

We did do political risk analysis as part of a detailed risk analysis, including industry risk and country risk. We are a long-term investor, and we invest purely on commercial grounds. Our investments are not predicated on which government is in power. We expect changes in environment to happen over time and we had factored in uncertainty as [we do] in all the investments that we make. There are always unforeseen developments.

Were you aware at the time of the deal that it was structured so that the seller would pay no taxes?

No, we were not aware of that. Our advisers were advising us on our side [of the transaction]. From our perspective, we've complied with all the laws and regulations in Thailand, and that's really what our advisers advised us about.

Government investigators in Bangkok suspect that Temasek-backed Thai investment company Kularb Kaew purchased Shin Corp. shares on its behalf, effectively raising Temasek's stake beyond the 49 percent legal limit. How do you respond?

We have not received any formal notification from the Ministry of Commerce regarding their review [of the sale]. Therefore it is not appropriate for us to comment. We've complied with all the laws and regulations and we will continue to cooperate fully with the authorities. We are confident that the outcome of the review by the Ministry of Commerce will be satisfactory as we complied with all laws. Currently, Temasek holds 41.7 percent of Shin Corp. directly through Aspen Holdings, while another 54.6 percent is held by Cedar Holdings, which is a joint venture by Temasek's Cypress Holdings, Siam Commercial Bank and Kularb Kaew. Importantly, the majority shareholder of Cedar is Kularb Kaew, which owns 45.2 percent and together with Siam Commercial Bank controls a majority of Cedar. Kularb Kaew was not a proxy for Temasek.

There's been speculation that you paid Thaksin's family for their stake in Shin Corp. in offshore accounts at the seller's request. Is that true?

This is incorrect. The transaction was done through the stock exchange of Thailand and fully paid for in Thailand. The money was paid in Thailand and there isn't any buyback arrangement plan whatsoever.

Temasek answers to its only shareholder, the Singapore government. How has your shareholder reacted to Shin Corp.'s troubles?

We are responsible to our investor to deliver an appropriate return. All investment decisions are made by the board of Temasek, and the government does not interfere with any decision. Let's be clear: Shin Corp remains a good investment not withstanding what has just happened. We are still invested in Shin Corp. and the underlying performance of [group] companies remains robust. Moreover, our overall portfolio is $81.1 billion [compared to] the Shin deal of $1.9 billion. It has to be looked at in that context.

Recently the Financial Times calculated that Temasek has suffered a paper loss of $820 million on Shin Corp. Is that accurate?

[They] may be quoting the difference in share price from the time when we made the investment and now, but it should be said that during that time the overall stock market in Thailand has also come down. What is very important for a long-term investor is to look at Shin Corp.'s underlying performance.

In view of the current political challenges, what's your investment strategy in Thailand going forward?

Our investment strategy in Thailand remains unchanged. We continue to believe in the long-term fundamentals of the economy, and Thailand fits in very well with our overall investment theme of investing in rising Asian economies and tapping opportunities created by a growing middle class. We see no reason why we should change our investment strategy there.

Does Temasek accept any blame whatsoever for contributing to the fall of Thailand's government?

Of course not!

What lessons have you learned from this experience?

We have invested in many different industries in many countries. We have to accept there will be changes in the [business] environment, the economy and the markets. That's part and parcel of being a long-term investor.

Russia-Georgia Tensions Concern Rumsfeld (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, concluding a visit to the Balkan region Friday, voiced concern to his Russian counterpart about growing tensions between Moscow and Georgia.

DOJ_NMG_0072162

"The thread of those discussions clearly was for there to be calm, and for those tensions to be eased down in a peaceful way," Rumsfeld said, when asked about the meeting at a briefing for reporters. He added that relationships between countries often ebb and flow, and "life goes on."

Russia has expressed worries about Georgia's efforts to gain membership in NATO, and the NATO ministers have been trying to calm the rift between the two countries.

Relations between Georgia and Russia became more strained in recent weeks; Georgia detained five Russian officers on spying charges. And an angry Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov called it a "bandit state" and threatened to send two divisions of troops to the border.

Rumsfeld, however, said that "NATO membership really is a decision for individual countries, not for countries other than the individual country."

Rumsfeld was leaving for home pleased with agreements that some two-dozen NATO defense ministers reached there to bolster the alliance's support of the war in Afghanistan.

He spent much of the week trying to drum up more support, resources and troops for the war on terror and the transfer of military control in Afghanistan to NATO.

In visits to Montenegro, Albania and the wide-ranging NATO defense ministers meeting in Slovenia, Rumsfeld urged leaders to provide more equipment and troops for the Afghanistan mission and to join in training in the war on terror.

In one of their key actions, the ministers approved a plan to extend NATO's military control across all of Afghanistan in the coming weeks. The move would put as many as 12,000 American troops under foreign battlefield command, a number that U.S. officials said could be the most since World War II.

Rumsfeld also broke his silence on the much-discussed classified U.S. intelligence report that concludes the terrorist threat to the U.S. has increased. He said efforts to judge whether the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have fueled terrorism would be futile.

And while he did not directly criticize the report, he said that intelligence documents in general can be uneven, and at times "flat wrong."

The National Intelligence Estimate concluded that Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists, who are growing in number and geographic reach. If the trend continues, the analysts said, the risks to the U.S. interests at home and abroad surely will grow.

"Are more terrorists being created in the world? We don't know," said Rumsfeld, adding that there aren't good ways to measure how many terrorists are being trained at camps around the world.

Rumsfeld, who was accompanied on the trip by his wife Joyce, also broke away from his NATO responsibilities for a few hours to indulge one of his passions — horses. He toured the Lipica Stud Farm, an historic resort in the scenic rolling hills near the Slovenia-Italy border, where Lippizaner horses have been bred and trained since 1580.

He took a horse-drawn carriage tour of the farm and watched riders train the horses — whose ancestors were rescued by U.S. Gen. George Patton in an infamous military operation during World War II.

Dispute Between Georgia, Russia Escalates (WP)

By Peter Finn, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Moscow Alleges Provocation as Court Extends Detention of Officers Facing Espionage Charges

TBILISI, Georgia, Sept. 29 -- A Georgian court on Friday ordered four Russian military intelligence officers to be held for two months on espionage charges in a pretrial detention center, a decision that could prolong and deepen the heated dispute over alleged spying here.

"Russia cannot comprehend this court ruling," Russian Vice Consul Viktor Kortenov told reporters after the court hearing, which was closed to the news media. "It is unclear why a Russian lawyer was not admitted to the proceedings."

Russia's ambassador to Georgia, Vyacheslav Kovalenko, left the country Friday after being recalled by his government to protest the arrest of the Russian officers. He departed with more than 80 diplomats and their families, who were flown home by two Russian Emergency Ministry planes. Russia advised its citizens not to travel to Georgia, citing safety reasons.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov, who held talks with ministers from the NATO alliance Friday in Slovenia, complained bitterly about Georgia's actions. Ivanov charged that Georgia was provoking a conflict to try to oust Russian forces from two breakaway parts of Georgia that pledge loyalty to Moscow.

Russia describes its forces in South Ossetia and Abkhazia as peacekeepers, but the Georgians assert that they are propping up illegitimate separatist governments that obtained de facto independence after defeating Georgian forces in the early 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0072163

"It is absolutely clear to us that Georgia has chosen the military route for settling the conflicts in Abkhazia and South Ossetia," Ivanov said after the NATO meeting. "All the rest follows from that." Georgia, he said, is making "appeals to the international community that Russia is to blame for everything, including the cold weather that hit Georgia last winter."

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld called on Russia and Georgia to exercise restraint, as did other defense ministers at the meeting. "The thread of those discussions clearly was for there to be calm, and for those tensions to be eased down in a peaceful way," Rumsfeld said.

NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer called for "moderation and de-escalation, and that goes for both parties."

In Moscow, police cordoned off the Georgian Embassy and arrested a small group of nationalists who held a brief protest outside the building. In Tbilisi, Georgian police continued to surround a Russian military headquarters where they say a fifth Russian officer facing spying charges is hiding.

At Friday's court session, 10 Georgian citizens alleged to have been working with the Russians were accused of high treason and ordered into pretrial detention. Georgian officials say that the Russian officers were gathering classified information on Georgia's cooperation with NATO.

Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili is determined to take Georgia, a former Soviet republic, into the Western military alliance, an ambition that infuriates Moscow. The military alliance agreed last week to step up discussions with Georgia on possible membership.

"NATO membership really is a decision for individual countries and not for countries other than the individual countries," Rumsfeld told reporters Friday.

Russian legislators continued to call for tough sanctions against Georgia. Yury Volkov, a deputy speaker of the lower house of the Russian parliament, said Russia should freeze bank accounts and suspend or annul business contracts with Georgia.

He didn't specify whether that could include cuts in energy supplies to Georgia, which imports Russian natural gas.

Spy Rift Has Roots In Separatist Feud (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

Georgia Hopes Arrests Get West to Help Push Russians Out of Breakaway Enclaves

Georgia's arrest this week of several Russian military officers is more than a run-of-the-mill case of alleged espionage, it is also an attempt to prompt quick international intervention to end Moscow's grip over separatist enclaves in Georgia, officials and diplomats familiar with the matter say.

The gambit is risky, however, in a volatile region where Russian and Western interests are clashing over expansion by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, energy pipelines and democratization. Georgia -- which fears it soon may lose the disputed territories permanently -- could succeed in provoking Russia, but fail in securing Western support. The European Union in particular is reluctant to confront Russia, a strategic supplier of oil and natural gas, in its backyard, officials say.

Western diplomats say they are sympathetic to Georgia's desire to end the status quo in its two separatist areas, Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which split from Georgia during the breakup of the former Soviet Union and have been under protection of Russian-led peacekeepers ever since. But Western diplomats say it has to be done prudently.

"There is a sense in Georgia that the international community is not supporting them enough, and for that reason, by taking spectacular actions of this kind, they can raise attention to their problems," said a senior European diplomat who deals closely with Georgia.

As Russia on Friday evacuated about 80 official personnel and their families from Georgia, the already-tense relationship between the two neighbors hit a new low. Russia said its citizens were at risk in the country, after Georgia on Wednesday arrested five Russian military officers on espionage charges. A court in Tbilisi, the Georgian capital, on Friday ordered that four of the officers and 10 Georgian nationals be held for two months. The fifth Russian officer was released, while Georgian police are pursuing a sixth who has taken refuge in Russia's military headquarters in Tbilisi.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov branded Georgia a "bandit state" and, at a NATO defense ministers' meeting in Slovenia Thursday night, demanded that NATO stop entertaining Georgia's attempts to join the Western military alliance. Russia told an emergency session of the United Nations Security Council Thursday that the arrests were a "dangerous" provocation by Georgia, while some Russian legislators warned darkly that Russia should use "any means" to get its soldiers back.

Denying in an interview that the arrests were designed to provoke Russia, Nino Burdzhanadze, the Georgian Parliament's powerful chairwoman, called the matter a "serious case." She said the interior ministry acted on information that the alleged spies were about to carry out an operation. While declining to describe the plot, she claimed it involved energy and noted that last winter the pipeline that supplies Georgia with Russian natural gas was blown up just inside Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0072164

Georgia is an increasingly important corridor for pipelines bringing gas and oil from the Caspian region to the West, skirting Russia and Iran. This year, a million-barrel-per-day oil pipeline started pumping crude from the Caspian Sea to Turkey's Mediterranean coast via Georgia. Later this year, a natural-gas pipeline will start operation. And last week, Western investors who own the oil terminal on Georgia's Black Sea coast formed a joint venture with Kazakhstan's national oil-and-gas company, KazMunaiGaz.

With European Union peacekeepers stretched from Lebanon to Afghanistan, and little willingness to anger Russia -- Europe's largest supplier of natural gas at a time of energy scarcity -- the Georgian strategy is "extremely risky," the European diplomat said. "There is not a whole lot of tolerance at this moment for more conflicts, particularly if they are seen as avoidable."

Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili last week said in a speech to the United Nations that he would ask Russian-led peacekeepers to leave the enclaves, to be replaced by the U.N., the EU or another international organization. The U.S. and European governments persuaded him not to specify a timetable, fearing an ultimatum would precipitate a crisis, according to European and Georgian officials involved.

A senior U.S. State Department official said that, while some countries have lost their appetite for getting involved there since a series of pro-Western governments swept to power in the region in recent years, the U.S. "absolutely and definitely" has not. However, even the U.S. -- which is less dependent on Russian energy than Europe -- has reason to avoid angering Russia. Moscow's support is critical, for example, in getting U.N. sanctions to pressure Iran to give up its nuclear-fuel program, a key U.S. foreign-policy goal.

Georgia, however, is in a hurry. Russian President Vladimir Putin has warned that if the West grants independence to Kosovo, the largely ethnic-Albanian province of Serbia, as expected next year, then Russia would consider it a precedent for the two Georgian enclaves and another in Moldova.

It isn't clear Moscow would act on its threat to recognize Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which could open a Pandora's box over the legitimacy of Russia's own borders. But separatists in Moldova recently voted in a referendum to unify with Russia, and South Ossetia is due to hold a referendum on independence next month.

"Of course Russian peacekeepers will stay there, whatever Georgia says," said Vyacheslav Nikonov, president of the Moscow think tank Politika Foundation, who has close ties to the Kremlin. Noting that the borders of the former Soviet republic were drawn by Stalin, he says, "Why is Stalin's will more important than the principle of self-determination?"

Russia's Nato Arms Claim Turns Up Heat In Georgia Dispute (FT)

By Fidelius Schmid In Portoroz

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

Russia on Friday raised the temperature of a simmering spy dispute with Georgia, accusing Nato member states of illegally supplying arms to the former Soviet republic.

Russian diplomats were on Friday being evacuated from Georgia – a day after Moscow recalled its ambassador – in response to the arrest this week of four Russian army officers, who faced a Tbilisi court on Friday accused of spying for Russian military intelligence. They were formally charged with espionage, which carries a maximum sentence of 10 years' imprisonment, and told they would be detained for at least a further two months.

After a tense meeting with Nato defence ministers in Slovenia, Sergei Ivanov, Russia's defence minister, accused eastern European members of the alliance of illegally selling Soviet-made arms to Georgia. "These Nato members are violating international practice," Mr Ivanov said. "This is a form of piracy."

Mr Ivanov declined to name the countries but referred to "the younger generation of Nato members", presumably meaning the seven former eastern bloc nations that joined Nato in 2004. According to Moscow, some of these countries sell on defence products ac-quired from Russia to Georgia, in breach of the original contracts with Russia.

According to diplomats, the Russian minister indignantly expressed his concerns over the affair to Nato ministers. After the meeting, Mr Ivanov said Georgia's arrest of the soldiers was an attempt to force his nation's troops out of the country so Georgian authorities could pursue a "military solution" to conflicts in the two pro-Russian breakaway provinces of South Ossetia and Abkhazia.

They said Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Nato's secretary-general, had told Mr Ivanov that arms sales to Georgia were not illegal, since there was no embargo. But they added that Nato ministers had urged that the dispute be handled calmly. "The thread of those discussions clearly was for there to be calm, and for those tensions to be eased down in a peaceful way," said Donald Rumsfeld, US defence secretary.

DOJ_NMG_0072165

Relations between Georgia and Moscow have been tense since the pro-western administration of President Mikheil Saakashvili took over from Eduard Shevardnadze in 2003.

Georgia is seeking to become a member of the 26-member alliance and last week received the green light to intensify its co-operation with Nato.

Moscow condemned this move as a throwback to the days of the cold war. Mr Ivanov even threatened last week to send Russian troops to the border with Georgia to ensure that "Russia's security won't be hurt if Georgia enters Nato". Mr Ivanov said on Friday there was no link between Georgia's aspirations for Nato membership and the current rift with Tbilisi.

Mr Rumsfeld insisted that Georgia was free to seek Nato membership. "Nato membership really is a decision for individual countries, not for countries other than the individual country," Mr Rumsfeld said.

Russia May Revise Georgia Troops Plan (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 30, 2006

Filed at 1:32 a.m. ET

TBILISI, Georgia (AP) -- Russia warned on Friday that its plans to close military bases in Georgia were in doubt and Georgia claimed Russia was moving troops near their shared border, as relations between the countries deteriorated in one of their worst crises since the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Tensions between Russia and Georgia, which have increased since pro-Western President Mikhail Saakashvili came to power in 2003, escalated after the arrest in Georgia on Wednesday of four Russian military officers accused of spying.

Russia has recalled its ambassador, evacuated some diplomats and their families and issued a formal protest to the United Nations. Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov has denounced Georgia as a "bandit" state.

Georgia on Friday accused Russia of redeploying additional troops closer to the border and said the Russian Black Sea fleet was expected to start maneuvers in the next few days. "I would advise our colleagues to stop saber-rattling. "This is unacceptable for a democratic country and we don't understand that," Interior Minister Vano Merabishvili told reporters.

Since gaining power in the Rose Revolution, Saakashvili has pledged to move the country out of Russia's orbit, take control of breakaway provinces of Abkhazia and South Ossetia and join NATO in 2008. Georgia's pro-Western course has vexed the Kremlin, and Georgian authorities accused Russia of backing separatists.

Tbilisi courts on Friday ordered the four Russian officers remanded in custody for two months, Anzor Khvadagiani, a Tbilisi prosecutor, told The Associated Press. A fifth serviceman also arrested Wednesday was released the next day for lack of evidence. The courts also extended the arrest of 10 Georgian citizens accused of involvement in a Russian spy ring.

Georgian Defense Minister Irakly Okruashvili said on Imedi television late Friday that the detained Russian officers could be returned to Russia. "I don't exclude such a possibility," Okruashvili said.

At the United Nations, the United States late Friday proposed major changes to a Russian statement expressing "deep concerns" about Georgia's actions. The U.S. did not publicly disclose the proposed changes but Russia's U.N. Mission said "the American proposals and amendments change the nature of the draft ... and that makes the acceptance of the presidential statement impossible."

Gen. Andrei Popov, commander of Russian military forces in Georgia, said Russia's obligation to close its two remaining military bases in Georgia by the end of 2008 still stands, but added that "if our servicemen are arrested and put in custody, there will be problems with the withdrawal since there will be no people left to prepare weapons for the pullout," the Interfax news agency reported.

Popov's spokesman, Col. Vladimir Kuparadze, confirmed his statement.

Russia has between 3,000 and 4,000 troops at its two military bases in Georgia proper, and 2,500 peacekeepers deployed to separatist regions of Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

Ivanov, meeting Friday with NATO members in Slovenia, said the arrests were aimed at pushing Russian troops out of Georgia so the government could seize control of the breakaway provinces by force, and he accused unnamed newer NATO members of illegally supplying Georgia with Soviet-made weapons.

"It is absolutely clear to us that Georgia has chosen the military path, the forceful path, for resolving the conflicts in South Ossetia and Abkhazia," he said, adding that Georgia's actions were "to push Russian peacekeepers out by any means possible ... and then to submit an application to join NATO."

Two Russian planes, meanwhile, evacuated 84 diplomats and their relatives from Georgia, officials said. The Russian ambassador to Georgia, Vyacheslav Kovalenko, said after returning to Moscow that families of all Russian military in Georgia also will depart, Interfax reported.

DOJ_NMG_0072166

Georgian police surrounded the Russian military headquarters in Tbilisi on Friday, hoping to detain another Russian officer accused of spying. Russia has refused to surrender the officer.

In Moscow, police blocked streets around the Georgian Embassy. They allowed some 20 nationalists to protest briefly against Georgia's president before detaining them for holding an unsanctioned rally.

Russia's ultranationalist leader Vladimir Zhirinovsky called on Friday for "the most resolute action, up to the deployment of forces and air raids." A Kremlin-connected lawmaker, Konstantin Kosachev, said Moscow would not yield to what he called Georgia's provocation and stressed that "any forceful measures are absolutely excluded."

Separately, an official in South Ossetia claimed that masked Georgian officers shot out the tires of a car carrying four Russian peacekeepers, a woman and a child Thursday night, then ordered the men out and beat them. One peacekeeper sustained a fractured skull, according to the internationally unrecognized South Ossetian government, and Ivanov said there was proof they were "brutally beaten."

Georgian officials denied the allegations, saying police stopped a car with Russian peacekeepers, checked their documents and released them.

Russia's Foreign Ministry advised its citizens to refrain from traveling to Georgia, citing security concerns, and its embassy in Tbilisi stopped issuing visas to Georgian citizens.

Saakashvili denounced the moves as hysteria.

NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer called for "moderation and de-escalation, and that goes for both parties," and a U.S. State Department official said both sides had to work toward a solution.

Matthew J. Bryza, in Berlin for diplomatic consultations on Abkhazia, also told journalists that "Georgia has expressed its sovereign view ... that it doesn't want Russian peacekeepers on its territory. There is a question of what is prudent, and what is the most effective way of asserting that right in the case of Tbilisi."

In Russia, Psychiatry Is Again A Tool Against Dissent (WP)

By Peter Finn, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

DUBNA, Russia -- On March 23, police and emergency medical personnel stormed Marina Trutko's home, breaking down her apartment door and quickly subduing her with an injection of haloperidol, a powerful tranquilizer. One policeman put her 78-year-old mother, Valentina, in a storage closet while Trutko, 42, was carried out to a waiting ambulance. It took her to the nearby Psychiatric Hospital No. 14.

The former nuclear scientist, a vocal activist and public defender for several years in this city 70 miles north of Moscow, spent the next six weeks undergoing a daily regimen of injections and drugs to treat what was diagnosed as a "paranoid personality disorder."

"She is also very rude," psychiatrists noted in her case file.

In person, Trutko presents a different profile, reserved and formal as she recounts her legal and psychiatric ordeal and invokes the minutiae of Russian law without having to refer to texts. An independent evaluation found that although she did not have an "ordinary personality," she was "very gifted and creative" and displayed no psychiatric symptoms.

Trutko is new evidence that Soviet-style forced psychiatry has reemerged in Russia as a weapon to intimidate or discredit citizens who tangle with the authorities, according to human rights activists and some mental health professionals. Despite major reforms in the early 1990s, some officials are again employing this form of repression.

"Abuse has begun to creep back in, and we're seeing more cases," said Lyubov Vinogradova, executive director of the Independent Psychiatric Association of Russia, an advocacy group. "It's not on a mass scale like in Soviet times, but it's worrying."

In those years, tens of thousands of dissidents were wrongfully subjected to forced hospitalization, sometimes for years, based on trumped-up diagnoses of "schizophrenia." Dissidents were said to exhibit inflexibility of convictions and nervous exhaustion brought on by anti-government activities. "Reformist delusions," the Soviets called it. If you were against communism, in other words, you were insane.

Some of the new cases have been abetted by institutions or doctors involved in it in the Soviet period. Trutko, who is originally from Uzbekistan, was diagnosed at the Serbsky Institute for Social and Forensic Psychiatry in Moscow, one of the most infamous of the Soviet institutions that imprisoned dissidents. It remains a secretive institution that has never faced up to its repressive past, according to human rights groups.

As recently as 2001, the institute's director, Tatyana Dmitriyeva, denied that the Soviet Union engaged in any more psychiatric abuse than Western countries, according to the report "Human Rights and Psychiatry in the Russian Federation" by the Moscow Helsinki Group.

DOJ_NMG_0072167

One of signatures on Trutko's official evaluation, which declared she had paranoid personality disorder, is that of Yakob Landau, a longtime Serbsky psychiatrist who headed the institute's notorious Unit No. 4 during Soviet days.

Officials at the institute, a walled and forbidding complex in central Moscow, said no one was available to comment for this article. Investigators in Trutko's case declined to comment.

The charge that psychiatry is again being abused is not universally accepted within the profession. "The problem of forced treatment or psychiatric persecution existed more than 20 years ago, but it was solved. And since then I haven't heard of any case of forced psychiatric examination or treatment," said Vladimir Rotstein, president of Public Initiative on Psychiatry, an advocacy group.

The Independent Psychiatric Association, however, says that the number of activists being wrongfully hospitalized in mental facilities totals dozens of cases in recent years and is increasing. Doctors and the courts are complicit with investigators who insist on a forced psychiatric evaluation or treatment, it says. Activists have also documented an increase of family or business disputes in which wrongful hospitalization provides an opening to seize a person's property, Vinogradova said.

Most of the targeted activists are not affiliated with major human rights groups. Rather, like Trutko, they are stubborn gadflies who are involved in long-running feuds with local authorities. Their sometimes intemperate complaints against authorities are used to open criminal investigations for slander. This allows authorities to seek hospitalization. Unlike Soviet dissidents, these activists are put away for relatively short periods of a week to several months.

Roman Lukin, a businessman in the Volga River city of Cheboksary, was hospitalized last year for "unexplainable behavior" after he held up a sign on a public square calling three judges "creeps." Seeking redress for a bad debt that ruined him, Lukin felt he had not received justice from the courts. He spent two weeks in the local psychiatric hospital, which recommended that he undergo further examination at a specialized clinic in Moscow for possible "paranoid personality disorder." Independent Psychiatric Association specialists evaluated Lukin and found no sign of mental illness.

Nikolai Skachkov, who protested police brutality and official corruption in the Omsk region of Siberia, was ordered to undergo a psychiatric evaluation last year because investigators said they suspected he was suffering from "an acute sense of justice." He spent six months in a closed psychiatric facility where he was diagnosed as paranoid. The association, which conducted a separate evaluation earlier this year, found that he was healthy.

"Psychiatry in this country has always been a tool of the authorities, a tool for managing people and pressuring people. And it still is," said Boris Panteleyev, head of the St. Petersburg Committee for Human Rights.

In an interview in her apartment, Trutko recounted her own long run-in. "Now I have this stamp on my forehead that I am a psychiatric patient," she said. "I will always have this medical record now. That means I cannot go to court because judges say I'm a psycho and call for an ambulance."

Trutko is well known in the courts in this town, having argued dozens of court cases against the local authorities and police. She is studying to be a lawyer, and for several years has acted as a public defender, as advocates without law degrees are called here.

Her troubles with mental health authorities began four years ago in a courtroom in Dmitrov, about 35 miles from Dubna.

Trutko asserted that the judge displayed bias against her client in a property dispute, and she moved to have the judge withdrawn. She also complained that the judge was not wearing her robe as required and that the Russian flag was improperly displayed. The judge, who later left the bench and could not be reached for comment, alleged that Trutko said, "Look at that fat pig sitting up there," according to legal papers.

Prosecutors opened a criminal case against Trutko on charges of contempt of court. In July 2003, the court ordered Trutko to undergo an involuntary psychiatric evaluation. Psychiatrists at the hospital said she was uncooperative, illogical and displayed emotional reactions that were "not adequate" -- a common phrase here for mental illness.

The Independent Psychiatric Association questioned these conclusions. Its own evaluation of her, conducted by four psychiatrists, found that "she is not an ordinary personality, but a very gifted and creative person. . . . No psychiatric symptoms were observed. She shows high intellectual ability and good memory. She does not need any treatment."

Trutko continued to battle the criminal complaint in court. Before a hearing at the higher Moscow regional court, she filed a motion seeking the removal of a panel of judges from her case, again asserting bias. In this case there was no claim of verbal abuse, but prosecutors said her motion amounted to slander and contempt.

In April 2004, after leaving a hearing on her case in Moscow, Trutko was detained by investigators and taken to the Serbsky Institute. It was a Friday evening when she was admitted and there was no expert commission available to evaluate her, Trutko said. Human rights groups protested her detention and threatened legal action. Trutko said she was released the following Tuesday morning without having undergone any formal examination by psychiatrists.

But the institute issued a six-page evaluation that said she suffered from a "paranoid personality disorder." The condition manifested itself in her "subjectivity," her "tendencies to verbal aggression," her "suspicious" personality and her "inability to understand the peculiarities of interpersonal relations and communication," medical records show.

The report recommended that she undergo forced hospitalization and treatment.

In September 2004, a Moscow court approved that approach. But the authorities, for reasons that remain unclear, did not act on the order until they stormed Trutko's apartment earlier this year.

Despite her subsequent release, Trutko said, the court order remains in effect and she could be institutionalized again at any time. "My career is ruined," she said. "I just stay at home."

Russia's Titans Of Energy Prepare For Acquisitions (WSJ)

By GREGORY L. WHITE

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

MOSCOW -- Russia's state-controlled energy giants are gearing up for a new round of acquisitions that could give the Kremlin ownership of nearly half the country's oil production, the highest level since privatization of the Soviet industry began more than a decade ago.

Industry executives and others close to the situation say state oil company OAO Rosneft is seeking at least several billion dollars of financing to buy many of the remaining assets of OAO Yukos at state-mandated bankruptcy auctions in coming months. OAO Gazprom, the majority state-owned natural-gas giant, this week said it would be interested in buying out the Russian partners who now hold half of TNK-BP Ltd., a joint venture with BP PLC that is the third-largest oil producer in Russia.

TNK-BP's main Russian shareholders -- tycoons Mikhail Fridman, Viktor Vekselberg and Len Blavatnik -- haven't expressed a public desire to sell and company officials insist they continue to behave as committed long-term investors. But several people familiar with their thinking say that if the Kremlin were to indicate a desire for them to sell, they would likely agree as long as the price were reasonably fair.

Since it crushed Yukos with back-tax claims starting in 2003, the Kremlin has steadily reasserted control over the energy sector. While the growing state ownership is popular in Russia, pro-market government officials and analysts warn that it is likely to reduce efficiency and raise doubts about the outlook for production growth in the world's No. 2 oil-exporting country behind Saudi Arabia.

The current terms of the agreement between TNK-BP's Russian shareholders and BP requires the consent of both sides for any sale before the end of next year. But given the importance of maintaining good relations with the government here, BP would likely agree to a Kremlin-supported deal, according to people close to the company.

There are no discussions on a deal with Gazprom under way at the moment, however, and no deal is likely before next year, according to people close to the companies. But Alexander Ryazanov, the chief executive officer of Gazprom's oil unit, on Thursday said his company would be interested in buying the TNK-BP stake were it to come up for sale. He said it would be "no problem" for Gazprom to raise the money needed, which could be as much as $25 billion.

People close to the companies said his comments are partly an attempt to warn off potential rival bidders, especially Rosneft. In July, BP spent $1 billion to buy shares in Rosneft's initial public offering, helping the Kremlin meet its price target for the politically important issue.

People close to BP said the company might prefer working with Rosneft, which is much less bureaucratic and more business-oriented than Gazprom. But having ties with both state companies could also be an asset.

A deal with Gazprom, for example, might help unlock TNK-BP's massive Kovykta gas project in Eastern Siberia. That development has largely been blocked by Gazprom to date, and regulators are threatening to revoke the license to the project.

But one person close to Rosneft said that company isn't interested in TNK-BP's portfolio of largely older assets. A few newer TNK-BP projects in East Siberia might be of interest were they up for sale, this person said.

Rosneft's current focus, according to people close to the company, is the remaining assets of Yukos due to be auctioned in the next few months. Rosneft already bought Yukos's biggest unit after a controversial government auction in December 2004. Next to come on the block are two big oil-production units, as well as several refineries and regional marketing networks. Rosneft is said to be particularly interested in the profitable refining and marketing assets. Yukos's bankruptcy administrator will select a company in mid-October to value the assets before sale.

But Rosneft could face competition in the auctions from Gazprom, as well as Russia's big remaining private oil companies, OAO Lukoil and OAO Surgutneftegaz. Foreign companies aren't expected to participate. Rosneft has something of an advantage in the process, because it has about $5 billion of claims against Yukos already included in the bankruptcy proceedings and several billion more awaiting confirmation by a court.

U.N. Says Israel Blocked Investigators (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 30, 2006

Israel refused to give a U.N.-appointed investigation access to the officials who may have been responsible for the bombing of an observation post that killed four unarmed peacekeepers at the height of the conflict with Hezbollah, the United Nations said Friday.

Israel said the bombing of the U.N. peacekeeping post along the Israeli-Lebanese border was a mistake that occurred at the "operational level." The U.N. panel investigating the killings was not allowed to interview commanders at that level to determine what happened, U.N. spokesman Stephane Dujarric said in a statement.

The statement was delivered shortly after the Board of Inquiry investigating the attack submitted a confidential report with its findings to the U.N. and to the four nations whose observers were killed — Austria, Canada, China and Finland. The report was not sent to Israel.

Dujarric's statement said it concluded that there was nothing else the United Nations could have done "that would have changed the outcome."

The four observers were killed by an Israeli precision-guided bomb that destroyed the bunker where they took shelter after their observation post near the town of Khiam came under heavy fire. U.N. officials in New York and Lebanon had repeatedly warned Israel that the observation post, built 30 years before, was under attack.

Because of Israel's refusal, the inquiry was "unable to determine why the attacks on the U.N. position were not halted despite repeated demarches to the Israeli authorities from U.N. personnel, both in the field and at headquarters," Dujarric said.

Israel has blamed inaccurate maps for its mistake, and said the airplane that dropped the bomb thought it was targeting Hezbollah. Hezbollah was active in the area, with a post about 150 yards away.

Asked to comment on Dujarric's statement, the spokeswoman for Israel's U.N. mission, Anat Friedman, said: "Israel has expressed its regret for the unfortunate event and has investigated the tragic incident."

Friedman refused to comment on the U.N. claim that the investigators had not been allowed to interview some officials.

A U.N. official said Israel never sufficiently explained why it kept bombing the base.

"We do not have a satisfactory answer as to why those attempts failed," said the official, who spoke anonymously because the report was confidential. "The Israelis are fully aware of our position on this incident."

The official said there was nothing in the Board of Inquiry's findings to contradict U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan's earlier claim that the attack was "apparently deliberate."

The Man Who Would Be Kofi (TIME)

South Korea's quiet 'harmonizer' Ban Ki-Moon leads the race to lead the U.N.

The lowest point of South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon's two-year tenure came in June 2004, when a Korean translator working in Iraq was captured and beheaded on video by insurgents. The brutal act enraged the South Korean public, many of whom opposed the planned dispatch of further Korean troops to Iraq, and much of that anger was directed squarely at Ban and the Foreign Ministry. Taxis in Seoul refused to pick up foreign service officers, and there were public calls for Ban's resignation. But instead of panicking, Ban calmly announced that he would be reassessing the ministry, eventually adding a 24-hour telephone hotline that South Koreans abroad could call if they needed help. The rage dissipated, Ban has gone on to become one of South Korea's most respected foreign ministers — and Korean soldiers still made it to Iraq, much to the satisfaction of their U.S. allies

It was a trademark performance by the man who calls himself a "harmonizer" — quiet but effective. Now Ban, a Harvard-educated diplomat who has served his country for 36 years in New Delhi, Washington and at the United Nations, may face the ultimate diplomatic challenge. After winning Thursday's most recent straw U.N. Security Council straw poll, Ban has solidified his status as the front-runner in the race to replace Secretary-General Kofi Annan, who is required to step down after completing his second term in the job at the end of 2006. If Ban wins — a big if, given the unpredictable politics of Secretary-General races — he'd be the first Asian to lead the U.N. since the Burmese diplomat U Thant in the 1960s. And it would be a big win for South Korea, which in many ways is the U.N.'s best success story, fighting off a North Korean invasion and rising from the ashes of war to become one of the world's most vibrant economies, all with significant help from the U.N. That explains why South Korea's normally contentious politicians — fistfights between opposing parties are not uncommon in the country's parliament — have united behind Ban's candidacy.

It helps as well that the soft-spoken and French-fluent minister seems incapable of making enemies. Though relations between South Korea and Japan are worse today than they have been in decades, Japanese diplomats generally like the 62-year-old Ban himself. That matters, as Japan is currently holds one of the 10 rotating seats on the Security Council. Ban has also received enthusiastic support from Australia. But the deciding vote will likely be cast by China, one of the Council's five veto-wielding permanent members. If the South Korean is viewed by Beijing as too close to Washington, he may find China cool to his candidacy. Ironically, however, there's also a danger that South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun's rocky relationship with Washington could cool U.S. support for Ban. Another drawback is his lack of international stature. Ban's highest-profile role has been in the Six-Party talks to defuse North Korea's nuclear ambitions, which ultimately yielded almost nothing — although that frustrating experience could be good practice for life in the U.N. But in a race typically won by the candidate most widely viewed as least objectionable, the collegial South Korean is clearly a frontrunner.

The Best Intentions: Kofi Annan and the UN in the Era of American World Power

by James Traub

Bloomsbury £20, 464 pages

Kofi Annan is likely to be remembered as one of the most significant secretary-generals in United Nations history, yet remarkably little is known about the quiet Ghanaian. A global figure who still appears uncomfortable in the public gaze, he remains mysterious even to many near him.

James Traub's The Best Intentions goes some way towards revealing the personality of this lifetime UN man. As secretary-general since 1997, Annan has served in a period of extraordinary upheaval and expansion for the world body, and has come to symbolise its unique position as the US and the rest of the world struggle to define a new international system.

From mid-2004, the New York Times magazine journalist spent more than a year following the secretary-general and his entourage. Fresh from the UN's agonies over the war in Iraq, Annan - who won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2001 - found himself under attack for his management, and faced allegations of abuse of power over Iraq's oil-for-food programme.

The soft-spoken bureaucrat's natural inclination is to conciliate rather than fight. Traub tells how Annan lost his voice, and for a period almost disappeared. Then he returned to strength to advocate one of the UN's most ambitious reform processes - albeit with limited results.

Annan appears set to leave office this year with a well-documented bang. For the UN's critics, and those with questions about his personal conduct over oil-for-food, Traub's book, the first of this crop, will disappoint.

Traub tends to give Annan the benefit of the doubt over questions surrounding his son. He focuses more on his and the institution's response to mounting US pressure, and what it revealed about the UN's systematic flaws. He does little to explore unanswered questions about possible wrongdoing.

Yet those who imagined Traub would defend Annan on all counts are in for a surprise. This book offers a tough appraisal of his record, and leaves even a sympathetic reader with an uneasy impression that there may be rather less to Annan than they imagined.

On Bosnia and Rwanda, referring to Annan's time as head of peacekeeping, Traub is unforgiving. On Srebrenica he writes: "I asked if he felt, in retrospect, that he and his colleagues had refused to look the truth in the eye... and he said: 'We had to rely on the commanders on the ground. They made judgements...'" Traub describes this as "a surprisingly impersonal and guilt-free answer".

On Rwanda, Annan "paused, and thought, and paused a bit more. 'In retrospect', he finally said, '...we should have used the media more aggressively, and exposed the situation for them to see. Of course, at that time this organisation was media shy.' And that was it."

Later, when Annan was persuaded to usher in a new team at the height of the oil-for-food crisis, Traub says his horror of confrontation, "his cowardice, really", first postponed, then "unnecessarily exacerbated" the pain of removing confidante Elizabeth Lindenmayer.

The tales are not all so harsh. Annan emerges as a basically decent man tested by events that the best of us would struggle to survive. But such asides are striking from a journalist not tainted with the "right-wing" tag of the UN's harshest American detractors.

Traub's book is about much more than Annan. It is about the post cold-war rise of the US, its growing disaffection with multilateralism, and the UN's painstaking efforts to bring it back into the fold. One wonderful chapter, "Romancing Cousin Jesse", describes the courting and semi-conversion of Senator Helms, a UN critic, as Team Annan desperately tried to get Washington to pay its arrears. As he left a lunch with leading UN lights, "the senator was heard to murmur, 'Ah've met a lot o'nahce people'," Traub says.

Despite his analysis of US-UN relations and attempts to inject UN reform efforts with drama, it is the character portraits that demand most attention. Former political chief Kieran Prendergast is deliciously savage about the shifts around him; comments by and about UN number two Mark Malloch Brown, and Shashi Tharoor, the "splendiferous" secretary-general aspirant now heading the information department, show how the place ticks.

Traub is both sympathetic and deeply critical - a reaction familiar to anyone who knows the UN well. "I liked the people around Annan," he confesses. They were mainly "highly intelligent people who had seen a great many things" and "who believed deeply in the UN's mission, no matter how acutely aware they were of its failures."

Eurozone Enjoys 'Goldilocks' Recovery (FT)

By Ralph Atkins In Frankfurt

Financial Times, September 30, 2006

The eurozone economy is for now enjoying a "Goldilocks" recovery – not too hot, not too cold. Inflation has fallen to the lowest for more than two years, while business and consumer confidence has soared to a fresh five-year high, official figures indicated on Friday.

Tumbling energy prices led to eurozone inflation falling from an annual rate of 2.3 per cent in August to 1.8 per cent in September, according to Eurostat, the European Union's statistical union. That was the lowest since March 2004 and the first time since January 2005 that inflation has been within the European Central Bank's target range – "below but close" to 2 per cent.

The drop creates a presentational challenge for the ECB, which is expected to raise its main interest rate by another quarter percentage point, to 3.25 per cent, at a meeting in Paris next week. The ECB will probably cite the volatility of monthly figures, and longer-term inflationary pressures – including those from a faster-growing economy. A three percentage point rise in German VAT in January, will also push inflation higher.

Separately, a European Commission survey suggested robust growth in the eurozone, which exceeded the US in the second quarter, was continuing. The institution's "economic sentiment" index, covering businesses and consumers, leapt from 108.3 in August to 109.3 in September – the highest since February 2001.

"The eurozone is enjoying a resilient and broad-based economic upswing that is not generating any major inflationary tensions," said Holger Schmieding, economist at Bank of America. Italy saw a particularly sharp rise in confidence, taking its index to the highest since June 2000.

However, economists fear fiscal tightening in Germany and Italy, a possible slowdown in the US and a stronger euro could soon spoil the current upbeat mood.

"It is a Goldilocks situation, I agree. The question is what happens next year," said Dirk Schumacher, economist at Goldman Sachs.

A reminder of the eurozone's weak spots came from German data that showed the country's consumers were still failing to spring to life – in spite of the economic upswing. German retail sales were unchanged in August after a 0.8 per cent fall in the previous month, according to the Federal Statistics Office.

In sharp contrast, French consumers' spending on manufactured goods leapt 3.3 per cent in August.

The poor summer weather in August, after an exceptionally hot July, had been expected to encourage more people into the shops. Germans were also expected to step up purchases to beat the VAT rise.

But economists stuck to the view that this year would bring some overall improvement. With energy prices falling and the VAT increase looming, "strong retail sales can be expected over the final months of this year, before January brings a serious slump," said Ralph Solveen, economist at Commerzbank.

Separately, France reported an unexpected rise in unemployment in August. The jobless rate rose to 9.0 per cent in August from 8.9 per cent in July.

'Liberal' Europe? (WSJ)

By Matthew Kaminski

The Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2006

LYON, France -- To get a measure of where things stand in the battle of ideas in Europe today, one can do worse than check out the "summer university" put on by the Continent's center-right parties here last weekend. I found myself on a panel to discuss globalization and offered that conservatives might do well -- at the voting booth and otherwise -- to push free trade, liberalize markets, rein in farm subsidies and keep Europe's door open to Turkey. Nothing controversial for this crowd, I assumed, with the possible exception of the last.

The reality check arrived from a German Christian Democrat. "For us, a human being is not only a function of production," he lectured from the floor. "Our voters are not signing up to . . . your neoliberal, neoconservative agenda." (Jeesh, I hadn't even mentioned Iraq.) A senior European executive sitting nearby passed a note, "Please tell him one can be Christian and Democratic and liberal."

Maybe so. Yet the German politician served up a good reminder that conservatism doesn't necessarily mean the same thing on this side of the Atlantic. In Europe's biggest country, as well as in France, right-wing rulers remain wedded to the nanny state -- which emerged with Bismarck -- and to close alliances with guilds and big business that tend to stifle competition. In her day, Margaret Thatcher never felt welcome on the Continent.

A lot has changed since the Iron Lady resided at 10 Downing Street. In spite of some recent victories for the dirigistes, the momentum is with free-market ideas, thanks in part to formerly communist Central Europe, whose zest for capitalism proved infectious back West.

Imagine an arc that starts with Spain, where former conservative Prime Minister José María Aznar planted strong reform roots, which the ruling Socialists haven't strayed from. Continue to Britain and Labour's Tony Blair, who embraced Thatcherism. Then come the Nordic countries that, despite their reputation as welfare utopias, implemented innovative policies to revive stagnant economies. Swedes can use vouchers for schools and other public services; the country dropped the death tax and partially privatized pensions. (Take note, GOP strategists.) Next week a new center-right government comes into office in Stockholm with a pledge to cut taxes, privatize companies and hospitals, and end political control over universities.

Alas, the story line shifts dramatically in the heart of Europe -- France and Germany. On the American spectrum, the nominally conservative politicians who lead both countries would be found somewhere left of the Democrats. German Chancellor Angela Merkel last year failed to win a clear mandate, forcing her into a "grand coalition" with the Social Democrats. With this unwieldy government in place, economic reform has gone nowhere. And even so, her Christian Democratic electoral platform was a hodge-podge, calling for a flat tax as well as a large hike in the VAT. (No prize for guessing which was implemented.) The center-right has been burned in two consecutive elections; many members blame their association with unpopular free-market policies.

The ruling Gaullists in France are even more unabashedly statist than the German right. With his recent success in saving Europe's farm subsidies, keeping Chinese T-shirts out of stores and Polish plumbers and other workers from crossing borders, blocking pan-European takeovers -- the list goes on -- President Jacques Chirac is arguably the greatest champion of what Americans might call leftist policies in Europe. His prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, this year made "economic patriotism" the fig leaf du jour for protectionism of all kinds.

Yet the campaign for next year's presidential elections is livening up the French debate. The leading candidate on the right, Nicolas Sarkozy, wants a break with the Gaullists. Mr. Sarkozy mocks the idea of a French "social model," saying it's neither social (what with chronic unemployment) nor a model (who wants to copy it?). Where Mr. Chirac represents the status quo, Mr. Sarkozy says France must move with the times, citing Britain and America as examples. "Sarkozy has decided to create a quasi-cultural revolution in this country by shooting down the myths, the phony 'consensus' that we have had," says Pierre Lellouche, a French MP and Sarkozy adviser. "For the first time the right is becoming right again." On the left, Ségolène Royal also challenges Socialist shibboleths by praising Blairism and saying globalization isn't all bad.

By next spring France is sure to see a generational change. But don't set hopes too high for one of ideas as well, says Alain Madelin, the country's most prominent laissez-faire politician. The Socialist old guard detests Ms. Royal. Mr. Sarkozy may be "pro-business" or "for lower taxes," but Mr. Madelin asks: "Does Sarkozy understand the mechanism of the market? No. His instinct is to intervene." And free-market ideas don't sell well on election day, says Mr. Madelin, who should know. He won 3.91% in the 2002 presidential vote.

Traditional labels, smudged elsewhere these days, are even less helpful to understanding politics in Europe. Best to set aside the old straight left-right line. Mr. Madelin suggests a return to the triangle used in the 19th century with conservatives, socialists and liberals (or free-marketers) at each point. The liberals are gaining in strength but have found, and need, supporters in both camps.

It can be confusing and surprising; the great intangible seems to be the quality of leadership, of which Europe hasn't had a surfeit in recent years. So Italy's Romano Prodi, leading a center-left coalition since spring, in the early days has proved far more audacious in prying open his country to competition than his predecessor, the "pro-free market" media tycoon Silvio Berlusconi, was in five years in power. The imminent departure of the conservative Mr. Chirac -- no matter who wins -- looks likely to boost liberal economic ideas.

Yes, the battle is raging and its outcome far from decided.

Security Council To Get Resolution On Myanmar (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council held its first official meeting to discuss Myanmar on Friday, and the United States announced that it was preparing a resolution to pressure the regime to release political prisoners and stop flows of drugs, AIDS and refugees that Washington says are destabilizing the region.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton pushed hard to get Myanmar on the council's agenda despite objections from several quarters, and eased the way with unofficial briefings on an impending humanitarian crisis there.

Bolton said he overcame resistance from China and Russia, who believe Myanmar does not pose a grave threat to the international order; U.N. officials who have been working quietly behind the scenes to win the confidence of the country's rulers; and European allies "who thought it wasn't a priority."

"We didn't put this issue on the agenda just to have briefings," said Bolton, adding that the U.S. would present the resolution "in the very near future."

The U.N.'s chief of political affairs, Ibrahim Gambari, briefed the council on humanitarian problems in the country of 55 million and announced that he would make a second trip there soon to talk to the military regime about restoring political freedom and democracy.

Myanmar refused overtures from the U.N.'s special envoy for two years, but finally received Gambari in May. He said the country has made "measured progress" on public health and is developing a national action plan on HIV/AIDS.

Gambari argued for a careful approach that would not undo incremental progress by the reclusive regime. "We cannot simply assume that turning up the heat will yield results," he said. "Nor can engagement be an end by itself. It should lead to meaningful results."

Myanmar's foreign minister criticized the Security Council in a speech at the U.N. on Tuesday for treating his country like a threat, and he said the Southeast Asian nation has been implementing a seven-step road map to democracy.

"Myanmar has done nothing that can undermine the peace and security of any country, let alone regional or international peace and security," Foreign Minister Nyan Win said in a speech to the General Assembly.

The military has run Myanmar under various guises since 1962, and the current group of generals has been in power since 1988.

Aung San Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy won a landslide election victory in 1990 but was denied power by the junta.

Myanmar, formerly known as Burma, has become a popular political cause in the United States. Suu Kyi, its charismatic opposition leader who won the Nobel Peace Prize and has been under house arrest on and off for two decades, has helped galvanize world support for democratic reforms. First Lady Laura Bush was the host of a round table on the issue last week during the General Assembly meeting.

Rival To Panama Canal Planned (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 30, 2006

Nicaragua intends to spend $20 billion on a new Central American waterway that was initially proposed in the 19th century.

MEXICO CITY — Seeking to cash in on booming Asian exports, Nicaragua will announce a $20-billion proposal next week to build a canal linking the Pacific and the Atlantic oceans that would accommodate ships too large to use the Panama Canal, Nicaraguan officials said Friday.

If approved by Nicaragua's Congress, the project would be a joint public-private venture financed by unnamed investors, said Lindolfo Monjarretz, a spokesman for Nicaraguan President Enrique Bolanos.

The Grand Inter-Oceanic Nicaragua Canal would make use of the 60-mile-wide Lake Nicaragua and follow at least part of a route first proposed by American and European entrepreneurs in the 19th century, officials said.

"We will have a deeper draft than the Panama Canal and reach a different market than Panama," Monjarretz said in a telephone interview. "The construction of the canal … will be pushed forward by Nicaragua because it's necessary for global trade."

The official announcement will come Monday, when Nicaragua plays host to a summit of Western Hemisphere defense ministers, including U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Monjarretz said.

With the century-old Panama Canal expected to soon reach the limit of its capacity, a boom in Asian commerce is fueling several proposals for new projects to ship containers across the Central American isthmus.

The Panama Canal, opened in 1914, cannot accommodate vessels that are more than 106 feet wide and 965 feet long. On Oct. 22, Panamanians will vote on a referendum to expand their country's facilities. The proposed $5.25-billion upgrade would allow vessels with double the current tonnage to use the 50-mile-long waterway.

Rodolfo Sabonge, a top official of the Panama Canal Authority, the quasi-independent body that has run the canal since the United States turned it over to Panama in 1999, said Friday that there was insufficient ship traffic to support both a widened Panama Canal and a second canal in Nicaragua.

"If the referendum passes and the widening goes forward, [the Nicaraguan project] is not feasible," Sabonge said. "Our analysis shows that if our project is approved, there would not be enough demand to pay for the two, and they would have to have a cost structure much higher than ours."

Recent polls show that nearly two-thirds of Panamanian voters favor expanding the canal. If approved, the project calls for work to begin next year, with completion expected in 2014.

Private investors are behind at least two other so-called dry-canal projects across Nicaragua and neighboring Honduras that would include new highway and rail links connecting expanded Pacific and Caribbean ports on either side of the isthmus.

"Obviously they are trying to compete with the Panama big locks project," Geraldine Knatz, executive director of the Port of Los Angeles, said of the Nicaraguan proposal.

"But Panama has spent years studying this project, looking at the economics and doing the engineering," Knatz added. "This is not something you just decide on overnight…. It would be a big catch-up for Nicaragua to step in and do this."

Knatz said she favored an expanded Panama Canal. "I can look out ahead to a time when the West Coast is not going to be able to handle all of the volume," Knatz said, noting that the Port of Los Angeles, the nation's busiest container facility, would reach capacity between 2020 and 2025.

Ships currently must reserve passage through the Panama Canal up to several months in advance. Those lacking a reservation can be forced to wait as long as four days for an open slot to cross from the Pacific to the Caribbean.

For years, shipping lines have called for the Panama Canal to be enlarged so that it could accommodate bigger oil tankers and containerships larger than the so-called Panamax generation of vessels, which are specifically designed to allow them to transit the canal.

Nicaraguan President Bolanos told reporters in Managua, the capital, last week that his government had been studying a canal proposal for "six or seven years." He said Nicaragua's canal would take a decade to build and when completed would be more modern than Panama's.

"We know that for every 100 ships that come to the Americas, only 7 use the Panama Canal," he said, according to Nicaraguan media reports. "There's a lot of business to share."

If a Nicaraguan canal were built, "it would bring an economic effervescence never seen before in Central America," Bolanos said.

Spokesman Monjarretz said that the Nicaraguan government had been in informal talks with private investors and that an announcement Monday would formalize an agreement. He declined to elaborate.

Nicaragua has been considered for a canal project since the mid-19th century, when increased shipping traffic from the California Gold Rush created a demand. At one point, railroad baron Cornelius Vanderbilt held an exclusive contract to build a canal there.

Although a canal was never built, thousands of pioneers made the transit disembarking from ships at San Juan del Norte on the Caribbean coast, trekking overland by stagecoach to Lake Nicaragua, crossing the lake by boat, then making their way to the nearby Pacific coast.

Nicaragua was seriously considered for the U.S.-built canal that was ultimately constructed in Panama in the early 1900s. A Nicaraguan postage stamp depicting a large volcano helped stoke fears among U.S. congressmen that an earthquake or volcanic eruption would hit the area.

Now, Panamanian President Martin Torrijos and other officials are warning that failure to widen the Panama Canal will invite competing projects, jeopardizing the nation's single-largest source of revenue.

In recent years, Japanese and Chinese investors, among others, have reportedly met with Nicaraguan officials to discuss a possible canal project.

New impetus to the efforts in Central America has come from the global explosion in world trade. Container traffic last year grew 4.8% worldwide.

DOJ_NMG_0072175

Mike Wasem, spokesman for the Port of Tacoma, Wash., the West Coast's fourth-largest, said a large-scale canal system in Nicaragua "would certainly give shippers greater waterborne access to the Gulf Coast and the East Coast of the United States."

But he added that Nicaragua faced significant competition from projects already underway to build international container facilities at Prince Rupert, Canada, and Lazaro Cardenas, Mexico.

A Nicaraguan canal would pose little threat to U.S. West Coast ports, he said. "It would provide an additional outlet for a volume of cargo that is expected to grow beyond the current ports' expansion options."

Failure to boost capacity on the West Coast of the U.S. — or to expand cross-isthmus traffic in Central America — could lead to expanded use of the Suez Canal for shipping from East Asia to Europe, some analysts say.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Secret Reports Dispute White House Optimism (WP)

By Bob Woodward

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

On May 22, 2006, President Bush spoke in Chicago and gave a characteristically upbeat forecast: "Years from now, people will look back on the formation of a unity government in Iraq as a decisive moment in the story of liberty, a moment when freedom gained a firm foothold in the Middle East and the forces of terror began their long retreat."

Two days later, the intelligence division of the Joint Chiefs of Staff circulated a secret intelligence assessment to the White House that contradicted the president's forecast.

Instead of a "long retreat," the report forecast a more violent 2007: "Insurgents and terrorists retain the resources and capabilities to sustain and even increase current level of violence through the next year."

A graph included in the assessment measured attacks from May 2003 to May 2006. It showed some significant dips, but the current number of attacks against U.S.-led coalition forces and Iraqi authorities was as high as it had ever been -- exceeding 3,500 a month. [In July the number would be over 4,500.] The assessment also included a pessimistic report on crude oil production, the delivery of electricity and political progress.

DOJ_NMG_0072180

On May 26, the Pentagon released an unclassified report to Congress, required by law, that contradicted the Joint Chiefs' secret assessment. The public report sent to Congress said the "appeal and motivation for continued violent action will begin to wane in early 2007."

There was a vast difference between what the White House and Pentagon knew about the situation in Iraq and what they were saying publicly. But the discrepancy was not surprising. In memos, reports and internal debates, high-level officials of the Bush administration have voiced their concern about the United States' ability to bring peace and stability to Iraq since early in the occupation.

[The release last week of portions of a National Intelligence Estimate concluding that the war in Iraq has become a primary recruitment vehicle for terrorists -- following a series of upbeat speeches by the president -- presented a similar contrast.]

On June 18, 2003, Jay Garner went to see Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to report on his brief tenure in Iraq as head of the postwar planning office. Throughout the invasion and the early days of the war, Garner, a retired Army lieutenant general, had struggled just to get his team into Iraq. Two days after he arrived, Rumsfeld called to tell him that L. Paul "Jerry" Bremer, a 61-year-old terrorism expert and protege of Henry A. Kissinger, would be coming over as the presidential envoy, effectively replacing Garner.

"We've made three tragic decisions," Garner told Rumsfeld.

"Really?" Rumsfeld asked.

"Three terrible mistakes," Garner said.

He cited the first two orders Bremer signed when he arrived, the first one banning as many as 50,000 members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from government jobs and the second disbanding the Iraqi military. Now there were hundreds of thousands of disorganized, unemployed, armed Iraqis running around.

Third, Garner said, Bremer had summarily dismissed an interim Iraqi leadership group that had been eager to help the United States administer the country in the short term. "Jerry Bremer can't be the face of the government to the Iraqi people. You've got to have an Iraqi face for the Iraqi people."

Garner made his final point: "There's still time to rectify this. There's still time to turn it around."

Rumsfeld looked at Garner for a moment with his take-no-prisoners gaze. "Well," he said, "I don't think there is anything we can do, because we are where we are."

He thinks I've lost it, Garner thought. He thinks I'm absolutely wrong. Garner didn't want it to sound like sour grapes, but facts were facts. "They're all reversible," Garner said again.

"We're not going to go back," Rumsfeld said emphatically.

Later that day, Garner went with Rumsfeld to the White House. But in a meeting with Bush, he made no mention of mistakes. Instead he regaled the president with stories from his time in Baghdad.

In an interview last December, I asked Garner if he had any regrets in not telling the president about his misgivings.

"You know, I don't know if I had that moment to live over again, I don't know if I'd do that or not. But if I had done that -- and quite frankly, I mean, I wouldn't have had a problem doing that -- but in my thinking, the door's closed. I mean, there's nothing I can do to open this door again. And I think if I had said that to the president in front of Cheney and Condoleezza Rice and Rumsfeld in there, the president would have looked at them and they would have rolled their eyes back and he would have thought, 'Boy, I wonder why we didn't get rid of this guy sooner?' "

"They didn't see it coming," Garner added. "As the troops said, they drank the Kool-Aid."What's the Strategy?

In the fall of 2003 and the winter of 2004, officials of the National Security Council became increasingly concerned about the ability of the U.S. military to counter the growing insurgency in Iraq.

Returning from a visit to Iraq, Robert D. Blackwill, the NSC's top official for Iraq, was deeply disturbed by what he considered the inadequate number of troops on the ground there. He told Rice and Stephen J. Hadley, her deputy, that the NSC needed to do a military review.

"If we have a military strategy, I can't identify it," Hadley said. "I don't know what's worse -- that they have one and won't tell us or that they don't have one."

DOJ_NMG_0072181

Rice had made it clear that her authority did not extend to Rumsfeld or the military, so Blackwill never forced the issue with her. Still, he wondered why the president never challenged the military. Why didn't he say to Gen. John P. Abizaid at the end of one of his secure video briefings, "John, let's have another of these on Thursday and what I really want from you is please explain to me, let's take an hour and a half, your military strategy for victory."

After Bush's reelection, Hadley replaced Rice as national security adviser. He made an assessment of the problems from the first term.

"I give us a B-minus for policy development," he told a colleague on Feb. 5, 2005, "and a D-minus for policy execution."

Rice, for her part, hired Philip D. Zelikow, an old friend, and sent him immediately to Iraq. She needed ground truth, a full, detailed report from someone she trusted. Zelikow had a license to go anywhere and ask any question.

On Feb. 10, 2005, two weeks after Rice became secretary of state, Zelikow presented her with a 15-page, single-spaced secret memo. "At this point Iraq remains a failed state shadowed by constant violence and undergoing revolutionary political change," Zelikow wrote.

The insurgency was "being contained militarily," but it was "quite active," leaving Iraqi civilians feeling "very insecure," Zelikow said.

U.S. officials seemed locked down in the fortified Green Zone. "Mobility of coalition officials is extremely limited, and productive government activity is constrained."

Zelikow criticized the Baghdad-centered effort, noting that "the war can certainly be lost in Baghdad, but the war can only be won in the cities and provinces outside Baghdad."

In sum, he said, the United States' effort suffered because it lacked an articulated, comprehensive, unified policy.Lessons From Kissinger

A powerful, largely invisible influence on Bush's Iraq policy was former secretary of state Kissinger.

"Of the outside people that I talk to in this job," Vice President Cheney told me in the summer of 2005, "I probably talk to Henry Kissinger more than I talk to anybody else. He just comes by and, I guess at least once a month, Scooter [his then-chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby] and I sit down with him."

The president also met privately with Kissinger every couple of months, making him the most regular and frequent outside adviser to Bush on foreign affairs.

Kissinger sensed wobbliness everywhere on Iraq, and he increasingly saw it through the prism of the Vietnam War. For Kissinger, the overriding lesson of Vietnam is to stick it out.

In his writing, speeches and private comments, Kissinger claimed that the United States had essentially won the war in 1972, only to lose it because of the weakened resolve of the public and Congress.

In a column in The Washington Post on Aug. 12, 2005, titled "Lessons for an Exit Strategy," Kissinger wrote, "Victory over the insurgency is the only meaningful exit strategy."

He delivered the same message directly to Bush, Cheney and Hadley at the White House.

Victory had to be the goal, he told all. Don't let it happen again. Don't give an inch, or else the media, the Congress and the American culture of avoiding hardship will walk you back.

He also said that the eventual outcome in Iraq was more important than Vietnam had been. A radical Islamic or Taliban-style government in Iraq would be a model that could challenge the internal stability of the key countries in the Middle East and elsewhere.

Kissinger told Rice that in Vietnam they didn't have the time, focus, energy or support at home to get the politics in place. That's why it had collapsed like a house of cards. He urged that the Bush administration get the politics right, both in Iraq and on the home front. Partially withdrawing troops had its own dangers. Even entertaining the idea of withdrawing any troops could create momentum for an exit that was less than victory.

In a meeting with presidential speechwriter Michael Gerson in early September 2005, Kissinger was more explicit: Bush needed to resist the pressure to withdraw American troops. He repeated his axiom that the only meaningful exit strategy was victory.

"The president can't be talking about troop reductions as a centerpiece," Kissinger said. "You may want to reduce troops," but troop reduction should not be the objective. "This is not where you put the emphasis."

To emphasize his point, he gave Gerson a copy of a memo he had written to President Richard M. Nixon, dated Sept. 10, 1969.

"Withdrawal of U.S. troops will become like salted peanuts to the American public; the more U.S. troops come home, the more will be demanded," he wrote.

The policy of "Vietnamization," turning the fight over to the South Vietnamese military, Kissinger wrote, might increase pressure to end the war because the American public wanted a quick resolution. Troop withdrawals would only encourage the enemy. "It will become harder and harder to maintain the morale of those who remain, not to speak of their mothers."

Two months after Gerson's meeting, the administration issued a 35-page "National Strategy for Victory in Iraq." It was right out of the Kissinger playbook. The only meaningful exit strategy would be victory.Echoes of Vietnam

Vietnam was also on the minds of some old Army buddies of Gen. Abizaid, the Centcom commander. They were worried that Iraq was slowly turning into Vietnam -- either it would wind down prematurely or become a war that was not winnable.

Some of them, including retired Gen. Wayne A. Downing and James V. Kimsey, a founder of America Online, visited Abizaid in 2005 at his headquarters in Doha, Qatar, and then in Iraq.

Abizaid held to the position that the war was now about the Iraqis. They had to win it now. The U.S. military had done all it could. It was critical, he argued, that they lower the American troop presence. It was still the face of an occupation, with American forces patrolling, kicking down doors and looking at the Iraqi women, which infuriated the Iraqi men.

"We've got to get the [expletive] out," he said.

Abizaid's old friends were worried sick that another Vietnam or anything that looked like Vietnam would be the end of the volunteer army. What's the strategy for winning? they pressed him.

"That's not my job," Abizaid said.

No, it is part of your job, they insisted.

No, Abizaid said. Articulating strategy belonged to others.

Who?

"The president and Condi Rice, because Rumsfeld doesn't have any credibility anymore," he said.

This March, Abizaid was in Washington to testify before the Senate Armed Services Committee. He painted a careful but upbeat picture of the situation in Iraq.

Afterward, he went over to see Rep. John P. Murtha in the Rayburn House Office Building. Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat, had introduced a resolution in Congress calling for American troops in Iraq to be "redeployed" -- the military term for returning troops overseas to their home bases -- "at the earliest practicable date."

"The war in Iraq is not going as advertised," Murtha had said. "It is a flawed policy wrapped in illusion."

Now, sitting at the round dark-wood table in the congressman's office, Abizaid, the one uniformed military commander who had been intimately involved in Iraq from the beginning and who was still at it, indicated he wanted to speak frankly. According to Murtha, Abizaid raised his hand for emphasis, held his thumb and forefinger a quarter of an inch from each other and said, "We're that far apart."Frustration and a Resignation

That same month, White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. prepared to leave the administration after submitting his resignation to Bush. He felt a sense of relief mixed with the knowledge that he was leaving unfinished business.

"It's Iraq, Iraq, Iraq," Card had told his replacement, Joshua B. Bolten. "Then comes the economy."

One of Card's great worries was that Iraq would be compared to Vietnam. In March, there were 58,249 names on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington. One of Kissinger's private criticisms of Bush was that he had no mechanism in place, or even an inclination, to consider the downsides of impending decisions. Alternative courses of action were rarely considered.

As best as Card could remember, there had been some informal, blue-sky discussions at times along the lines of "What could we do differently?" But there had been no formal sessions to consider alternatives to staying in Iraq. To his knowledge there were no anguished memos bearing the names of Cheney, Rice, Hadley, Rumsfeld, the CIA, Card himself or anyone else saying "Let's examine alternatives," as had surfaced after the Vietnam era.

Card put it on the generals in the Pentagon and Iraq. If they had come forward and said to the president, "It's not worth it," or, "The mission can't be accomplished," Card was certain, the president would have said "I'm not going to ask another kid to sacrifice for it."

Card was enough of a realist to see that there were two negative aspects to Bush's public persona that had come to define his presidency: incompetence and arrogance. Card did not believe that Bush was incompetent, and so he had to face the possibility that, as Bush's chief of staff, he might have been the incompetent one. In addition, he did not think the president was arrogant.

But the marketing of Bush had come across as arrogant. Maybe it was unfair in Card's opinion, but there it was.

He was leaving. And the man he considered most responsible for the postwar troubles, the one who should have gone, Rumsfeld, was staying.

By Bob Woodward, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 1, 2006

It was Bush's decision. But Rumsfeld drove the dynamic on Iraq. How the SecDef blew it. An exclusive excerpt.

A movie of the George W. Bush presidency might open in the Oval Office on January 26, 2001, when Donald H. Rumsfeld was sworn in as defense secretary. A White House photographer captured the scene. Rumsfeld wears a pin-stripe suit, and rests his left hand on a Bible held by Joyce, his wife of 46 years. His right hand is raised. Bush stands almost at attention, his head forward, his eyes cocked sharply leftward, looking intently at Rumsfeld. Vice President Dick Cheney stands slightly off to the side, his trademark half smile on his face. It is a cold, dry day, and the barren branches of the trees outside can be seen through the Oval Office windows.

Back in the days of the Ford presidency, in the wake of Watergate—the pardon of Nixon, the fall of Saigon—Cheney and Rumsfeld had worked almost daily in the same Oval Office where they once again stood. The new man in the photo, Bush, five years younger than Cheney and nearly 14 years younger than Rumsfeld, had been a student at Harvard Business School. He came to the presidency with less experience and time in government than any incoming president since Woodrow Wilson in 1913.

Well into his seventh decade, many of Rumsfeld's peers and friends had retired, but he now stood eagerly on the cusp, ready to run the race again. He resembled John le Carre's fictional Cold War British intelligence chief, George Smiley, a man who "had been given, in late age, a chance to return to the rained-out contests of his life and play them after all."

"Get it right this time," Cheney told Rumsfeld.

In his first Pentagon tour, as Ford's secretary of defense from 1975-1977, Rumsfeld had acquired a disdain for large parts of the system he was to oversee once again. He had found the Pentagon and the vast U.S. military complex unmanageable. One night at a dinner at my house a dozen years after he had left the Pentagon the first time, he said that being secretary was "like having an electric appliance in one hand and the plug in the other and you are running around trying to find a place to put it in." It was an image that stuck with me—Rumsfeld charging around the Pentagon E-ring, the Man with the Appliance, seeking an elusive electrical socket, trying to make things work and feeling unplugged by the generals and admirals.

"After two months on the job, it is clear that the Defense establishment is tangled in its anchor chain," Rumsfeld dictated in a four-page memo on March 21, 2001, two months into his second tour. He was already frustrated. Congress required hundreds of reports. It seemed there might be more auditors, investigators, testing groups and monitors looking over their shoulders than there were "front-line troops with weapons."

"The maze of constraints on the Department force it to operate in a manner that is so slow, so ponderous and so inefficient that whatever it ultimately does will inevitably be a decade or so late."

DOJ_NMG_0072184

This "Anchor Chain" memo, which Rumsfeld revised and added to, became notorious among Rumsfeld's staff as they watched and tried to help him define the universe of his problems. It sounded like he had almost given up fixing the Pentagon during the George W. Bush presidency. The task was so hard and would take so long, he dictated in a later version, that "our job, therefore, is to work together to sharpen the sword that the next president will wield."

"I'm the secretary of defense," Rumsfeld insisted repeatedly in his first months in 2001. "I'm in the chain of command." He—not the generals, not the Joint Chiefs of Staff—would deal with the White House and the president on operational matters. Rumsfeld micromanaged daily Pentagon life and rode roughshod over people. In one public confrontation at a hearing with Senator Susan Collins, the earnest Maine Republican, Rumsfeld had put her down in a manner that was stunning even for him. Collins's voice had quivered at one point. Later, Powell A. Moore, Rumsfeld's assistant secretary of defense for legislative affairs, suggested that he call her, try to smooth things over.

"Hell," Rumsfeld said, "she needs to apologize to me."

On one occasion, he led a delegation from Congress to the funeral in Columbia, South Carolina, for Representative Floyd Spence, a Republican who had been a pro-Pentagon hawk for three decades. Moore had arranged the seating on Rumsfeld's plane the way everything was done in Congress, by seniority.

"I don't want this," Rumsfeld declared, and personally re-arranged the seating—putting Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who would soon become the House Armed Services Committee chairman, in the back.

On January 20, 2003, President Bush signed a secret National Security Presidential Directive, NSPD-24. The subject: setting up an "Iraq Postwar Planning Office" within the Defense Department for the expected invasion of Iraq. Rumsfeld picked Jay Garner, a 64-year-old retired three-star general and defense industry executive to head the postwar office. Six weeks later, Garner went to the White House, mid-morning on Friday, February 28, 2003, to meet President Bush for the first time. In the Situation Room, Garner passed around copies of his handout, an 11-point presentation, and dove right in. He said four of the nine tasks his small team was supposed to be in charge of in Iraq under Bush's NSPD-24 were plainly beyond their capabilities, including dismantling weapons of mass destruction, defeating terrorists, reshaping the Iraqi military and reshaping the other internal Iraqi security institutions.

The president nodded. No one else intervened, though Garner had just told them he couldn't be responsible for crucial postwar tasks—the ones that had the most to do with the stated reasons for going to war in the first place—because his team couldn't do them.

The import of what he had said seemed to sail over everyone's heads.

Garner next described how he intended to divide the country into regional groups, and moved on to the interagency plans.

"Just a minute," the president interrupted. "Where are you from?"

"Florida, sir."

"Why do you talk like that?" he asked, apparently trying to place Garner's accent.

"Because I was born and raised on a ranch in Florida. My daddy was a rancher."

"You're in," the first rancher said approvingly. His brother Jeb was governor of the state, and the president visited regularly.

One of Garner's talking points was, "Postwar use of Iraqi Regular Army." He said, "We're going to use the army. We need to use them. They have the proper skill sets."

How many from the army? someone asked.

"I'm going to give you a big range," Garner answered. "It'll be between 200,000 and 300,000."

Garner looked around the room. All the heads were bobbing north to south. Nobody challenged. Nobody had any questions about this plan.

"Thank you very much," Bush said when Garner was done. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice started talking about something else, so Garner figured he was dismissed. As he started to walk out of the room, the president caught his eye.

"Kick ass, Jay," Bush said.

Garner waited for Rumsfeld outside. Soon, Bush and Rice came out and walked three or four steps past Garner. Suddenly Bush turned back.

"Hey, if you have any problem with that governor down in Florida, just let me know," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0072185

Shortly after the invasion, while Garner was in Kuwait waiting to move into Iraq, Rumsfeld chose L. Paul "Jerry" Bremer, a 61-year-old terrorism expert and protégé of Henry Kissinger, to effectively replace Garner, but as a presidential envoy. On Garner's first day in Iraq, April 22, he signed on to an agreement to set up an interim Iraqi advisory group, made up of prominent Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis, many of them expatriates, to put an Iraqi face on the postwar occupation government. Two days later, Rumsfeld called to tell him Bremer was coming over, and said he wanted Garner to stay on as well.

"It doesn't work that way," Garner said. "You can't have the guy who used to be in charge and the guy who's now in charge there, because you divide the loyalties of the people. So the best thing for me is just to step out of here."

Rumsfeld convinced Garner to stay temporarily, and the retired general and Bremer clashed, as Bremer quickly unveiled a plan to ban as many as 50,000 members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from government employment.

"Hell," Garner told him, "you won't be able to run anything if you go this deep."

The next day, Bremer revealed a second draft order, disbanding the Iraqi ministries of Defense and Interior, the entire Iraqi military, and all of Saddam's bodyguard and special paramilitary organizations. Garner was stunned. The de-Baathification order was dumb, but this was a disaster.

"We have always made plans to bring the army back," he insisted. This new plan was just coming out of the blue, subverting months of work.

"Well, the plans have changed," Bremer replied.

Bremer then met with the Iraqi advisory group Garner had agreed to work with. "One thing you need to realize is you're not the government," he told them. "We are. And we're in charge."

The next day, the group went home.

Garner came back to the U.S. in June and basically hid out for a couple of weeks, not wanting to see anyone at the Pentagon or talk about his experience in Iraq. Finally, on June 18, 2003, alone with Rumsfeld around the small table in the secretary's office, Garner felt he had an obligation to state the depths of his concerns.

"We've made three tragic decisions," Garner said.

"Really?" Rumsfeld said.

"Three terrible mistakes," Garner said. He cited the extent of the de-Baathification, getting rid of the army, and summarily dumping the Iraqi leadership group. Disbanding the military had been the biggest mistake. Now there were hundreds of thousands of disorganized, unemployed, armed Iraqis running around. Garner made his final point: "There's still time to rectify this. There's still time to turn it around."

Rumsfeld looked at Garner for a moment with his take-no-prisoners gaze. "Well," he said, "I don't think there is anything we can do, because we are where we are."

Rumsfeld and Garner went to the White House to see Bush. It was Garner's second time with the president. "Mr. President, let me tell you a couple of stories," Garner said. Describing meetings with Iraqis, Garner painted a positive picture. "I'd get ready to leave," Garner said, "and this is true—as I leave they're all thumbs-up and they'd say, 'God bless Mr. George Bush and Mr. Tony Blair. Thank you for taking away Saddam Hussein.' That was in 70 meetings. That always was the final response."

"Oh, that's good," Bush said.

On the way out, Bush slapped Garner on the back. "Hey Jay, you want to do Iran?"

"Sir, the boys and I talked about that and we want to hold out for Cuba. We think the rum and the cigars are a little better … The women are prettier."

Bush laughed. "You got it. You got Cuba."

Of course with all the stories, jocularity, buddy-buddy talk, bluster and confidence in the Oval Office, Garner had left out the headline. He had not mentioned the problems he saw, or even hinted at them. He did not tell Bush about the three tragic mistakes. Once again the aura of the presidency had shut out the most important news—the bad news.

It was only one example of a visitor to the Oval Office not telling the president the whole story or the truth. Likewise, in these moments where Bush had someone from the field there in the chair beside him, he did not press, did not try to open the door himself and ask what the visitor had seen and thought. The whole atmosphere too often resembled a royal court, with Cheney and Rice in attendance, some upbeat stories, exaggerated good news, and a good time had by all.

DOJ_NMG_0072186

Soon Rumsfeld was distancing himself from Bremer, who, on paper, was to report to the president through the secretary of defense. Rumsfeld later confirmed to me in an interview that he felt that Bremer had only "technically but not really" reported to him.

"He didn't call home much," Rumsfeld said of Bremer.

Rumsfeld also stepped away from the hunt for Saddam's alleged WMD. CIA Director George Tenet proposed to Rumsfeld that the person in charge of the WMD hunt report to both of them.

"Absolutely not," Rumsfeld said.

After Bush's re-election in November 2004, the biggest question mark at the White House was Rumsfeld. Should he stay? White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. had to approach the issue with delicacy. The biggest voice for change was outgoing Secretary of State Colin Powell. In one conversation, Powell had told Card, "If I go, Don should go." Bush had decided to replace Powell with Rice, but it was unclear who he wanted at Defense.

Card got out his "hit-by-the-bus" book, an 8½-by-11-inch spiral notebook, a half-inch thick with a blue cover. On separate pages he had lists of possible replacements for all the major administration posts, including his own. The names were listed in no particular order. Card kept the notebook in his desk at the White House and periodically added or deleted names. He had intentionally used a student notebook, something he had bought himself, so it wouldn't be considered a government document or a presidential record that might someday be opened to history. It was private and personal.

His list of 11 possible Rumsfeld replacements included Senator Joe Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat who had been Al Gore's running mate in 2000, and Republican Arizona Senator John McCain.

But Card had what he thought was a great idea—a sleeper candidate. The best replacement for Rumsfeld would be James A. Baker III. "Everyone would say, 'Phew,'" Card said. "No learning curve. Great. Interesting." Baker was 74, only two years older than Rumsfeld. He had served in the Marine Corps. He had been the best modern White House chief of staff, Card thought. He had successfully handled the 2000 Florida recount for Bush. Mr. President, this is my quiet counsel, Card said. Put a diplomat in the Defense Department.

The president seemed genuinely intrigued. You don't have to rush to make a decision, Card advised. But the president would not even authorize Card to send out feelers or to enter into any discussion with Baker.

Card spoke with Rumsfeld, who talked as if he presumed there would be no change. Rumsfeld wanted to stay.

Soon Karl Rove weighed in. A contentious session with Congress was coming up. As he saw it, the Democrats were in no mood for a honeymoon. With Rice's confirmation hearing and with the expected nomination of White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales as attorney general, would another Senate confirmation overload the system? And, clearly, the conduct of the war in Iraq would be the subject of confirmation hearings for anyone Bush nominated to be the new secretary of defense.

Rove agreed they did not want to do anything that would prompt hearings on the war. Jesus, no.

In mid-December the president made his final decision. Rumsfeld would stay, he indicated to Cheney and Card. He couldn't change Rumsfeld.

"That didn't mean he didn't want to," Card later said.

Card tried to have a private, candid session with First Lady Laura Bush about every six weeks to hear her concerns. He set aside an hour and a half for each meeting. Sometimes it took 30 minutes, sometimes the full hour and one half and on occasion two hours.

The first lady was distressed about the war, worried that Rumsfeld was hurting her husband, and her perspective seemed to reflect Rice's concern about Rumsfeld's over-bearing style and tendency to dominate. Card knew that the first lady and Rice often took long walks together on the Camp David weekends.

"I agree with you," Card said. On one level he was trying to educate and explain, but he was also lobbying. So he outlined his problems with Rumsfeld and how he believed it was time for a change. He said, however, so far his advice on the Rumsfeld situation had been considered and rejected.

"He's happy with this," the first lady said, "but I'm not." Another time she said, "I don't know why he's not upset with this."

As the new secretary of state, Rice hired Philip Zelikow, an old friend, as the counselor to the State Department, a powerful but little known top post that would leave him free to undertake special assignments for her, and quickly dispatched him and a small team to Iraq. On February 10, Rice's 14th day as secretary, Zelikow presented her with a 15-page, single-spaced memo classified SECRET/NODIS, meaning "no distribution" to anyone else. "At this point Iraq remains a failed state shadowed by constant violence and undergoing revolutionary political change," Rice read. This was a shocking notion—"a failed state," after two years, thousands of lives, and hundreds of billions of dollars.

In midsummer 2005, General Jim Jones, the NATO commander, paid a call on his old friend General Pete Pace, the vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs. It was virtually certain that Pace was going to move up to become chairman, the number one military position.

The two Marine generals had been friends for more than three decades. They had been in Vietnam at about the same time, a searing and formative experience for both, and then served side-by-side as first lieutenants in 1970 at the Marine barracks in southeast Washington.

Jones expressed chagrin that Pace would even want to be chairman. "You're going to face a debacle and be part of the debacle in Iraq," he said. U.S. prestige was at a 50- or 75-year low in the world. He said he was so worried about Iraq and the way Rumsfeld ran things that he wondered if he himself should not resign in protest. "How do you have the stomach for eight years in the Pentagon?" he finally asked.

Pace said that someone had to be chairman. Who else would do it?

Jones did not have an answer. "Military advice is being influenced on a political level," he said. The JCS had improperly "surrendered" to Rumsfeld. "You should not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder."

His concern was complete. When Senators John Warner and Carl Levin, the chairman and ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, visited him at his headquarters in Belgium, Jones told them about all the problems. He said they needed new legislationto re-empower the service chiefs or make some kind of sense of the crazy system.

"The Joint Chiefs have been systematically emasculated by Rumsfeld," Jones said.

Pace soon became chairman. In an interview, he flatly denied that Jones had told him that Iraq was a debacle or that Rumsfeld had systematically emasculated the Joint Chiefs. "He's a good friend. He was in my wedding," Pace said, noting they had known each other for 36 years. "If Jim felt that way he would tell me."

I called Jones at NATO headquarters in Belgium. He said that he had made all those comments to Pace in their meeting in 2005. "That's what I told him," Jones said.

In March 2006, Rumsfeld invited six of the Pentagon's regular outside advisers in to be briefed and ask questions. One was Ken Adelman, a longtime Rumsfeld friend and vehement early supporter of the war who had become entirely disillusioned over the administration's handling of the postwar. His relationship with Rumsfeld was almost over.

"What metrics would you use for success in Iraq?" Adelman asked Rumsfeld. "You know, for winning the war?"

"Oh, there are hundreds," Rumsfeld replied. "It's just so complicated that there are hundreds."

"Wait a minute," Adelman insisted. "A former boss of mine always said identify three or four things, then always ask about, get measurements and you'll get progress or else you'll never get any progress." The former boss was Rumsfeld himself, who had driven the point home to Adelman 35 years ago, when he worked for Rumsfeld at the Office of Economic Opportunity. What are they? Adelman insisted.

Rumsfeld said it was so complicated that he could not give a list. "Hundreds," he insisted.

Adelman believed that meant there was a total lack of accountability. If Rumsfeld didn't agree to any criteria, he couldn't be said to have failed on any criteria.

"Then you don't have anything," Adelman said. He left as dis-turbed as ever. There was no accountability.

On March 16, General John Abizaid, the commander of CENTCOM and thus the top military officer for the Middle East, was in Washington to testify before the Senate Armed Services Committee. He painted a careful but upbeat picture of the situation in Iraq. Afterward, he went over to see Congressman John Murtha, the 73-year old former Marine who had introduced a resolution the previous November calling for the redeployment of troops from Iraq as soon as practicable. Sitting at the round, dark wood table in the congressman's office, Abizaid, the one uniformed military commander who had been intimately involved in Iraq from the beginning and who was still at it, indicated he wanted to speak frankly. According to Murtha, Abizaid raised his hand for emphasis and held his thumb and forefinger a quarter of an inch from each other and said, "We're that far apart."

DOJ_NMG_0072188

Rumsfeld circulated a six-page SECRET memo on May 1, proposing some fixes, entitled "Illustrative New 21st Century Institutions and Approaches."

It was almost the latest version of the "Anchor Chain" memos he had written in his first months as secretary in 2001—a cry from his bureaucratic and managerial heart. Not only was the Defense Department tangled in its anchor chain but so was the rest of the U.S. government, and the world.

He dictated, "The charge of incompetence against the U.S. government should be easy to rebut if the American people understand the extent to which the current system of government makes competence next to impossible."

On Wednesday, May 24, 2006, the intelligence division of the Joint Staff, the J-2, circulated an intelligence assessment, classified SECRET, that showed that the forces of terror in Iraq were not in retreat. It put hard numbers on trends that had been reported to Bush all year. Terrorist attacks had been steadily increasing. The insurgency was gaining. Attacks were now averaging 700 to 800 a week. Every IED that was discovered—whether it detonated and caused damage or casualties or was identified and disarmed before it could do any damage—was still counted as an attack. A graph measuring attacks from May 2003 to May 2006 showed some significant dips, but the current number of attacks was as high as they had ever been—exceeding 3,500 a month.

I told Rumsfeld that I understood the number of attacks was going up.

"That's probably true," he said. "It is also probably true that our data's better, and we're categorizing more things as attacks. A random round can be an attack and all the way up to killing 50 people someplace. So you've got a whole fruit bowl of different things—a banana and an apple and an orange."

I was speechless. Even with the loosest and most careless use of language and analogy, I did not understand how the secretary of defense would compare insurgent attacks to a "fruit bowl," a metaphor that stripped them of all urgency and emotion. The official categories in the classified reports that Rumsfeld regularly received were the lethal IEDs, standoff attacks with mortars, and close-engagements such as ambushes—as far from bananas, apples and oranges as possible.

During one week in May 2006, enemy-initiated attacks soared to 900, a new record. In June, attacks went down to about 825 one week but then spiked up again. By July it was over 1,000 a week, again a new record. It was even worse considering the level of violence existed after two years spent training, equipping and funding 263,000 Iraqi soldiers and police. The cost had been $10 billion, and American teams had been embedded with most of the Iraqi units for over a year. At an equivalent time in 1971, after several years of Vietnamization, the trend lines of insurgent violence had been down, not up.

In July 2006, I interviewed Rumsfeld on two successive afternoons. I asked him about troop levels—a key issue and point of contention. The record showed that the plan for invading Iraq had a top number of 275,000 ground combat forces, including about 90,000 who were scheduled to flow into Iraq in the weeks and months after March 19, 2003, when the war began. Rumsfeld said it is one of the great "canards" that he had decided or unduly influenced the decision to not bring in the 90,000. It was all on General Franks's recommendation, he said. But by the summer of 2006, Rumsfeld had softened his position on the issue of whether there were enough troops. "It's entirely possible there were too many at some point and too few at some point, because no one's perfect," he said. "In retrospect I have not seen or heard anything from the other opiners that suggests to me that they have any reason to believe that they were right and we were wrong. Nor can I prove we were right and they were wrong. The only thing I can say is they seem to have a lot more certainty than my assessment of the facts would permit me to have."

Asked about the battle with the Iraq insurgency, he said, "It could take eight to 10 years. Insurgencies have a tendency to do that." Overall he said, "Our exit strategy is to have the Iraqis' government and security forces capable of managing a lower-level insurgency and ultimately achieving victory over it and repressing it over time. But it would be a period after we may very well not have large numbers of people there."

I said I understood that General George W. Casey Jr., the top commander of forces on the ground in Iraq, had reported that the insurgency had not been neutralized—key goal of his campaign plan—but only contained. After some typical verbal jousting, I was able to ask directly, "Do you agree it has not been neutralized?"

"Oh clearly not," Rumsfeld answered.

"Only contained?"

"Yeah," he said. "Thus far."

DOJ_NMG_0072189

I then read from the May 24, 2006, assessment that said the "Sunni Arab insurgency is gaining strength and increasing capacity." I asked him, "Does that sound right to you?"

Here was one of the central questions in any war. Was the other side "gaining strength and increasing capacity?" General Casey the Joint Chiefs' intelligence staff, and the CIA had all categorically said the insurgency was gaining. Certainly Rumsfeld knew that. I had also quoted from the assessment on a list of 29 sample questions I had submitted in advance, and I know he had spent at least one hour the day before preparing for the interview.

"When was this?" Rumsfeld asked.

Six weeks ago, I answered. The question on the table was whether he agreed or not that the insurgency in the Iraq War was gaining. I was ready for a pure Rumsfeldian moment, and I was not disappointed.

"Gosh, I don't know," the secretary of defense replied. "I don't want to comment on it. I read so many of those intelligence reports"—I had never said it was an intelligence report—"and they are all over the lot. In a given day you can see one from one agency, and one from another agency, and then I'll ask Casey or Abizaid what they think about it, or Pete Pace, 'Is that your view?' And try and triangulate and see what people think. But it changes from month to month. I'm not going to go back and say I agree or don't agree with something like that."

He was right that there might be some changes month to month, but, as he knew, the overall assessment and trend was visibly, measurably and dramatically worse.

I asked Rumsfeld what was the best, most optimistic scenario for a positive outcome in Iraq.

"This business is ugly," he replied. "It's tough. There isn't any best. A long, hard slog, I think I wrote years ago. We're facing a set of challenges that are different than our country understands … They're different than our Congress understands. They're different than our government, much of our government, probably understands and is organized or trained or equipped to cope with and deal with. We're dealing with enemies that can turn inside our decision circles." The enemy can move swiftly, he said. "They don't have parliaments and bureaucracies and real estate to defend and interact with or deal with or cope with. They can do what they want. They aren't held accountable for lying or for killing innocent men, women and children.

"There's something about the body politic in the United States that they can accept the enemy killing innocent men, women and children and cutting off people's heads, but have zero tolerance for some soldier who does something he shouldn't do."

"Are you optimistic?" I asked.

Rumsfeld looked through me and continued. Three of his aides who were sitting with us at the table in his office could not help but register surprise as Rumsfeld plowed on without answering.

"We're fighting the first war in history in the new century," he continued, "and with all these new realities, with an industrial-age organization in an environment that has not adapted and adjusted, a public environment that has not adapted and adjusted."

At the end of the second of two interviews, I quoted former Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara: "Any military commander who is honest with you will say he's made mistakes that have cost lives."

"Um hmm," Rumsfeld said.

"Is that correct?"

"I don't know. I suppose that a military commander..."

"Which you are," I interrupted.

"No I'm not," the secretary of defense said.

"Yes, sir," I said.

"No, no. Well … "

"Yes. Yes," I said, raising my hand in the air and ticking off the hierarchy. "It's commander in chief, secretary of defense, combatant commander."

"I can see a military commander in a uniform who is engaged in a conflict having to make decisions that result in people living or dying and that that would be a truth. And certainly if you go up the chain to the civilian side to the president and to me, you could by indirection, two or three steps removed, make the case."

DOJ_NMG_0072190

Indirection? Two or three steps removed? It was inexplicable. Rumsfeld had spent so much time insisting on the chain of command. He was in control—not the Joint Chiefs, not the uniformed military, not the National Security Council or the NSC staff, not the critics or the opiners. How could he not see his role and responsibility?

I could think of nothing more to say.

Two Months Before 9/11, An Urgent Warning To Rice (WP)

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

On July 10, 2001, two months before the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, then-CIA Director George J. Tenet met with his counterterrorism chief, J. Cofer Black, at CIA headquarters to review the latest on Osama bin Laden and his al-Qaeda terrorist organization. Black laid out the case, consisting of communications intercepts and other top-secret intelligence showing the increasing likelihood that al-Qaeda would soon attack the United States. It was a mass of fragments and dots that nonetheless made a compelling case, so compelling to Tenet that he decided he and Black should go to the White House immediately.

Tenet called Condoleezza Rice, then national security adviser, from the car and said he needed to see her right away. There was no practical way she could refuse such a request from the CIA director.

For months, Tenet had been pressing Rice to set a clear counterterrorism policy, including specific presidential orders called "findings" that would give the CIA stronger authority to conduct covert action against bin Laden. Perhaps a dramatic appearance -- Black called it an "out of cycle" session, beyond Tenet's regular weekly meeting with Rice -- would get her attention.

Tenet had been losing sleep over the recent intelligence he'd seen. There was no conclusive, smoking-gun intelligence, but there was such a huge volume of data that an intelligence officer's instinct strongly suggested that something was coming. He and Black hoped to convey the depth of their anxiety and get Rice to kick-start the government into immediate action.

He did not know when, where or how, but Tenet felt there was too much noise in the intelligence systems. Two weeks earlier, he had told Richard A. Clarke, the National Security Council's counterterrorism director: "It's my sixth sense, but I feel it coming. This is going to be the big one."

But Tenet had been having difficulty getting traction on an immediate bin Laden action plan, in part because Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld had questioned all the National Security Agency intercepts and other intelligence. Could all this be a grand deception? Rumsfeld had asked. Perhaps it was a plan to measure U.S. reactions and defenses.

Tenet had the NSA review all the intercepts, and the agency concluded they were of genuine al-Qaeda communications. On June 30, a top-secret senior executive intelligence brief contained an article headlined "Bin Laden Threats Are Real."

Tenet hoped his abrupt request for an immediate meeting would shake Rice. He and Black, a veteran covert operator, had two main points when they met with her. First, al-Qaeda was going to attack American interests, possibly in the United States itself. Black emphasized that this amounted to a strategic warning, meaning the problem was so serious that it required an overall plan and strategy. Second, this was a major foreign policy problem that needed to be addressed immediately. They needed to take action that moment -- covert, military, whatever -- to thwart bin Laden.

The United States had human and technical sources, and all the intelligence was consistent, the two men told Rice. Black acknowledged that some of it was uncertain "voodoo" but said it was often this voodoo that was the best indicator.

Tenet and Black felt they were not getting through to Rice. She was polite, but they felt the brush-off. President Bush had said he didn't want to swat at flies.

As they all knew, a coherent plan for covert action against bin Laden was in the pipeline, but it would take some time. In recent closed-door meetings the entire National Security Council apparatus had been considering action against bin Laden, including using a new secret weapon: the Predator unmanned aerial vehicle, or drone, that could fire Hellfire missiles to kill him or his lieutenants. It looked like a possible solution, but there was a raging debate between the CIA and the Pentagon about who would pay for it and who would have authority to shoot.

Besides, Rice seemed focused on other administration priorities, especially the ballistic missile defense system that Bush had campaigned on. She was in a different place.

Tenet left the meeting feeling frustrated. Though Rice had given them a fair hearing, no immediate action meant great risk. Black felt the decision to just keep planning was a sustained policy failure. Rice and the Bush team had been in hibernation too long. "Adults should not have a system like this," he said later.

The July 10 meeting between Tenet, Black and Rice went unmentioned in the various reports of investigations into the Sept. 11 attacks, but it stood out in the minds of Tenet and Black as the starkest warning they had given the White House on bin Laden and al-Qaeda. Though the investigators had access to all the paperwork on the meeting, Black felt there were things the commissions wanted to know about and things they didn't want to know about.

Philip D. Zelikow, the aggressive executive director of the Sept. 11 commission and a University of Virginia professor who had co-authored a book with Rice on Germany, knew something about the July 10 meeting, but it was not clear to him what immediate action really would have meant. In 2005 Rice hired Zelikow as a top aide at the State Department.

Afterward, Tenet looked back on the meeting with Rice as a tremendous lost opportunity to prevent or disrupt the Sept. 11 attacks. Rice could have gotten through to Bush on the threat, but she just didn't get it in time, Tenet thought. He felt that he had done his job and had been very direct about the threat, but that Rice had not moved quickly. He felt she was not organized and did not push people, as he tried to do at the CIA.

Black later said, "The only thing we didn't do was pull the trigger to the gun we were holding to her head."

Editor's Note: How much effort the Bush administration made in going after Osama bin Laden before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, became an issue last week after former president Bill Clinton accused President Bush's "neocons" and other Republicans of ignoring bin Laden until the attacks. Rice responded in an interview that "what we did in the eight months was at least as aggressive as what the Clinton administration did in the preceding years."

Did I Say That? No, Not Really, Maybe, Sort Of (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

In Washington, there is no higher art form than the non-denial denial, in which politicians try to rebut a storyline without quite denying the specifics.

That is what is underway now with Bob Woodward's latest book, "State of Denial," an unflattering portrait of an administration riven by discord over the Iraq war.

Mr. Woodward's narrative is unsurprising to anyone who has closely followed the Bush administration: the first-term loyalty of aides devolved into infighting as soon as no weapons of mass destruction were found in Iraq. Then the intramural squabbling turned into public protestations of "if-only-they-had-listened-to-me."

For its part, the White House did deny that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld have a private war of their own underway. But what about another disclosure that Andrew H. Card, the former White House chief of staff, twice suggested booting Mr. Rumsfeld? Mr. Card, in an interview, acknowledged the recommendation but said it came in the context of broader discussions of cabinet changes.

And what about the officials in the Bush administration who were ignored when they called for an increase in the number of troops in Iraq? Among them were Robert D. Blackwill, the Iraq coordinator at the White House, and L. Paul Bremer III, the senior American overseeing the Iraq occupation. But none, said Tony Snow, the press secretary, were in the "chain of command," meaning that they were not generals asking for more troops.

Did Mr. Bush listen only to his generals? Of course not, said the White House.

So what happened to all those recommendations? No one is willing to say.

So You Call This Breaking News? (NYT)

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

IF your head hurts from listening to the Washington furor over the latest National Intelligence Estimate, by all means tune it out. The entire debate is meaningless except as a damning election-year indicator of just how madly our leaders are fiddling while Iraq burns.

DOJ_NMG_0072192

The supposedly shocking key finding in the N.I.E. — that the Iraq war is a boon to terrorism — isn't remotely news. It first turned up in a classified C.I.A. report leaked to the press in June 2005. It's also long been visible to the naked eye. The latest New York Times/CBS News poll, conducted before any revelations from the N.I.E., found that nearly half the country believes that the Iraq war is increasing the terrorist threat against America and only 12 percent thinks the war is decreasing that threat. Americans don't have to pore over leaked intelligence documents to learn this. They just have to turn on the television.

Tonight on "60 Minutes," Bob Woodward will spill another supposedly shocking intelligence finding revealed in his new book: a secret government prediction that the insurgency will grow worse next year. Who'd have thunk it? Given that the insurgency is growing worse every day right now — last week suicide bombings hit a record high in Baghdad — the real surprise would be if the government predicted an armistice. A poll released last week by the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland found that about 6 in 10 Iraqis approved of attacks on American forces. Tardy investigative reporting is hardly needed to figure out that the insurgency is thriving.

"The insurgents know what they are doing," Mr. Woodward is to say on CBS, according to an advance excerpt. "They know the level of violence and how effective they are. Who doesn't know? The American public." He accuses the administration of keeping such information out of sight by stamping it "secret." All this, too, apparently comes as eye-opening news to Mr. Woodward three and a half years into the war; his new book's title, "State of Denial," has a self-referential ring to it. But the American public does know the level of violence all too well, and it also knows how the administration tries to cover up its failures.

That's why long ago a majority of that public judged the war a mistake and Mr. Bush a dissembler. It's only the variations on the theme that change. When the president declared last month that "the Iraqi government and the Iraqi military is committed to keeping this country together," reality was once more busily contradicting him. The Los Angeles Times reported that a third of that government wasn't showing up to parliamentary sessions and that only 1,000 Iraqi soldiers answered the American call for 4,000 reinforcements in the do-or-die battle to secure Baghdad.

Against this ominous reality, the debate over the N.I.E. is but a sideshow: politics as usual on both sides. The president reluctantly declassified what had already been leaked, somehow hoping he could override the bad headlines with Pavlovian repetition of shopworn slogans. (He said America must "stay on the offense" four times in one speech on Friday alone.) Democrats are huffily demanding that the White House release more than a few scraps of the 30-page-plus N.I.E., a debating point with no payoff. The N.I.E. is already six months out of date, and Americans can guess most of it, classified or not. In this war at this late stage, the devil can be found everywhere, not merely in the details.

The facts of Iraq are not in dispute. But the truth is that facts don't matter anyway to this administration, and that's what makes this whole N.I.E. debate beside the point. From the start, honest information has never figured into the prosecution of this war. The White House doesn't care about intelligence, good or bad, classified or unclassified, because it believes it knows best, regardless of what anyone else has to say. The debate over the latest N.I.E. or any yet to leak will not alter that fundamental and self-destructive operating principle. That's the truly bad news.

This war has now gone on so long that we tend to forget the early history that foretold the present. Yet this is the history we must remember now more than ever, because it keeps repeating itself, with ever more tragic results. In the run-up to the war, it should be recalled, the administration did not even bother to commission an N.I.E., a summary of the latest findings from every American intelligence agency, on Iraq's weapons.

Why not? The answer can be found in what remains the most revealing Iraq war document leaked to date: the Downing Street memo of July 23, 2002, written eight months before the invasion. In that secret report to the Blair government, the head of British intelligence reported on a trip to Washington, where he learned that the Bush administration was fixing the "intelligence and facts" around the predetermined policy of going to war in Iraq. If we were going to fix the intelligence anyway, there was no need for an N.I.E., except as window dressing, since it might expose the thinness of the administration's case.

A prewar N.I.E. was hastily (and sloppily) assembled only because Congress demanded it. By the time it was delivered to the Capitol after much stalling, on Oct. 1, 2002, less than two weeks remained before the House and Senate would vote on the Iraq war resolution. "No more than six senators and only a handful of House members got beyond the five-page executive summary," according to an article last spring in Foreign Affairs by Paul Pillar, the C.I.A. senior analyst for the Middle East from 2000 to 2005. In a White House press briefing after the war started, an official said Condi Rice hadn't read it at all, leaving that menial duty to her retinue of "experts."

When one senator who did read the whole N.I.E., the now retired Democrat Bob Graham of Florida, asked that a declassified version be made public so that Americans could reach their own verdicts on the war's viability, he was rebuffed. Instead the administration released a glossy white paper that trumpeted the N.I.E.'s fictions ("All intelligence experts agree that Iraq is seeking nuclear weapons") but not its doubts about much-hyped evidence like aluminum tubes and uranium from Africa. The only time the president cared about the N.I.E., a document he never wanted, was when he thought it would be politically useful in fighting growing criticism in 2003 that he had manipulated prewar intelligence. Then he authorized his own cherry-picked leaks, which Scooter Libby fed to Mr. Woodward and Judith Miller of The Times. (Neither wrote about it at the time.)

As the insurgency continued to grow in the fall of 2003, the White House again showed scant interest in reality. The American military's Central Command called for an N.I.E. instead. The existence of this second N.I.E. was only discovered in February of this year by Warren Strobel and Jonathan Landay of Knight Ridder Newspapers. It found that the growing violence in Iraq was "fueled by local conditions — not foreign terrorists — and drew strength from deep grievances, including the presence of U.S. troops." Yet the president ignored that accurate intelligence, refusing to raise troop levels and continuing to argue erroneously that the insurgency was mainly linked to Saddam and Al Qaeda. Three years later, he still makes that case rather than acknowledge that our troops are caught in the cross-fire of a civil war.

Having ignored the facts through each avoidable disaster, the White House won't change its game plan now. Quite the contrary. Its main ambition seems to be to prop up its artificial reality no matter what the evidence to the contrary. Nowhere could this be better seen than in Ms. Rice's bizarre behavior after the Bill Clinton-Chris Wallace slapdown on Fox News. Stung by the former president's charge that the Bush administration did nothing about Al Qaeda in the eight months before 9/11, she couldn't resist telling The New York Post that his statement was "flatly false."

But proof of Ms. Rice's assertion is as nonexistent as Saddam's W.M.D. As 9/11 approached, both she and Mr. Bush blew off harbingers of the attacks (including a panicked C.I.A. briefer in Crawford, according to Ron Suskind's "One Percent Doctrine"). The 9/11 commission report, which Ms. Rice cited as a corroborating source for her claims to The Post, in reality "found no indication of any further discussion" about the Qaeda threat among the president and his top aides between the arrival of that fateful Aug. 6 brief ("Bin Laden Determined to Strike in U.S.") and Sept. 10.

That the secretary of state would rush to defend the indefensible shows where this administration's priorities are: it's now every man and woman in the White House for himself and herself in defending the fictions, even four-year-old fictions, that took us into the war and botched its execution. When they talk about staying the course, what they are really talking about is protecting their spin and their reputations. They'll leave it to the 140,000-plus American troops staying the course in a quagmire to face the facts.

Blinded By Hindsight (NYT)

By Richard A. Clarke

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

FIVE years after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, three years after the 9/11 commission report, and just weeks before a national election, the issues of what happened before those attacks have resurfaced. Suddenly, we are again witnessing heated disputes about such insignificant issues as whether the Clinton administration prepared a draft "strategy" or, alternatively, "a series of required decisions" about Al Qaeda for the incoming Bush administration.

This spectacle was set off by a partisan rewriting of history billed as a television docudrama and shown on the anniversary of the attack. Mr. Clinton, justifiably, denounced the untruths about his administration's record.

But the effect of his comments was to send the nation's attention in the wrong direction — toward an argument over the minutiae of what happened a decade ago rather than on an intelligent debate of what to do now. What followed was as predictable as it was unfortunate: talk shows, Web sites and others responded with a heated, partisan exchange of accusations of who did what when.

DOJ_NMG_0072194

For most Americans the history is clear and well told in the 9/11 commission report: Almost 3,000 people were killed. In the years before that terrible day, the Clinton administration prevented some attacks and tried to destroy Al Qaeda and its leadership, but was unable to do so, in part because the institutional bureaucracy did not believe the magnitude of the threat.

As for the Bush administration, it deferred action on Al Qaeda until after 9/11, and then took a number of steps in response, including invading Iraq, but was also unable to destroy Al Qaeda or its leaders.

In short, both administrations failed.

All the finger-pointing and hunting for scapegoats last week won't rectify those failures, or help us avoid future ones. Fortunately, unlike too many of our political leaders and pundits, most Americans are far more concerned about what we are doing now in the name of fighting terrorism than about petty partisan bickering about the past.

The greatest problem we face is that while the 9/11 attacks should have united us as a nation — and for a while they did — such unity has badly eroded. To recreate that national purpose, we need to understand why the erosion occurred.

First and most obviously, the invasion and occupation of Iraq shattered the post-9/11 American consensus. The ham-handed attempts to erroneously link Iraq with the Qaeda attacks destroyed the government's credibility with much of the country. That needed trust was undermined further last week in a National Intelligence Estimate that showed that our soldiers' sacrifices have not weakened the terrorist movement.

A broad consensus in America on Iraq may now be impossible. President Bush could, however, move in that direction by admitting there is a serious problem with the current strategy and taking advice from a bipartisan group of respected experts to recommend a way forward that concentrates on protecting such basic national interests as preventing Iraq from continuing to be an anarchic failed state where terrorists can train. The Iraq Study Group, created at the urging of Congress in March and led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Representative Lee Hamilton, might perform that service.

A second erosive factor was what appeared to many as the administration's willingness to use 9/11 as an excuse to strengthen presidential power and erode fundamental American civil liberties. Particularly troublesome to me, as someone who was at the nexus of the government's intelligence networks for many years, was the National Security Agency's illegal wiretapping of phones in the United States without a warrant, and also the abandoning of our treaty obligations under the Geneva Conventions by engaging in "alternative interrogation techniques" at the C.I.A.'s secret prisons.

This is not to say our holdover intelligence rules are adequate. Congress refused to give the Clinton administration the broadened terrorism wiretapping and surveillance authority it sought, but is now swinging to the other extreme of being willing to do away with effective judicial supervision of surveillance in the United States. It should be possible to devise a system that permits needed surveillance of the vast traffic in voice and e-mail messages, but requires judicial involvement before information is disseminated and periodic Congressional oversight to prevent abuse.

Third, and perhaps most disruptive to national unity on terrorism, is a widespread sense that some in government have been waving the bloody shirt — scaring voters with the hobgoblin of Al Qaeda to reap political advantage.

If we are going to defeat the enemy, we must learn again to discuss our differences about Iraq and terrorism in civil and analytical terms. We must reject the use of fear and terrorism to divide America for political advantage. And we must not let ourselves get trapped in pointless, partisan debates that result only in having the past obscure the future.

Detainee Memo Created Divide In White House (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

In June 2005, two senior national security officials in the Bush administration came together to propose a sweeping new approach to the growing problems the United States was facing with the detention, interrogation and prosecution of terrorism suspects.

In a nine-page memorandum, the two officials, Gordon R. England, the acting deputy secretary of defense, and Philip D. Zelikow, the counselor of the State Department, urged the administration to seek Congressional approval for its detention policies.

They called for a return to the minimum standards of treatment in the Geneva Conventions and for eventually closing the detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. The time had come, they said, for suspects in the 9/11 plot to be taken out of their secret prison cells and tried before military tribunals.

The recommendations of the paper, which has not previously been disclosed, included several of the major policy shifts that President Bush laid out in a White House address on Sept. 6, five officials who read the document said. But the memorandum's fate underscores the deep, long-running conflicts over detention policy that continued to divide the administration even as it pushed new legislation through Congress last week on the handling of terrorism suspects.

When the paper first circulated in the upper reaches of the administration, two of those officials said, it so angered Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld that his aides gathered up copies of the document and had at least some of them shredded.

"It was not in step with the secretary of defense or the president," said one Defense Department official who, like many others, would discuss the internal deliberations only on condition of anonymity. "It was clear that Rumsfeld was very unhappy."

The internal debate over detention issues that began within weeks after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, has come to light before. But interviews show that the struggle, pitting top officials against one another, intensified behind the scenes over the last year as criticism of the administration's approach grew in the United States and abroad. Crucial elements of that approach were struck down by the Supreme Court on June 29, forcing a resolution of disputes that had gone on for months.

On one side of the fight were officials, often led by Vice President Dick Cheney, who said the terrorism threat required that the president have wide power to decide who could be held and how they should be treated. On the other side were officials, primarily in the State Department and the Pentagon, who portrayed their disagreement as pragmatic. They said the administration had claimed more authority than it needed, drawing widespread criticism and challenges in the courts.

Those officials initially hailed the president's Sept. 6 announcement. Mr. Bush publicly discussed the Central Intelligence Agency's secret detention program for the first time, saying he had ordered its remaining 14 prisoners sent to Guantánamo and tried before military tribunals. The same day, Pentagon officials presented new directives that effectively renounced military use of highly coercive interrogation methods.

But even as the White House negotiated with Congress in recent weeks, administration forces led by the vice president's office reasserted themselves. Officials said Mr. Cheney's staff and its bureaucratic allies — having agreed reluctantly to the disclosure of the C.I.A. operation and other changes — were closely involved in guiding the talks with Republican senators. Their adversaries in the administration, meanwhile, had to scramble just to keep up with details of the bargaining.

"Basically, they were left to get back whatever they could from Congress," one senior administration official said of the Cheney group. "And they did."

In the end, the White House pressed Republican senators to accept a broad definition of "unlawful enemy combatants" whom the government can hold indefinitely, to maintain some of the president's control over C.I.A. interrogation methods and to allow the government to present some evidence in military tribunals that is based on hearsay or has been coerced from witnesses.

The administration did concede to the senators on some rules for military commissions, as the tribunals are called. It also backed off its effort to limit its obligations under the Geneva Conventions, but fought to ensure that government personnel would be immunized from prosecution for any treatment of detainees before the end of 2005 that was cruel, inhuman or degrading.

Still, several officials said privately that the detainee legislation might fail to meet a primary goal of those inside the administration who had advocated change: quelling domestic and international criticism and moving past the federal lawsuits that have tied up parts of the detention apparatus since 2002.

"There have been so many times when we thought we had broken through and turned things around, and then the forces on the other side kept charging back," said one administration lawyer who has supported such changes. Now, the official added, "even after what was supposed to be this major legislation to resolve these issues, we are going to be back at it."

At the time the England-Zelikow memorandum was written, in mid-June 2005, several officials said they saw little enthusiasm for reconsidering the detention system that had been set up after 9/11, primarily by a small group of lawyers in the White House, the Justice Department and the Defense Department.

DOJ_NMG_0072196

That system had begun to come under increasing attack. An erroneous item in Newsweek magazine, about a Koran being flushed down a toilet at Guantánamo, led to violent demonstrations overseas. Criticism of the detention camp grew sharper in Europe. Some influential Republicans in Congress began to voice complaints as well.

Mr. Zelikow, who served as staff director for the national commission that investigated the 9/11 attacks, joined the State Department in early 2005 with strong views on the detention issue, other officials said. Early on, he began to push the idea that high-level C.I.A. captives held in connection with the 9/11 attacks should be brought to justice, these officials said.

Mr. England took over as Mr. Rumsfeld's acting deputy in April 2005 while continuing to serve as secretary of the Navy. (He was confirmed as deputy secretary in April 2006.) He, too, had experience with the detainee issue, having spent months working to overhaul what many military officers saw as a flawed screening process for prisoners at Guantánamo.

Two other officials who had worked extensively on detention issues during Mr. Bush's first term also participated in the drafting of the memorandum, officials said. One of them, Matthew C. Waxman, was Mr. Rumsfeld's chief aide for detainee issues. The other, John B. Bellinger III, was the State Department's legal counsel.

The proposals in the paper were not entirely new. But what was different, one administration official said, was an effort at "a big-bang solution," to persuade senior officials or the president himself to adopt a comprehensive new approach to the detention problems of the policy. Failing that, officials said, the authors hoped to foster new debate about how to shape a strategy that would be more sustainable diplomatically, politically and in the federal courts.

Three years after Mr. Bush had determined he would not apply the Geneva Conventions in fighting terrorists, the memorandum urged a return to the conventions' minimum standards, including the ban on "humiliating and degrading treatment" contained in the provision known as Common Article 3. The authors advocated that move not because they believed it was required by international law, officials said, but to win broader support from American allies and make court intervention less likely.

The paper did not advocate abandoning the covert interrogation program, but restricting it to the shorter-term questioning of more important suspects, officials said. After repatriating many of the Guantánamo detainees, the authors argued, the detention center could be shut down and the remaining prisoners transferred to a long-term detention facility in the United States. They did not specify what kind of facility it should be, two of the officials who read the paper said.

In a passage that underscored the views of Mr. Zelikow, one official said, the paper argued that efforts to bring to justice the perpetrators of the 9/11 attacks must produce more than the chaotic trial of Zacarias Moussaoui, the French-born militant who remains the only person to have been charged in an American court with involvement in the attacks.

The paper specifically called for taking Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and others held by the C.I.A. before military commissions, officials said, arguing that much of the information that would be disclosed by their trials was already widely known.

Officials said the memorandum was well received by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who forwarded it to senior officials at the National Security Council. But the hope that it would lead to a broader discussion of options within the administration was quashed by Mr. Rumsfeld, they said.

Some of the defense secretary's ire over the paper appeared to be substantive, several Pentagon officials said. At various times, Mr. Rumsfeld raised objections to taking over responsibility for the C.I.A. detainees, and he was reluctant to consider closing Guantánamo without a viable alternative in sight, the officials said.

Most important, they said, Mr. Rumsfeld was angered that his new deputy, Mr. England, had worked on the memorandum with officials outside the Pentagon without his authorization. "England's wings got clipped after that," one Defense Department aide said.

A spokesman for the department, Col. Gary L. Keck, said it would not discuss its deliberations on detainee policy or any "predecisional documents." But he denied that Mr. Rumsfeld was ever angered by those deliberations or instructed anyone to destroy documents.

"This is a difficult and complex issue that has profound operational, diplomatic, legal and political implications not only for the Department of Defense, but for many other executive agencies," Colonel Keck said in a statement. "In any discussion on such an important topic there will be differences of opinion — this is to be expected."

In early August 2005, after a long internal debate, new rules for the Guantánamo military tribunals were published which did not include changes that many military lawyers had advocated. Officials said David S. Addington, who was then Mr. Cheney's counsel and is now his chief of staff, was prominent among those who opposed modifications like an explicit ban on evidence obtained by torture, contending that it would wrongly hint that the government had sanctioned torture at all.

At the Pentagon, Mr. England continued to pursue the idea of adopting Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions in a directive that would set guidelines for prisoner treatment and interrogations. In late August, he called a meeting with some of the vice chiefs of staff of the armed forces and senior uniformed and civilian lawyers to consider the matter.

According to officials who attended the meeting, several of those present spoke in favor of the Geneva provision, including the senior Army lawyer, Maj. Gen. Thomas J. Romig. In an unusual move, Mr. England called for a show of hands. All but two of those present endorsed the provision. But those two officials were among the most influential in the room: the department's under secretary for intelligence, Stephen A. Cambone, and its general counsel, William J. Haynes II.

Their concerns, which were later echoed by aides to Mr. Cheney, started with the fact that the president had explicitly rejected the Geneva standard in February 2002. They also disputed the idea that Article 3 would necessarily give clear guidance to soldiers, citing what they called its vague prohibition on "outrages upon personal dignity."

Debate over both the proposed prisoner-treatment directive and an Army field manual for interrogations would go on for another year. For the time being, though, the idea of adopting Common Article 3 directly as the standard of treatment went no further.

There was little high-level discussion of alternatives to Guantánamo, several officials said. But the C.I.A.'s secret prisons had been a subject of rising concern since at least 2004, when unease over the open-ended detentions became evident within the agency and the Supreme Court ruled that detainees held by the United States at Guantánamo — and, by implication, elsewhere around the world — could challenge their detention in American courts.

By late 2005, as reports in The Washington Post and other news media about the secret prisons raised a storm of complaints among foreign governments, the C.I.A. began to move more quickly to transfer some captives to the custody of their own and other foreign governments, officials familiar with the program said.

By the end of 2005, military lawyers also began to review the C.I.A.'s evidentiary files on the high-value detainees to consider their possible prosecution by the military commissions at Guantánamo. Ultimately, military officials concluded that they could make solid cases against the C.I.A. prisoners without unduly exposing the agency's covert program or even having to depend heavily on statements that had been obtained during highly coercive interrogations, several officials said.

There was also new pressure for action from within the C.I.A. Intelligence officers involved in detention and interrogations were increasingly worried about the legal implications of the program, officials said. Some foreign governments had declined to house covert detention centers, and the furor over those sites created friction with other intelligence agencies, the officials said.

Still, some senior figures in the administration, including Mr. Cheney and his chief of staff, Mr. Addington, remained unconvinced that the C.I.A. program could be made public and its prisoners taken before military commissions while continuing to protect what they saw as a vital intelligence asset, several officials said.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, Lea Anne McBride, said his office would have no comment on its role in policy deliberations, as did spokesmen for the State Department and the National Security Council.

"The problem fell for some period of time into the too-hard category," one senior administration official said. "It fell so far into the too-hard category that it was lost from view."

Interagency meetings on the detention issue with officials just below the cabinet level went around and around for months, officials said. In the late spring, they added, the president's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, began pushing senior officials to agree on options they could present to the president.

Many officials said the most important factor in forcing a new approach was the Supreme Court's ruling in June that the military commissions set up by the administration could not proceed. That decision, which also upheld the minimum Geneva standards of prisoner treatment as binding law, led the administration to seek Congressional authorization for new tribunals and, some officials said, left the C.I.A.'s interrogation program on even more tenuous ground.

DOJ_NMG_0072198

In late July, two officials said, Mr. Rumsfeld and his aides dropped their longstanding concerns about taking custody of the C.I.A. detainees, and Mr. Hadley moved to approve the arrangements for their transfer to Guantánamo.

The two officials said that Mr. Cheney was never entirely persuaded of the wisdom of emptying the C.I.A.'s detention sites and making its interrogation program public, but supported the move when Mr. Bush decided in late August to go ahead.

"The vice president knows the president has made the right decisions to make Americans safer and support the men and women on the front lines in the war on terror who are fighting this brutal enemy," Mr. Cheney's spokeswoman, Ms. McBride, said.

The element of the new legislation that raised the sharpest criticism among legal scholars and human rights advocates last week was the scaling back of the habeas corpus right of terrorism suspects to challenge their detention in the federal courts. But in dozens of high-level meetings on detention policy, officials said, that provision was scarcely even discussed.

Profiles In Cowardice (WP)

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

On prisoner abuse and detention, President Bush finds enablers in both parties.

ONCE AGAIN, with a midterm election looming, President Bush stoked and won a major legislative confrontation over a complex national security question. Four years ago, it was the Iraq war resolution and reorganization of the government's homeland security functions. In both cases, hindsight suggests that haste and political pressure foreclosed the kind of nuanced debate that might have served the nation well. The same is likely to prove true of legislation passed last week on the treatment, detention and trial of enemy combatants.

But the artificial emergency Mr. Bush created has served his political purpose. His goal was to press opponents to cave to his will, against their better judgment, or to create an issue allowing his party to tar the opposition as soft on terrorism. In this case, thanks in part to the Democrats' weak-hearted abdication, he got both.

Congress had to act immediately, Mr. Bush insisted, or else terrorists could not face justice and the CIA could not interrogate the enemy. But the president says the CIA is not holding anyone, and the administration has dawdled for years without getting military trials off the ground. The only relevant deadline was Nov. 7.

Mr. Bush must bear responsibility for his cynical pursuit of the wrong answer, but he could not have prevailed without a lot of help. Republicans in both chambers, forgetting that Congress is supposed to be an independent branch, snapped to attention when the president told them what to do. At least some of them obviously knew better. Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) courageously championed an amendment to restore the judicial oversight that Mr. Bush opposed. When his amendment failed on a 51 to 48 vote, the senator said he would vote against the bill, calling it "patently unconstitutional on its face." Then he voted for it. The bill, he explained, had good points, and the courts "will clean it up."

Democrats hoped that they could duck behind Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and two other Republicans who for a time fought a lonely fight for a better bill. When the three renegades settled for very little, the Democrats were left exposed, and it wasn't pretty. Nearly all of them voted for Mr. Specter's amendment, yet 12 -- including Joe Lieberman (Conn.) and three other senators facing reelection -- voted for the bill afterward. The rest contented themselves by voting no but did not lift a finger to slow it down or stop it.

"By allowing this administration to further stretch the definition of what is and is not torture," Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) said, "we lower our moral standards to those whom we despise, undermine the values of our flag wherever it flies, put our troops in danger and jeopardize our moral strength in a conflict that cannot be won simply with military might." Stirring words -- but apparently not stirring enough to justify a filibuster.

Only a couple of weeks ago, the Senate was poised to move constructive legislation that would have given the administration the tools it needs but not the power to disappear people into secret prisons and interrogate them using techniques too shameful to name in public. Yet Mr. Bush's pressure tactics worked again. He has the lamentable legislation he wanted -- which will bring discredit onto this country in any number of ways -- and Republicans are busily blasting Democrats as terrorist-coddlers anyway.

What My Father Saw At Nuremberg (LAT)

By Christopher Dodd, Sen. Christopher Dodd (d-conn.) Is A Senior Member Of The Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0072199

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Sixty years ago today, my father watched the U.S. win the battle of ideas. Have we lost our way?

SIXTY YEARS AGO today, at the Palace of Justice in Nuremberg, Germany, the verdicts were read in a trial that will forever define the punishment of war criminals. One by one, the 22 top surviving Nazi officers of Adolf Hitler were sentenced. By the time the gavel sounded, three had been acquitted, seven sent to prison and 12 condemned to death.

One of the people in court that day was my father, 38-year-old attorney Thomas Dodd, who was the No. 2 prosecutor for the United States behind Supreme Court Justice Robert Jackson. My father always considered Nuremberg to be the most meaningful experience of his life.

My father wrote more than 400 letters to my mother from Nuremberg. Many are devoted to how much he missed his wife and children; others to the Nazis he had met.

But some of his harshest words were reserved for the Russians, who had little interest in a fair trial. In one letter, he tells the story of a toast offered by a visiting Soviet dignitary, who raised a glass and said: "May the road for these war criminals from the courthouse to the grave be a very short one."

"I winced," my father wrote, "and I could see that Judge [John J.] Parker, the American alternative, was certainly embarrassed."

But of course, a quick trial that led to quick executions was the temptation. The world had seen a monstrous regime try to conquer the world. It had seen them take the lives of more than tens of millions of men, women and children.

Why not just give in to vengeance? Why not just shoot them, as Winston Churchill wanted to do? Why not just succumb to the law of power politics and impose our will without any regard to principle? Why not just give in to violence, which was certainly within our ability and, many argued, within our right?

Why not? Because the United States has always stood for something more.

When we entered World War II, we did not fight for land or for treasure — we fought for an idea. The idea that laws should rule the land, not men; that the principles of justice embodied in our Declaration of Independence and Constitution — of due process, of innocence until proven guilty, of the right to a fair trial — do not get suspended for vengeance.

At Nuremberg, we rejected the certainty of execution for the uncertainty of a trial. The test was one of principle over power, and the United States passed.

President Harry Truman understood that our nation's ability to bring about a world of peace and justice was rooted not in our military might but in our moral authority; not on the ability to compel people with our tanks and planes but to convince them that our values and our ideals were right. He understood that our ability to succeed in spreading American values of freedom and human rights are only as effective as our willingness to uphold them.

Over the last six decades, that moral authority helped persuade more than half the nations of the world to embrace freedom and free markets. But now that they are walking with us, why are we walking away from them?

Today, we debate secret prisons, suspension of habeas corpus, warrant-less searches and wiretaps. The president even asks us to reinterpret the Geneva accords to sanction the torture of enemy prisoners.

Just as the word "Nuremberg" once defined the United States' moral authority and commitment to justice, what we risk today is that, one day, the loss of that moral authority and a commitment to injustice may also be defined by a single word: "Guantanamo."

Once again, the question is being asked: Why not just give in to vengeance and show our enemies less mercy than they showed their victims? Why not just abandon due process and the rule of law and the right to a fair trial?

Because the United States stands for something more.

Now, as then, this nation should never tailor its eternal principles to the conflict of the moment, because if we do, we will be walking in the footsteps of the enemies we despise. By abandoning the rule of law, as Congress did last week, we will lose much more than what we gain.

In the end, it's not about them — it's about us. It's about staying true to the values and principles that have always made our nation unique.

DOJ_NMG_0072200

We would do well to remember the words of Justice Jackson: "We must never forget that the record on which we judge these defendants today is the record on which history will judge us tomorrow. To pass these defendants a poisoned chalice is to put it to our own lips as well."

Australian At Guantanamo To Be Among First Tried By U.S. Military Commissions (HC/AP)

By Rod Mcguirk, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

CANBERRA, Australia — The only Australian held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, will be among the first terror suspects tried by the overhauled U.S. military commission system within months, Australia's attorney general said Sunday.

With domestic pressure mounting on the center-right government over how long alleged Taliban fighter David Hicks has spent at the U.S. naval base in Cuba, Attorney General Philip Ruddock met with his U.S. counterpart Alberto Gonzales last week to press for a speedy resolution. He returned home Sunday.

"It ought to be a matter that can be dealt with quickly. We've said it should be dealt with quickly and they've said to us it will be among the first cases to be heard," Ruddock told Australian Broadcasting Corp. television.

"They don't think it will be within weeks — obviously the process of regulations, choosing those who will serve on the commissions will take perhaps even some months — but they're very conscious of our view that this needs to happen very expeditiously," he said.

Hicks, a 31-year-old former kangaroo skinner, was arrested by the Northern Alliance in Afghanistan in December 2001 and was later charged with attempted murder, conspiracy to commit war crimes and aiding the enemy.

Congress last week approved legislation that addressed a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June that the commissions were illegal. But regulations have yet to be put in place and new charges would need to be drafted, Ruddock aid.

The legislation Congress sent President Bush Friday endorses his plan to interrogate and prosecute terror suspects and sets the rules for court proceedings. It would only apply to those selected by the military for prosecution and leaves mostly unaffected the majority of the 14,000 prisoners in U.S. custody, most of whom are in Iraq.

The Pentagon had previously selected 10 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay prison to be tried and Bush is expected also to try some or all of the 14 suspects held by the CIA in secret prisons and recently transferred to military custody at Guantanamo.

Gulf Nations Fortify Against Terror Attacks (WT)

By From Combined Dispatches

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates -- America's allies in the Persian Gulf are at least as worried about terrorism as the United States, spending billions of dollars on security fences in the desert, eye-scanning machines at airports and other measures to keep out militants.

Saudi Arabia, for example, has ordered the construction of a 550-mile fence with state-of-the art technology to seal off its troubled northern neighbor, Iraq.

The barrier, which will be equipped with ultraviolet night-vision cameras, buried sensor cables and thousands of miles of barbed wire, will snake across the vast and remote desert frontier between the countries, the London Sunday Telegraph reported in today's editions.

The fence will be built despite the hundreds of millions of dollars that the Saudi kingdom has spent in the past two years to beef up patrols on its border with Iraq, with officials saying the crisis in Iraq is now so dangerous it must be physically shut out.

"Surveillance has already been stepped up over the past 18 months," said Nawaf Obaid, the director of the Saudi National Security Assessment Project, an institute that advises the government on security affairs.

"But the feeling in Saudi is that Iraq is way out of control, with no possibility of stability. The urgency now is to get that border sealed -- physically sealed," Mr. Obaid said.

Al Qaeda's warning that the Gulf is among its next targets is prompting increased security measures among the affluent Arab countries that have largely been spared major violence so far.

DOJ_NMG_0072201

They have a lot to lose. Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Bahrain, Oman and the United Arab Emirates are enjoying tremendous economic growth, boosted by oil money and also because they are seen by investors as islands of stability in a volatile region.

Saudi Arabia asked American forces to leave in 2003, ending a presence that fueled militants' anger against the kingdom and sparked terrorist attacks, including the truck bomb that killed 19 U.S. service members and a Saudi citizen in 1996.

In a video posted Monday on the Internet, al Qaeda's No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahri, said al Qaeda would soon turn to the other Gulf states.

He addressed Americans, saying "you will be thrown out [of the Gulf] after you are defeated in Iraq, at which point your economic ruin will be achieved." He also threatened Israel.

So far, al Qaeda's main effort in the Gulf has been in Saudi Arabia, Osama bin Laden's homeland, where the terror group's branch has killed dozens over the past few years.

The kingdom responded with a vigorous anti-terrorism campaign and says it has killed or capturing most of al Qaeda's local leadership. Militants have not carried out a major attack in Saudi Arabia since February, when al Qaeda guerrillas tried to bomb an oil refinery.

Saudi Arabia has announced it will spend $12 billion on a complex border defense system of electronic sensors, bases, and physical barriers to be built first along its long frontier with Iraq.

It is also considering a special oil-sector security force and an intelligence agency focusing on threats to the energy industry, Mr. Obaid told the Associated Press.

Saudi Arabia's success might not translate into security for its neighbors, however.

"It's gotten harder and harder for al Qaeda to strike inside Saudi Arabia, so we may see them move into one of the other Gulf countries," Mr. Obaid said.

Kuwait, the main U.S. military staging area for the war in Iraq, saw heavy battles with anti-American militants in 2005. Government forces learned the guerillas planned to attack U.S. military targets and responded with raids that killed nine militants and captured dozens. Four policemen were killed.

In Qatar, militants used a car bomb to attack a theater in March 2005, killing a Briton and wounding 12 persons.

The UAE has not seen any attacks, but there are many factors that could make it a prime target.

The country is home to a U.S. air base and the freewheeling and cosmopolitan UAE also welcomes Westerners for beach vacations that can involve alcohol and prostitution.

It also has in Dubai the Middle East's busiest airport, accepts more U.S. Navy port visits than any other country in the world, and contributes a special forces team to fight the Taliban in Afghanistan.

That hasn't escaped notice by militants. A government official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, said several plots had been broken up and would-be terrorists arrested -- some of whom were handed over to American authorities.

The UAE already maintains what is believed to be the world's largest identity database of iris scans, which allows ironclad identity checks aimed at preventing those deported from the country from re-entering with false documents.

At the same time, it is building a wall along its border with Oman -- mainly to keep out illegal workers, though militants could try to exploit the porous frontier.

U.S., EU Unable To Reach Deal On Passenger Data (WT/AP)

By Leslie Miller, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

The United States and the European Union failed to reach a new deal on sharing air passenger data by yesterday's deadline, though officials disagreed about the impact on trans-Atlantic air travel.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the failure to agree wouldn't disrupt trans-Atlantic air travel.

Mr. Chertoff said in a telephone interview that he was sending EU representatives "an initial proposed agreement, which I think embodies what their fundamental requirements for data protection are so we can do what we need to protect our borders.

DOJ_NMG_0072202

"If they're prepared to accept and sign, great. If we have to have additional talks, fine."

European Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said there would be a "legal vacuum" as of midnight.

"We have to discuss on commission level what to do next," Mr. Todd said. He said the EU executive would debate the issue Thursday.

Mr. Chertoff said he'd been assured that European airlines would continue to transmit passenger data and said he didn't think European governments would penalize them for doing so.

"The talks did not break down," Mr. Chertoff said. "Their delegation had to go home and that's fine."

Data including passengers' names, addresses and credit card details must be transferred to U.S. authorities within 15 minutes of a flight's departure for the United States.

The EU's top court in May ruled that the deal put in place after the September 11 attacks on the United States was illegal because it was not using the right legal basis under EU law. It did not rule on the deal's content.

An EU court allowed the data to keep flowing until Sept. 30 to give officials time to negotiate a new deal.

Washington has warned that airlines failing to share passenger information face fines of up to $6,000 per passenger and the loss of landing rights.

Without the deal, airlines that hand over passenger data to U.S. authorities could face legal action from national data protection authorities in EU states, the commission said.

Mr. Chertoff, though, said he had been assured that airlines would continue to transmit the data. "There's no intention for them to interfere with the continued transmission," he said.

He also said he didn't expect airlines to be fined.

"I don't envision that while we're in these discussions any country in Europe is going to take some precipitous step to put the airlines in a difficult position," he said.

Mr. Chertoff said there is no legal vacuum because U.S. law is clear that airlines have to provide information about people entering this country.

"This should not be a big issue," he said. "I can tell you from dealing with the negotiators who were over here that everybody's negotiating in good faith."

Senate Unanimously Ratifies U.S., U.K. Extradition Treaty (BLOOM)

By Carlos Torres

Bloomberg, October 1, 2006

Sept. 30 (Bloomberg) -- The Senate early today unanimously ratified an extradition treaty between the U.S. and the U.K., three years after it was signed, according to the U.S. embassy in London.

The treaty, which speeds extradition of prisoners between the two countries, was negotiated in 2003. The British have granted the U.S. some of the pact's benefits pending ratification by the Senate. The lack of U.S. approval had become a political issue in the U.K., highlighted by protests in July over the extradition of three British bankers accused of fraud in the Enron Corp. scandal.

The British bankers were sent to face trial in Houston after fighting extradition for three years. They pleaded not guilty to fraud charges July 14. The bankers are accused of bilking their former employer, Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc's Greenwich NatWest subsidiary, of millions of dollars from the sale of an Enron off-the-books partnership.

``We can now have a fully modernized extradition relationship that helps to protect citizens of both of our countries and to improve the administration of justice," Robert Tuttle, U.S. ambassador to Britain, said in a statement on the embassy's Web site.

British Home Secretary John Reid said he was ``delighted" senators had backed the treaty, Agence France-Presse reported.

``The treaty is an important measure in our fight against serious international crime," Reid said in a statement, AFP reported.

The treaty, first sent to the Senate for approval in April 2004, lowers the level of proof the U.S. must show to win extradition of a suspect. It also permits temporary surrender of fugitives for trial who are already serving a prison sentence in the other country.

DOJ_NMG_0072203

Ratification had been slowed by complaints from some Irish- American groups that the treaty would create new legal jeopardy for U.S. citizens who opposed British policy in Northern Ireland.

The Laughing 9/11 Bombers Yosri Fouda (UKT)

UK Times, October 1, 2006

Exclusive film of suicide pilots at Bin Laden's HQ

FILM of the ringleader of the September 11 hijackers reading his "martyrdom" will inside Afghanistan at Osama Bin Laden's headquarters has emerged five years after the Al-Qaeda outrage.

It is the first time that a videotape has appeared of Mohammed Atta — who flew an American Airlines plane into the north tower of the World Trade Center — at a training camp in Afghanistan. It fills in a significant gap in the timing of the build-up to the attacks on the United States.

Dates on the tape show Atta was filmed on January 18, 2000, together with Ziad Jarrah, the pilot of United Airlines flight 93, which crashed in Pennsylvania after the passengers apparently stormed the flight deck.

The Sunday Times has obtained a copy of the video through a previously tested channel. The tape has no soundtrack and a US source said lip readers had tried without success to decipher what was being said.

Despite the deadly tasks the men had been assigned, they appear in high spirits, laughing and smiling in front of the camera. Only when Atta, with an AK-47 propped on a wall beside him, reads a document marked in Arabic "the will", does he become solemn. Both are well groomed, without the haggard appearance of the identity mugshots issued after September 11.

The high quality, unedited film shows Bin Laden addressing his followers at the mud-walled complex near Kandahar. One of the main figures in the September 11 plot, Ramzi Binalshibh, is identifiable in the crowd, as is a bodyguard whose task was to kill Bin Laden with two bullets to the head if he faced capture.

Dating on the tape indicates that the Al-Qaeda leader was filmed on January 8, 2000, 10 days before Atta and Jarrah recorded their wills.

American and German investigators have struggled to find evidence of Atta's whereabouts in January 2000 after he disappeared from Hamburg. The hour-long tape places him in Afghanistan at a decisive moment in the development of the conspiracy when he was given operational command. Months later both he and Jarrah enrolled at flying schools in America.

Investigators have also puzzled over the fact that unlike the rest of the hijackers — most of whom were young Saudi fundamentalists — Atta and Jarrah were well educated and appeared to fit into western society while studying in Germany. The video indicates how easily they slipped from a western identity to a fundamentalist one. It also shows up the subterfuge they maintained in Germany and America that they did not know each other, all part of evading detection.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Anthrax Dispute Suggests Bioshield Woes (AP)

By Paul Elias

AP, October 1, 2006

By now, millions of anthrax vaccine shots developed through cutting-edge genetic engineering were supposed to be filling a new national stockpile of biodefense drugs. Instead, five years after anthrax attacks left five dead, sickened 17 and panicked the country, the nearly $1 billion contract awarded by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services to a tiny and struggling San Francisco Bay Area biotechnology company is plagued with misfortune and delays.

Delivery has been put off until at least 2008 — and maybe later — while the government and VaxGen Inc. trade barbs over who is at fault. The dispute has further tarnished Project Bioshield, a government program that has alienated many potential biodefense contractors.

"We have all come to understand that there is more complexity than it originally appeared," said Thomas Inglesby, deputy director of the University of Pittsburgh's Center for Biosecurity.

DOJ_NMG_0072204

The anthrax attacks of 2001 prompted passage of Project Bioshield, which promised to build national drug stockpiles to be used in case of a bioterror attack.

The project was supposed to jump start a national security renaissance among drug makers by guaranteeing contracts to develop drugs for combatting potential bioweapons. But it has been greeted with skepticism by many in the industry.

The anthrax project, the first and largest Bioshield contract, was to be the crown jewel.

In November 2004, the $877.5 million contract was awarded to VaxGen to genetically engineer a replacement for the current anthrax vaccine, which requires six shots to be administered over 18 months. VaxGen's is expected to require no more than three shots.

Since winning the contract, however, VaxGen has repeatedly stumbled, starting with its disclosure it would miss the original deadline of November 2005 by a year.

Even before winning the contract, the Brisbane-based company had a checkered past highlighted by the 2003 flop of its experimental AIDS vaccine, which failed to protect inoculated volunteers from getting infected.

Since then, it was dropped from the Nasdaq Stock Market for failing to file financial reports, its chief scientific officer left the company in July, and its stock price hovers near $4.40 — at the low end of its 52-week range — as VaxGen and the government try to work out their differences.

Then, in March, the government said it wouldn't pay VaxGen until the company completed a costly and time-consuming human test to ensure the vaccine was safe. The new requirement forced the company to sell its stake in another biotechnology company for $79 million to stay afloat and finance the new test.

"We don't get paid until we deliver product and we have to shoulder the carrying cost," said VaxGen spokesman Lance Ignon. "The burden it puts on our company is abundantly clear to Wall Street as shown by our stock price."

For its part, VaxGen blames the government for the latest delays.

"The heart of the problem right now is the government's willingness to change the goal line," Ignon said. "The government unilaterally, and without compensation to VaxGen, changed the contract."

The government counters that the safety data was always required and that it made minor changes that allowed VaxGen to deliver the vaccine later than it had initially promised.

Last month, Sens. Joe Lieberman and Susan Collins called for a congressional investigation of the VaxGen contract.

VaxGen's difficulties underscore the industry's disappointment with Bioshield, which has done little but generate indifference among the big pharmaceutical companies the government hoped to woo. Instead, drug makers are snubbing the program because of liability and intellectual property issues and confusion over what the government wants.

New legislation that would address many of the critics' concerns — such as protecting drug makers from liability lawsuits — has been bottled up in Congress for months and the prospect of a bill passing this year are dimming.

Big pharmaceutical companies, which can spend upward of $1 billion developing a single drug that can earn billions annually, are also turned off by the relatively paltry $5.6 billion available under Bioshield, analysts said.

Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the Washington-based trade group that represents drug makers, wouldn't comment on why its members have shunned Project Bioshield but said it supports the program.

"PhRMA continues to work closely with the Congress and the Administration to help ensure that America has the necessary tools to help prepare for and respond to a possible bioterror attack," Ken Johnson, the group's senior vice president, said in a statement.

Producing defensive measures has been largely left to small, financially struggling companies such as the oft-troubled VaxGen.

Despite its laundry list of failures, HHS has defended VaxGen's qualifications.

"The incentive is not there for the large pharmaceutical companies," said Noreen Hynes, director of research and development coordination in the HHS office responsible for biodefense. "Biotech companies, for the most part, are more inexperienced."

DOJ_NMG_0072205

Since awarding the contract to VaxGen, HHS has doled out another $1 billion in contracts, including two this year worth a combined $505 million to the Canadian company Cangene Corp. for another anthrax treatment, as well as a drug to treat botulism.

None of the other drug developers have stumbled as spectacularly as VaxGen.

"The fact that a company doesn't deliver is always disappointing," Hynes said. But in vaccine and biological development, "delays are more the rule than the exception."

Why I'm Banned In The USA (WP)

By Tariq Ramadan

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

LONDON

For more than two years now, the U.S. government has barred me from entering the United States to pursue an academic career. The reasons have changed over time, and have evolved from defamatory to absurd, but the effect has remained the same: I've been kept out.

First, I was told that I could not enter the country because I had endorsed terrorism and violated the USA Patriot Act. It took a lawsuit for the government eventually to abandon this baseless accusation. Later, I reapplied for a visa, twice, only to hear nothing for more than a year. Finally, just 10 days ago, after a federal judge forced the State Department to reconsider my application, U.S. authorities offered a new rationale for turning me away: Between 1998 and 2002, I had contributed small sums of money to a French charity supporting humanitarian work in the Palestinian territories.

I am increasingly convinced that the Bush administration has barred me for a much simpler reason: It doesn't care for my political views. In recent years, I have publicly criticized U.S. policy in the Middle East, the war in Iraq, the use of torture, secret CIA prisons and other government actions that undermine fundamental civil liberties. And for many years, through my research and writing and speeches, I have called upon Muslims to better understand the principles of their own faith, and have sought to show that one can be Muslim and Western at the same time.

My experience reveals how U.S. authorities seek to suppress dissenting voices and -- by excluding people such as me from their country -- manipulate political debate in America. Unfortunately, the U.S. government's paranoia has evolved far beyond a fear of particular individuals and taken on a much more insidious form: the fear of ideas.

In January 2004, I was offered a job at the University of Notre Dame, as a professor of Islamic studies and as Luce professor of religion, conflict and peace-building. I accepted the tenured position enthusiastically and looked forward to joining the academic community in the United States. After the government granted me a work visa, I rented a home in South Bend, Ind., enrolled my children in school there and shipped all of my household belongings. Then, in July, the government notified me that my visa had been revoked. It did not offer a specific explanation, but pointed to a provision of the Patriot Act that applies to people who have "endorsed or espoused" terrorist activity.

The revocation shocked me. I had consistently opposed terrorism in all of its forms, and still do. And, before 2004, I had visited the United States frequently to lecture, attend conferences and meet with other scholars. I had been an invited speaker at conferences or lectures sponsored by Harvard University, Stanford, Princeton and the William Jefferson Clinton Presidential Foundation. None of these institutions seemed to consider me a threat to national security.

The U.S. government invited me to apply for a new visa and, with Notre Dame's help, I did so in October 2004. But after three months passed without a response, I felt I had little choice but to give up my new position and resume my life in Europe. Even so, I never abandoned the effort to clear my name. At the urging of American academic and civic groups, I reapplied for a visa one last time in September 2005, hoping that the government would retract its accusation. Once again, I encountered only silence.

Finally, in January, the American Civil Liberties Union, the American Academy of Religion, the American Association of University Professors and PEN American Center filed a lawsuit on my behalf, challenging the government's actions. In court, the government's lawyers admitted that they could establish no connection between me and any terrorist group; the government had merely taken a "prudential" measure by revoking my visa. Even then, the government maintained that the process of reconsidering my visa could take years. The federal court -- which issued a ruling recognizing that I have been a vocal critic of terrorism -- rejected the indefinite delay. In June, it ordered the government to grant me a visa or explain why it would not do so.

On Sept. 21, the long-awaited explanation arrived. The letter from the U.S. Embassy informed me that my visa application had been denied, and it put an end to the rumors that had circulated since my original visa was revoked. After a lengthy investigation, the State Department cited no evidence of suspicious relationships, no meetings with terrorists, no encouraging or advocacy of terrorism. Instead, the department cited my donation of $940 to two humanitarian organizations (a French group and its Swiss chapter) serving the Palestinian people. I should note that the investigation did not reveal these contributions. As the department acknowledges, I had brought this information to their attention myself, two years earlier, when I had reapplied for a visa.

In its letter, the U.S. Embassy claims that I "reasonably should have known" that the charities in question provided money to Hamas. But my donations were made between December 1998 and July 2002, and the United States did not blacklist the charities until 2003. How should I reasonably have known of their activities before the U.S. government itself knew? I donated to these organizations for the same reason that countless Europeans -- and Americans, for that matter -- donate to Palestinian causes: not to help fund terrorism, but because I wanted to provide humanitarian aid to people who desperately need it. Yet after two years of investigation, this was the only explanation offered for the denial of my visa. I still find it hard to believe.

What words do I utter and what views do I hold that are dangerous to American ears, so dangerous, in fact, that I should not be allowed to express them on U.S. soil?

I have called upon Western societies to be more open toward Muslims and to regard them as a source of richness, not just of violence or conflict. I have called upon Muslims in the West to reconcile and embrace both their Islamic and Western identities. I have called for the creation of a "New We" based on common citizenship within which Buddhists, Jews, Christians, Muslims and people with no religion can build a pluralistic society. And yes, I believe we all have a right to dissent, to criticize governments and protest undemocratic decisions. It is certainly legitimate for European Muslims and American Muslims to criticize their governments if they find them unjust -- and I will continue to do so.

At the same time, I do not stop short of criticizing regimes from Muslim countries. Indeed, the United States is not the only country that rejects me; I am also barred from Tunisia, Saudi Arabia and even my native Egypt. Last month, after a few sentences in a speech by Pope Benedict XVI elicited protests and violence, I published an article noting how some governments in the Muslim world manipulate these imagined crises to suit their political agendas. "When the people are deprived of their basic rights and of their freedom of expression," I argued, "it costs nothing to allow them to vent their anger over Danish cartoons or the words of the Pontiff." I was immediately accused of appeasing the enemies of Islam, of being more Western than Muslim.

Today, I live and work in London. From my posts at Oxford University and the Lokahi Foundation, I try to promote cultural understanding and to prevent radicalization within Muslim communities here. Along with many British citizens, I have criticized the country's new security laws and its support for the war in Iraq. Yet I have never been asked to remain silent as a condition to live or work here. I can express myself freely.

I fear that the United States has grown fearful of ideas. I have learned firsthand that the Bush administration reacts to its critics not by engaging them, but by stigmatizing and excluding them. Will foreign scholars be permitted to enter the United States only if they promise to mute their criticisms of U.S. policy? It saddens me to think of the effect this will have on the free exchange of ideas, on political debate within America, and on our ability to bridge differences across cultures.

With Cleric's Visa Denied, Va. Center Enlists Its Most Learned: Two Teens

DOJ_NMG_0072207

The boy, round-faced and thin, stood in front of the hundred or so men, his arms crossed, his eyes closed. When he knelt, they knelt. When he stood, they stood. When he stumbled for a word, squinting to access the search engine of his mind, they waited.

In a few hours, 13-year-old Aman Chhipa would be back at home sitting in front of his computer playing a video game, pretending he was a knight slaying giant spiders with a gem-laden sword. But at that moment, and for an hour each night this month, he is a boy leading a room full of men.

Aman and another teenager, Uzair Jawed, 16, were thrust into the revered role of imam, or prayer leader, at the Islamic Community Center of Northern Virginia, mostly out of desperation. A cleric from South Africa was supposed to lead the center's nightly prayer for Ramadan, the holiest month for Muslims, as he had done for the past three years. But after Ismail Mullah arrived at Dulles International Airport on Sept. 22, he was detained by U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials and sent back to South Africa.

The center, in Woodbridge, had prepared for months for Mullah's arrival and had paid thousands of dollars for his airfare. Without him, its leaders had less than a day to find a hafiz -- someone who had memorized the more than 6,200 Arabic verses of the Koran and could recite them without looking at the text.

They searched among the adults. No one. They called other mosques. No one.

They then turned to the two boys, the only ones among them who had mastered the text enough to guide the congregation through the 30 sections in 30 days. The Koran is divided into 114 chapters containing more than 6,200 verses comprising about 80,000 words. It is like learning part of the Bible in Latin when you don't speak Latin.

"I thought, how am I going to do this?" Aman said. "I was nervous. It's a huge responsibility."

Aman is an eighth-grader at Fred M. Lynn Middle School in Woodbridge whose family is from India. He memorized the Koran by age 10. Uzair, 16, is a ninth-grader at Woodbridge Senior High School whose family is from Pakistan. He memorized it by the time he was 13.

Together, they lead the nightly prayer, correcting each other when needed, as is custom. Days that were once spent perched in front of a PlayStation 2 for hours, they said, are now heavy with studying that starts about 5 a.m. and stretches to about 11:30 p.m., with school and life in between.

"Before we were hafiz, we were just kids," Uzair said.

He and Aman might be the nation's youngest imams, said Nihad Awad, the national executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, the largest Islamic civil liberties group in the United States. The two are also a testament to the post-9/11 need for U.S. Muslims to groom their own leaders and stop depending on those from other countries, he said.

"Imams who come from overseas, sometimes they bring a different mentality. They come from Muslim-majority places. They have different cultures, norms and traditions," Awad said. "I think it's important that we develop our own."

Aman's father, Nasir Chhipa, a director at the center, agreed. Mullah's inability to enter the country left the community disappointed and with many questions, he said. Some men who came to pray in the first few days left in frustration to search for another scholar. The ones who have stayed, he said, have come to depend on the boys.

The teenagers have taken on their community's burden and hopes -- at least for a month.

"In some sense, I think whatever happened, it happened for the good," Chhipa said. "We learned a lesson from this. . . . We have to produce our own scholars."Long Days With the Koran

When Aman was 7, his father enrolled him in a school in Pennsylvania where he took academic classes for three hours a day and studied the Koran for 8 1/2 . "When I first dropped him off, it was very hard for me. I literally cried," Chhipa said. "Every day I called them and said, 'Could I talk to my son?' The principal said, 'You have to be patient.' "

About three years later, in the middle of Ramadan, the principal called him and said that Aman, whose name means peace, had finished memorizing the text. "When I saw him reciting the Koran without looking at the book, that was the moment of my life," Chhipa said.

Memorizing the text is only part of the challenge in becoming a hafiz. He must practice daily. "It's easy to memorize; it's very hard to remember," Chhipa said. "The Koran is nobody's friend. If you forget the Koran, the Koran will forget you."

Aman studied daily before, but now it consumes almost every moment of his downtime. He begins reading the Koran shortly after waking at 4:30 a.m. for breakfast and continues reading it at any possible moment during the day, even taking the Koran to lunch with him. "They ask me, 'What's that book?' " he said of the other students.

His classmates don't know he's a hafiz, he said. But at the center, the men who stand behind him in prayer each night don't call him just Aman anymore, they call him "Hafiz Aman" -- like Dr. or Mr. or Professor.

"People will greet me properly, not as if I'm their friend but as if I'm their senior," Aman said.

It was strange at first, he said, but he's getting used to it.

"When I was small, I used to always think that I wanted to be something big when I grew up," said Aman, whose upper lip is showing the start of a mustache.

Uzair, who wears a respectable beard, said that as the community has started giving him more respect, he's started behaving differently, trying to act in a way that deserves it. When his father told him on that Friday that he would have to recite the prayers the next day, he said it was both an honor and terrifying.

"I was nervous. I was thinking I wouldn't be able to do it," he said, adding that with each day it has become easier, almost fun. "We're just trying to enjoy it because we have no other option."

His schedule has become much like Aman's. Wake up before sunrise, study the Koran, go to school, come home, study the Koran, break the Ramadan fast and study the Koran. In between, he prays five times and does his homework.

The Woodbridge center is simple, consisting mostly of a large community room and small office, hidden behind a Subway and video rental store on Jefferson Davis Highway. The center has a regular imam, but he has not memorized the Koran.

Those who congregate there said they are grateful for the boys. Still, they know they lost something when Mullah's entry was denied. In addition to leading the prayer, he would have guided donations and doled out advice if needed. The teenagers cannot play such a role, because it is the equivalent of asking them to have a master's degree in Islam.

"A young kid and a grown priest is a big difference," said Fahad Mirza, 29, adding that the boys are "wonderful" but that "they are there just because we have no choice."

The Council on American-Islamic Relations is writing letters to politicians demanding to know why Mullah and other scholars were turned away at the last minute. Nationwide, at least four other Islamic scholars were denied entry, without explanation, Muslim community leaders said.

They are questioning why the government waited until the men arrived in the country instead of denying their visas early enough for the mosques to find replacements.

"We don't want this to fall in the cracks and to just be forgotten. We need to get answers from our government," Awad said. "We want people to be abiding by the law. We want to protect our country. . . . At the same time, we just want to make sure we do not step on people's rights and that we continue to be an open and welcoming society."

Officials with U.S. Customs and Border Protection would not say why Mullah was turned away but said more than 1,000 people are denied entry every day for a variety of reasons. Kelly Klundt, a spokeswoman, said: "The State Department may issue a visa which allows someone to apply for admission into the U.S. It is not necessarily a guarantee that they will be permitted."

Those at the center describe Mullah as a soft-spoken man who was born in Gujarat state in India. They said his speeches were not extreme.

Chhipa said he had spoken briefly with him since the incident. "He said, 'I don't know why they did it to me.' . . . He said they only said, 'We're only doing our job.' "

Mullah was glad to hear that the center had found a replacement for him, Chhipa added.Leaders, and Now Friends

The teenagers weren't really friends before, seeing each other only occasionally during prayer time at the Woodbridge center. But now their parents say they are attached, having developed a friendship through their shared responsibility.

After the prayers ended one recent night, the boys shuffled out of the center, looking as tired as the older men among them.

Waiting for Uzair at home was algebra, English and Spanish homework.

Aman, who had finished his homework earlier that day, would get to steal a few rare moments of play. Within minutes of walking into his house, he shed his traditional garb for sweat pants and a T-shirt emblazoned with the word "basketball" -- his favorite sport. He then swooshed down in front of the computer, clicked on his favorite video game and within seconds was lost in a wooded area of imaginary beasts. In one corner of the screen, he chatted with friends in a language far from Arabic: "Sup?" and "Kool."

La. Voters OK Consolidating Levee Boards (AP)

By Doug Simpson

AP, October 1, 2006

Louisiana voters on Saturday approved consolidating the New Orleans area's levee boards, the generations-old agencies whose politically appointed members were criticized after Hurricane Katrina for failing to maintain the area's levees and floodwalls.

The constitutional amendment — passing with about 80 percent of the vote — will combine 10 southeast Louisiana boards into two, one for each bank of the Mississippi River. Members of the new boards will be required to have expertise in engineering, geology and hydrology, mandates that advocates of the new structure hope will convince Congress and the nation that Louisiana has shed a system mired in cronyism.

"I think it shows that people really care about basic reform in Louisiana," said Gov. Kathleen Blanco, who supported the measure. "They want everything to be professional."

With about 97 percent of precincts reporting, voters supported the measure by a 4-1 margin. The amendment was passing in every parish that was hit hard by Katrina in August 2005.

After Katrina breached New Orleans' levees last August, the boards were criticized as disorganized, full of patronage and badly lacking in technical knowledge to manage the system of levees that protect New Orleans, which is largely below sea level.

Members of the existing boards are appointed by the governor and need no expertise in flood protection. The boards are responsible for levee upkeep and inspections, but critics say they have become distracted with other projects. The board in New Orleans, for example, runs marinas, an airport and a police force.

Blanco said she wants to have the two new levee panels in place by January.

Republican state Sen. Walter Boasso, who sponsored the levee board amendment in the Legislature, toured Louisiana drumming support for the amendment. He told north Louisiana voters that the proposal affects the entire state because the New Orleans area is home to a third of Louisiana's economy.

U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-La., said passage of the amendment would reassure Congress that Louisiana is cleaning up its act as the federal government invests billions of dollars to rebuild New Orleans and surrounding parishes.

There was no public campaign opposing the amendment, though state lawmakers from the New Orleans area tried to block the measure in the Legislature. They argued the existing levee boards should be allowed to finish flood-protection projects that are under way.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Confronts Critics Of Iraq Policies (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 1, 2006

Gloves-off election-year rhetoric hit the radio Saturday, as President Bush argued that critics are wrongheaded to argue for a different policy in Iraq while Democrats suggested Bush is more interested in politically helpful slogans than success in the war.

With just over five weeks to go before midterm elections in which GOP control of Congress could be at risk, Democrats have been citing a government intelligence assessment to bolster their criticism of Bush's approach to Iraq. The classified National Intelligence Estimate, parts of which Bush declassified earlier this week, says the Iraq war has contributed to a global growth in the terrorist movement, but it also says success there could drain jihadists of momentum.

The president has been fighting back against the Democratic attacks with a series of appearances, and he recycled many lines from earlier in the week in his Saturday radio address.

DOJ_NMG_0072210

"Some in Washington have selectively quoted from this document to make the case that by fighting the terrorists in Iraq, we are making our people less secure here at home," Bush said. "Five years after the 9/11 attacks, some people in Washington still do not understand the nature of the enemy. The only way to protect our citizens at home is to go on the offense against the enemy across the world."

Democrats chose Tammy Duckworth, an Army helicopter pilot who lost both legs in Iraq and now is running for Congress in Illinois, to respond.

"Anyone who challenges our failed policies, or suggests the need for a new strategy, is accused of 'cutting and running,'" Duckworth said. "Well, I didn't cut and run, Mr. President. Like so many others, I proudly fought and sacrificed. ... And I believe the brave men and women who are serving in Iraq today, their families and the American people deserve more than the same empty slogans and political name-calling."

Duckworth, who faces Republican Peter Roskam for an open seat, was referring to a Bush speech Thursday at a GOP fundraiser in Alabama. "The party of FDR and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut and run," Bush said then.

He also charged in Alabama that "some in Washington, some decent people, patriotic people, feel like we should not be on the offensive in this war on terror," without offering any evidence of such remarks.

White House press secretary Tony Snow acknowledged Friday that no Democrats have said directly that they do not want to take the offensive against terrorists, but he defended Bush's no-holds-barred politicking.

"I think there's been a lot of ratcheting up of rhetoric on the other side where the president has been accused of everything from dereliction of duty to not caring about what happens to people who have been claimed on the battlefields," Snow said. "The point the president is trying to make is, there are going to be some clear choices."

Bush argued Saturday that maintaining the U.S. presence in Iraq is crucial to winning the broader war on terror.

"Our safety depends on the outcome of the battle in Iraq," he said. "Withdrawing from Iraq before the enemy is defeated would embolden the terrorists."

Bush Says Iraq War Isn't Making Americans Less Secure (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Judy Mathewson

Bloomberg, October 1, 2006

Sept. 30 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush said today that fighting in Iraq isn't making Americans less secure at home.

``This argument buys into the enemy's propaganda that the terrorists attack us because we are provoking them," Bush said in his weekly radio broadcast. ``We do not create terrorism by fighting terrorism."

This is the seventh week in the past eight that Bush has made the war on terrorism the topic of his radio address. His comments capped a week in which Democrats used the findings of a National Intelligence Estimate to argue that the Iraq invasion has made the U.S. less safe from terrorist attacks.

Bush's address also follows publicity about a new book by Washington journalist Bob Woodward that says the president and his advisers have mishandled the war. ``State of Denial," set for publication Oct. 2, says Bush and his advisers responded too slowly to Iraq's growing insurgency.

With congressional elections less than six weeks away Democrats are making criticisms of Republican Bush's conduct of the war a central part of their midterm election campaigns. Republicans respond that defeating extremists in Iraq would be a major blow to terrorists globally. At the same time, they argue that the invasion of Iraq didn't provoke jihadists' anti-American campaign.

Hating America

``Iraq is not the reason the terrorists are at war against us," Bush said. ``The terrorists are at war against us because they hate everything American stands for, and because they know we stand in the way of their ambitions to take over the Middle East."

U.S. troops were not in Iraq when terrorists first attacked the World Trade Center in 1993, Bush noted. Nor were they in Iraq when terrorists bombed U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998 and the USS Cole in 2000, or when they launched the Sept. 11 attacks of 2001, he said.

``The only way to protect our citizens at home is to go on the offense against the enemy across the world," Bush said.

Bush also brought up the National Intelligence Estimate, whose key judgments he ordered declassified this week after elements of the report were leaked to the New York Times and the Washington Post.

U.S. Politics

Both major U.S. political parties can point to parts of the April estimate to bolster their cases. The estimate was a consensus of analysts from 16 federal agencies including the Central Intelligence Agency.

Democrats point to excerpts that say anger over the war in Iraq is fueling Muslim radicalism and that the dispersal of terrorist cells around the world poses a greater risk of attacks on the U.S. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, a Nevada Democrat, said yesterday that Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress ``stubbornly refuse to change course, even when it's clear their failed course is making America less safe."

``We simply can't go on this way," said Tammy Duckworth, a candidate for the House of Representatives in Illinois, in the Democratic Party's weekly radio address today. ``It's time for a new direction."

The sixth district of Illinois, where Duckworth is running, is considered one of the closely contested congressional races that will help determine which party gains a majority in the House. The seat is held by retiring Republican Henry Hyde. Duckworth's Republican opponent is Peter Roskam, a former member of Hyde's staff and a member of the state Senate.

Helicopter Shot Down

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats in the House of Representatives to win a majority.

Duckworth, a veteran of the Iraq War who lost both legs after the Black Hawk helicopter she copiloted was shot down north of Baghdad, said the president has only offered slogans and electioneering rather than leadership.

Republicans point to a finding in the estimate that U.S. counterterrorism efforts have ``seriously damaged" al-Qaeda's leadership. Bush noted a finding that ``should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves, and be perceived, to have failed, we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight."

``Withdrawing from Iraq before the enemy is defeated would embolden the terrorists," Bush said today. ``It would help them find new recruits to carry out even more destructive attacks on our nation, and it would give the terrorists a new sanctuary in the heart of the Middle East with huge oil riches to fund their ambitions."

Candidate-Veteran Attacks Bush On Iraq (AP)

By Dennis Conrad

AP, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - An Illinois congressional candidate who lost both her legs during combat in Iraq said Saturday that President Bush has no real strategy for securing the war-ravaged nation, just political talk designed to appeal to voters.

"Instead of a plan or a strategy, we get shallow slogans like 'mission accomplished' and 'stay the course,'" former Army Capt. Tammy Duckworth said in the Democrats' weekly radio address. "Those slogans are calculated to win an election. But they won't help us accomplish our mission in Iraq."

Duckworth's address served as a response to the president's weekly radio talk and gave the Democratic Party a chance to showcase one of its strongest candidates as it seeks to regain control of the House in November's elections.

Duckworth, who copiloted a Black Hawk helicopter that crashed while under a rocket grenade attack almost two years ago, also criticized Bush and others in his administration for accusing anyone who challenges the president's policies of "cutting and running."

At a GOP fundraiser Thursday in Alabama, Bush said, "The party of FDR and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut and run."

DOJ_NMG_0072212

Duckworth is seeking the suburban Chicago seat being vacated by conservative Republican Rep. Henry Hyde. She is running against Illinois state Sen. Peter Roskam, the man Hyde has endorsed.

In her address, Duckworth, now a major in the Illinois National Guard, also lashed out at the GOP-led Congress for refusing to do its job of holding the Bush administration accountable for its flawed Iraq policy.

"We need a Congress that will ask the tough questions and work together for solutions rather than attacking the patriotism of those who disagree," she said. "It is time to encourage Iraqi leaders to take control of their own county and make the tough choices that will stop the civil war and stabilize the country."

She offered no proposal for an immediate withdrawal or a timetable for withdrawal.

More Troops Not Solution To Iraq Crisis, Experts Say (BSUN)

By David Wood

The Baltimore Sun, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Renewed allegations that the White House and Pentagon blundered by not deploying sufficient troops in Iraq to deal with the aftermath of the 2003 invasion swarmed around the administration this weekend, stirred by publication of Bob Woodward's new book, State of Denial.

More than four years of combat in Iraq have left 2,711 Americans dead and 20,568 wounded. Today, with the 147,000 American troops deployed there apparently unable to stem a widening and increasingly bloody sectarian war, the issues raised in Woodward's book are adding fuel to a bitter election-year debate about the Bush administration's conduct of the war.

But while the debate swirls, some hard-eyed military officers and analysts assessing the situation in Iraq conclude that it would be difficult and costly to scrape up enough troops to raise levels in Iraq significantly and that even raising troop levels now might not work.

"We keep confusing troop levels with the fact that there was no plan for stability operations, no commitment in terms of aid, no understanding of the political challenges," said Anthony H. Cordesman, who is senior strategist at the nonpartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies and generally regarded as Washington's senior independent analyst. "The critical mistake wasn't one of troop levels, although I think if there had been a plan it would have called for significantly more troops and a longer troop presence."

Eventual success depends not just on the number of deployed troops, Cordesman said, but on whether their presence "is buying the time for reconciliation and effective governance and building the kind of Iraqi security forces that can take over the job - or not. This is a very high-risk operation where the odds of success are even at best."

Arguing over troop levels in Iraq "is a nice debate to have, but it doesn't have a bearing on the real world," said Michael O'Hanlon, military analyst at the Brookings Institution in Washington. The military is already under such strain that "we don't have that option."

"The time for more American troops is clearly over," said Thomas E. Ricks, author of Fiasco, a best-selling history of the war. "There aren't any more troops available."

The size of the force needed for the Iraq war was a contentious issue even before 90,000 American troops lanced across the Kuwait-Iraq border in March 2003 in pursuit of Saddam Hussein. The Army's first estimate, that 400,000 to 450,000 would be needed for the occupation, was extrapolated from its peacekeeping experience in Bosnia and Kosovo in the 1990s. But that plan was rejected by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, according to the memoirs of retired Gen. Tommy Franks, the top U.S. commander at the time.

Before 2003 was out, rising violence prompted senior U.S. officials in Baghdad to press Washington for more troops, requests that went unanswered. Woodward reports that in the early summer of 2003, James Dobbins, a senior U.S. diplomat with long experience in the postwar Balkans and elsewhere, drew up a plan calling for 500,000 troops, a staggering increase over the 148,900 troops then deployed in Iraq. His plan was forwarded to Washington. There was no response, Woodward wrote.

Despite optimistic White House and Pentagon assurances of progress in Iraq, top aides and commanders were increasingly worried that the country was sliding out of control, and top Bush aides mounted two efforts to oust Rumsfeld, Woodward reported.

DOJ_NMG_0072213

"If we have a military strategy, I can't identify it," complained then-deputy national scurity adviser Stephen J. Hadley, according to Woodward's book. "I don't know what's worse - that they [the Pentagon] have one and won't tell us or that they don't have one."

By late last year, even the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. John Abizaid, was fed up. "Rumsfeld doesn't have any credibility anymore," he remarked to a friend, in Woodward's account.

Today, there is rising anger and frustration among top American officers whose concern is two-fold: the risk of permanent damage to the U.S. military the longer the war drags on, and concern that despite tactical military success against insurgents, not enough is being done politically to prevent Iraq from sliding into chaos. Many are concerned, as well, that the burden of the war is falling unfairly on a small number of volunteers.

"There are a lot of good people out there in terrible stress and danger, because the judgments of our national leaders have been faulty," one three-star officer said privately last week. "You come back here and people just don't have a clue."

The continuing demand for troops in Iraq has wrecked the Army's plan to sustain troop rotations indefinitely by rotating combat brigades through Iraq on one 12-month tour every three years. That would enable battered units to return home for refitting and retraining and then to serve for 18 months as part of the U.S. strategic reserve, John Medve, senior Army war planner, said in a recent interview.

But the Army has had to send brigades back into action after just a year at home, keeping the troops scrambling and, according to some critics, eroding the nation's capability to respond to crises. Last week, Rumsfeld extended the 12-month tour of a brigade of the 1st Armored Division by 46 days to allow its replacement unit a full 12 months at home before heading to Iraq.

Allowing soldiers barely 12 months at home between combat tours is "putting people at risk not only of losing their lives, but losing their families," said O'Hanlon.

Bush and Rumsfeld have angrily denied that they have ever turned down a request from U.S. commanders in Iraq for more troops - or anything else. Early this year, Rumsfeld disputed an assertion in the memoirs of L. Paul Bremer, the former top U.S. civilian official in Iraq, that Bremer had asked for additional troops in the summer of 2003 and been ignored.

"I thanked him for his suggestion and said we would look into it and we did," Rumsfeld told reporters. He then decided on the advice of the military command in Iraq not to increase troop levels. Rumsfeld said by the time that decision had been made, Bremer had retired.

The argument against raising troop levels, then and now, has turned on the issue of whether the U.S. military presence helps quell the violence or stimulates it, military officers said. Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has said there are continuing deliberations on this point, with senior officers attempting to calibrate and adjust troop levels to respond to the security situation.

Abizaid told reporters last month that an increased U.S. military presence can set back the goal of having Iraqi security forces take over, because when American combat units show up, the Iraqis tend to step back.

Despite such arguments, a review of the record shows that the Bush administration made decisions to keep troop levels low in Iraq and that in the uncontrolled chaos that followed, the insurgency took hold.

"We were undermanned from the beginning, lost an opportunity to secure the country, and have yet to regain the initiative," Army Maj. Gen. John Batiste, who commanded the 1st Infantry Division in Iraq before abruptly quitting a year ago in protest, told a forum organized by congressional Democrats last week.

Four months before the March 2003 invasion, Rumsfeld pointedly recalled that during Desert Storm in 1991, U.S. troops had ousted Iraqis from their occupation of Kuwait in just four days of ground combat in which Iraqi soldiers surrendered by the "tens of thousands."

Turning to the prospective invasion of Iraq, Rumsfeld explained, "So the idea that it's going to be a long, long, long battle of some kind, I think, is belied by what happened in 1991."

The United States, he added, is "determined to do the job and to finish it fast."

Powell Tried To Warn Bush On Iraq, Book Says (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0072214

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Colin L. Powell, in his last face-to-face meeting with President Bush before stepping down as secretary of state in January 2005, tried to impress upon him one last time the dangers he saw the United States facing in Iraq, according to a new Powell biography.

The insurgency was growing and the country was spiraling into sectarian bloodshed, Mr. Powell warned. Elections in Iraq would not solve the problems, and the president's ability to act decisively was being crippled by divisions within his own administration, according to the account in "Soldier: The Life of Colin Powell" (Knopf, 2006) by Karen DeYoung, an associate editor at The Washington Post. Mr. Bush appeared disengaged, the book says, and brushed off Mr. Powell's complaints about dysfunction in his government.

The book is among the latest accounts of the divisions in the administration as it hurtled toward war and stumbled through its aftermath. The Powell biography provides further detail on his early misgivings about the war and the size of the force assembled to fight it, doubts that have been reported in several other books, including those by Ms. DeYoung's colleague at The Post, Bob Woodward.

Despite his doubts, however, Mr. Powell never threatened to resign or go public with his complaints, according to these accounts, because such acts would betray the ethic of the loyal soldier he felt he was.

A 7,600-word excerpt from the Powell biography appears in Sunday's Washington Post Magazine. The book's publication date is Oct. 10.

Mr. Powell, who gave Ms. DeYoung several interviews for her book and encouraged others to cooperate, said in a telephone interview on Saturday that he had not read the book or the excerpts. He did not take issue with portions read to him, except to question the context of one anecdote involving an exchange with Vice President Dick Cheney.

"The real issue right now is not the various books that are out but how things are going in Iraq and Afghanistan," Mr. Powell said. He would not share his views on the current state of affairs there, however.

A White House spokesman said officials there had not read the book and would not comment.

Since leaving office last year, Mr. Powell has kept his views to himself, with a few notable exceptions. He was openly critical of the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina last year and weighed in vigorously in the debate over treatment of detainees in the war on terror.

He has quietly cooperated with Ms. DeYoung, Mr. Woodward and other authors, while keeping his counsel in public on Iraq, the broader war on terrorism and the diplomatic struggles of his successor at the State Department, Condoleezza Rice. He does not want to undermine the president, but he also wants to make sure that his point of view is accurately reflected in histories, associates said.

"It's a matter of behaving with dignity when you're out of office," said Richard L. Armitage, Mr. Powell's former deputy and his closest confidant. "You don't want to be seen as criticizing those who took your place. On differences of principle, like the Geneva Conventions, he will speak out. On differences of approach, he probably will not."

In answer to those who ask why he has not been more outspoken, Mr. Powell generally replies, "There's a war on."

The common thread of many of the recent accounts is of warnings ignored about flaws in the prewar intelligence, in the war-fighting doctrine and in plans for occupying the shattered country. Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, dismissed some of these accounts as the grumblings of people on the losing side of internal arguments.

The Powell biography fleshes out a tale already widely known in Washington of infighting among Mr. Powell, Mr. Cheney and Donald H. Rumsfeld, the secretary of defense. Mr. Powell, who served as secretary of state through Mr. Bush's first term, came out on the losing end of the majority of their arguments.

The book provides an inside account of the preparation for Mr. Powell's pivotal presentation before the United Nations six weeks before the start of the Iraq war in March 2003. Mr. Powell told Ms. DeYoung that he spent much of the five days he had to prepare for the presentation "trimming the garbage" that Mr. Cheney's staff had provided by way of evidence of Iraq's weapons programs and ties to Al Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0072215

Mr. Powell later conceded that the United Nations speech was full of falsehoods and distorted intelligence and was a "blot" on his record.

Running throughout this book and other recent accounts are the defeats and humiliations Mr. Powell suffered in service to Mr. Bush. Though Mr. Powell remained an admired figure in America, it was not enough to protect him against attacks.

"There are people who would like to take me down," he is quoted as saying while motioning toward the White House during his last year in office. "It's been the case since I was appointed. By take down, I mean, 'keep him in his place.' "

Colin Powell's most significant moment turned out to be his lowest

ON WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 2004, eight days after the president he served was elected to a second term, Secretary of State Colin Powell received a telephone call from the White House at his State Department office. The caller was not President Bush but Chief of Staff Andrew Card, and he got right to the point.

"The president would like to make a change," Card said, using a time-honored formulation that avoided the words "resign" or "fire." He noted briskly that there had been some discussion of having Powell remain until after Iraqi elections scheduled for the end of January, but that the president had decided to take care of all Cabinet changes sooner rather than later. Bush wanted Powell's resignation letter dated two days hence, on Friday, November 12, Card said, although the White House expected him to stay at the State Department until his successor was confirmed by the Senate.

After four long years, Powell had anticipated the end of his service and sometimes even longed for it. He had never directly told the president but thought he had made clear to him during the summer of 2004 that he did not intend to stay into a second term.

There had been public speculation as the election drew near that the president might ask the secretary of state to reenlist, at least temporarily. Powell was still the most popular member of Bush's team, far more popular with the public than the president himself. Senior Powell aides were convinced that the secretary anticipated an invitation to stay, and they were equally certain that he intended to accept. The approaching elections in Iraq, hints of progress in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and the rumored departure of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a principal Powell nemesis, made the next six months look like a rare period of promise for diplomacy.

The president himself made no contact with Powell after Card's call. For two days, the only person at the State Department Powell told about it was his deputy and friend of decades, Richard Armitage. Powell dropped off his resignation letter, as instructed, after typing it himself on his home computer. (The White House later pointed out a typo and sent it back to be redone.) Loath to reveal either surprise or insult, he used the letter to claim the decision to leave as his own.

"Dear Mr. President:" he wrote. "As we have discussed in recent months, I believe that now that the election is over the time has come for me to step down as Secretary of State . . . effective at your pleasure."

He was pleased, Powell said, to "have been part of a team that launched the Global War Against Terror, liberated the Afghan and Iraqi people, brought the attention of the world to the problem of proliferation, reaffirmed our alliances, adjusted to the Post-Cold War World and undertook major initiatives to deal with the problem of poverty and disease in the developing world. In these and in so many other areas, your leadership was the driving force of our success."

AFTER HIS DEPARTURE FROM THE STATE DEPARTMENT IN JANUARY 2005, Powell traveled the lecture circuit, making paid speeches on leadership and U.S. foreign policy to corporate boards and industry conventions. He never spoke publicly about the specific circumstances of his resignation as secretary of state except to say, when asked, that Cabinet reshuffles were normal at the end of a four-year mandate, and that his departure had been a "mutual decision" between him and the president.

He artfully brushed aside inquiries about the many published accounts of deep ideological schisms that had rent Bush's national security team throughout the first term and the private humiliations he reportedly had endured at the hands of powerful colleagues.

Audiences often asked about his public role in promoting and defending what many now consider to be the most ill-advised act of Bush's presidency: the March 2003 invasion of Iraq. Powell usually offered a tepid defense, allowing only that he wished there had been more troops committed to the war and its aftermath, and a better plan to rebuild the country.

Powell had thrown his considerable personal and professional reputation behind the administration's charges that Iraq possessed chemical, biological and perhaps even nuclear weapons, and posed an imminent threat to the United States. In a crucial speech to the United Nations Security Council six weeks before the invasion was launched, he had single-handedly convinced many skeptical Americans that the threat posed by Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was real.

But the war had gone sour almost from the moment U.S. troops rolled triumphantly into Baghdad two months later. Powell's credibility had been seriously undermined when the weapons he cited as the main justification for invasion turned out not to exist.

No one in his legions of admirers wanted to believe that Powell had been duped by the White House -- or, worse yet, that he had knowingly betrayed the nation's trust. Many assumed that he had privately argued against such a clearly misguided adventure and been overruled.

In fact, Powell had never advised against the Iraq invasion, although he had warned Bush of the difficulties and counseled patience. He had no reason to resign over Iraq, he told questioners. But the larger mystery of his tenure as the nation's chief diplomat, fourth in line for succession to the presidency, remained.

When Bush selected Powell as his secretary of state in December 2000, it was seen as a stroke of political genius that instantly assuaged concerns at home and abroad about the president-elect's conspicuous lack of foreign policy experience. As national security adviser to one president and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under two more, Powell had helped guide the nation through the end of the Cold War and had brought the military to victory in the Persian Gulf War. By the time he retired from the Army as a four-star general in 1993, he was a national icon of wise leadership -- the "most trusted man in America," according to polls.

Yet Powell had constantly found himself on the losing side of regular ideological combat inside the Bush administration, particularly against Rumsfeld and the powerful vice president, Dick Cheney, over Iraq and a host of other foreign policy issues. Though Powell had scored some victories, the rumored humiliations had been real. He had been purposely cut out of major foreign policy decisions more than once, and his advice often had gone unheeded or been only grudgingly accepted by the president. Why hadn't he resigned?

The easy answer had the virtue of truth: Soldiers didn't quit when they disagreed with the decisions of their commanders. The fact that he had been out of uniform for nearly a decade was irrelevant to Powell; he would be a soldier until he drew his last breath.

AS TEXAS GOV. GEORGE W. BUSH BEGAN HIS CAMPAIGN FOR THE PRESIDENCY IN 1999, Powell's initial impression was that Bush was "still getting his sea legs" on foreign policy and national security issues. Powell knew "Sonny," as he referred to him, only in passing, and his private preference was for another Republican candidate: Arizona Sen. John McCain, a fellow military officer and Vietnam veteran.

But Powell had served in the administration of Bush's father and considered himself part of the extended Bush family, with the personal loyalty that kinship entailed. "It wasn't as if I was a stranger, or that anybody had to worry or could imagine that I would not be for Sonny when the time came," he later reflected. He wrote a $1,000 check to McCain and contributed an equal amount to Bush.

Worried that Powell would outshine their candidate and suspicious of his Republican credentials, Bush's handlers ignored him for most of the campaign -- even as they regularly implied to the media that the respected general was a behind-the-scenes member of the governor's brain trust. Once McCain was vanquished in the Republican primaries and Bush began a head-to-head battle against Democrat Al Gore, the campaign hinted that Powell would accompany Bush on fact-finding trips overseas and would become his secretary of state. But no one on the Bush team ever approached Powell about such a trip, and there was no substantive discussion of a Cabinet position.

Powell later recalled that the only conversations he and Bush had had about foreign affairs came just weeks before the election, in the back seats of cars between events on the four days they had campaigned together that fall. He had no memory of an explicit invitation from Bush to serve in his Cabinet. Once the U.S. Supreme Court declared the Florida recount officially over in early December, Powell later said, "It just sort of happened as it was assumed to happen."

On December 16, three days after Gore conceded defeat, Powell flew to Bush's ranch in Texas to be unveiled as his first Cabinet nominee.

Powell and Cheney stood on either side of the president-elect as he read from prepared remarks to reporters gathered in a Crawford school auditorium. Turning to Powell, Bush invoked Harry Truman's tribute to his own iconic secretary of state, retired Army general George Marshall: " ' He is a tower of strength and common sense. When you find somebody like that, you have to hang on to them.' I have found such a man." When reporters later asked Bush about tears they had seen in his eyes, he replied that it was an emotional moment because "I so admire Colin Powell -- I love his story."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE SAW THE PRESIDENT FREQUENTLY, THOUGH RARELY ALONE. Powell found Bush better-spoken and more thoughtful in private than his public posturing as a rough-hewn, plain-spoken Texan would indicate, although he found Bush's fidgety impatience irritating, along with his tendency to interrupt everyone, from his Cabinet officers to visiting heads of state. While the president publicly praised the secretary's abilities and stature, their relationship remained stiff and formal.

Powell insisted to disbelieving aides that Bush listened to, and even acted on, his advice. "The president has good instincts . . . an instinctual grasp" of issues, he often told them. But he usually followed with an acknowledgment that Bush "has got these rough edges -- his cowboy, Texan rough edges -- and when he gets them exposed, there are other people who know how to use them" to their advantage.

Time and time again during the administration's bumpy first year, Powell had seen Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney intervene to nudge a willing Bush away from moderation and diplomacy, and toward a hard line on foreign policy issues from North Korea to the Middle East. After the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks by al-Qaeda on New York and Washington, their attention turned sharply toward Iraq, and by the following summer it was clear that the administration was headed toward war with Saddam Hussein.

Powell found little evidence to support thinly veiled White House suggestions that Hussein had had a hand in the September 11 attacks. But he saw no reason to doubt the CIA's assessment, fervidly promoted and expanded upon by Cheney and the Defense Department, that the Iraqi leader had stockpiles of chemical, biological and perhaps even nuclear weapons, which he was ready to hand over to terrorists bent on destruction of the United States.

Powell's own war to drive Iraq out of Kuwait in 1991 had been fought with half a million U.S. troops, broad foreign support and a U.N. mandate. He believed the decision to invade was Bush's to make, but that international backing was essential for both political and military success. In August 2002, he succeeded in convincing Bush -- for once, over Cheney's objections -- that there would be no multinational support unless the administration first visibly tried to tame Hussein without war.

It took five months for Powell's efforts at the U.N. Security Council to craft a solution short of war to reach the point of collapse, caught in the crossfire of administration intransigence, international mistrust of Bush's justification and motives, and Hussein's perfidy. As the Pentagon's war plans were completed and March 2003 was secretly set as the internal deadline for invasion, Bush still found himself with little foreign support and an uncertain American public.

"We've really got to make the case" against Hussein, Bush told Powell in an Oval Office meeting in late January, "and I want you to make it." Only Powell had the "credibility to do this," Bush said. "Maybe they'll believe you." It was a direct order from his commander in chief, and it never occurred to Powell to question it.

He was told that the case had already been put together by the White House, and he assumed that with a little tweaking he could turn it into a speech that would fit his voice and style. He was taken aback on Tuesday, January 28, when he received the bulk of the document, a 48-page, single-spaced compilation of Hussein's alleged weapons of mass destruction program, replete with drama, rhetorical devices and a kitchen sink full of allegations. The most extreme version of every charge the administration had made about Hussein, the document had been written, Powell concluded, under the tutelage of Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who shared all of his boss's hard-line views and then some.

Delivery of the speech had been set for the following Wednesday, February 5. Bush planned to announce the date that very night in his State of the Union address to Congress. Acutely aware that he would be selling his own reputation as much as the specific facts, Powell picked up the telephone to tell Condoleezza Rice, Bush's national security adviser, that he needed more time to get the speech into shape.

"Condi, please," Powell implored, "let's just tell the president that we're going to put in the State of the Union that Secretary Powell will be going to the U.N. next week. Don't put a date."

"She said, 'Right, right, of course,' " Powell recalled, "and she runs away to change the speech. Then runs back about five minutes later" to call him and say, " 'There's good news and bad news. The good news is we can change the speech.' " The bad news, she said, was that the White House had already told the media, in a preview of the State of the Union address, that Powell's presentation would be made on February 5.

"I could have gotten two more days," Powell later said wistfully. "Whether it would have made any difference or not, I don't know."

"HERE YOU GO," POWELL SAID, as he dropped the White House document on the desk of his chief of staff, Lawrence Wilkerson. Wilkerson quickly agreed it read more like a badly written novel than something designed to persuade the world. That afternoon, he assembled a State Department team -- including speechwriter Lynne Davidson and Barry Lowenkron, a senior CIA officer before he joined Powell's policy planning staff -- to set up shop at CIA headquarters, across the Potomac River in Virginia. They would examine the evidence themselves and turn the document into what Wilkerson called "a Colin Powell speech." Cheney aide John Hannah and William Tobey, the counterproliferation director at the White House National Security Council, would meet them there to answer any questions.

"We were going out to the agency and live there until we got the presentation ready," Wilkerson later said.

Their job was to make the most convincing, evidence-backed case possible. Powell had little more than a cursory knowledge of the intelligence underlying some of the most damning charges, but in recent months, as pressure built inside the administration and his frustration with the United Nations grew, Powell's language on Iraq had become almost as loose as Cheney's. In a speech to an international economic conference just the week before, he had made charges that his own State Department analysts questioned, mentioning allegations that Iraq had attempted to import uranium and nuclear-related equipment, as well as the presumed ties between Hussein and al-Qaeda.

But that had been only an indictment; this would have to be a complete, trial-worthy prosecution, designed to convince a skeptical jury that capital punishment, in the form of decapitating the Iraqi regime, was warranted.

In addition to proving the charges against Iraq, Wilkerson believed, they had to protect Powell's integrity against those within the administration who had long been out to tarnish it. There was a widespread belief among the secretary's loyal aides -- privately shared by Powell himself, although he brushed it off as meaningless political gamesmanship in conversations with them -- that both White House political adviser Karl Rove and Cheney had actively plotted to undermine him for the past three years. Powell had laughed when he described to his aides how the vice president, after a discussion of the upcoming U.N. speech, had poked him jocularly in the chest and said, "You've got high poll ratings; you can afford to lose a few points." Cheney's idea of Powell's U.N. mission, Wilkerson thought, was to "go up there and sell it, and we'll have moved forward a peg or two. Fall on your damn sword and kill yourself, and I'll be happy, too."

BY THE NEXT DAY, Wilkerson and his team were huddled in the CIA director's conference room, taking the document apart sentence by sentence. Things were not going well. Hannah had brought a clipboard with a three-inch stack of paper that he thumbed through to cite the origin of each allegation -- reports from the CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency, foreign intelligence, the Iraqi National Congress and even newspaper articles.

CIA Director George Tenet and his deputy, John McLaughlin -- backed up by Robert Walpole, the chief CIA officer for nuclear programs; Lawrence Gershwin, the agency's top adviser on "technical" intelligence; and several other specialists -- were constantly dispatching aides to find the original source material.

In some instances, the "evidence" was, in fact, found in an official intelligence report, but only as unconfirmed information that did not appear in the report's conclusions. "They had left out all the caveats, all the qualifiers," Wilkerson recalled. In a few instances, he thought, they had even changed the meaning of the intelligence. A Senate investigation of the speechwriting process conducted after the invasion would later conclude that the Powell team had had to eliminate "information that the White House had added . . . gathered from finished and raw intelligence," some of which had come from only a single source with no corroboration at all.

By late afternoon, Tenet and Wilkerson agreed to put the White House draft aside and start over, basing the speech on a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq that had been compiled by the CIA the previous fall.

That night, after the senior CIA and White House officials had left for the day, Wilkerson and his colleagues watched a film he had borrowed from the State Department archives of Adlai Stevenson's historic presentation to the Security Council at the height of the Cuban missile crisis in 1962.

The Soviet Union had angrily denied charges that it had deployed nuclear-armed missiles on the island 90 miles off the Florida coast. Stevenson, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations at the time, had responded with irrefutable proof in the form of 26 grainy, poster-size black-and-white photographs of missile sites shot from a U-2 reconnaissance plane, displayed on easels at the front of the council chamber for all the world to see. That "Stevenson moment," Wilkerson told them, was the effect they were after.

Powell, Libby and Stephen Hadley, Rice's deputy, joined the process the next day.

Cheney had called Powell to say he hoped the secretary would "take a good look at Scooter's stuff." State Department spokesman Richard Boucher, who accompanied Powell to the CIA sessions, later recalled Libby himself appealing to Powell to look more carefully at the now-discarded White House material. "Powell said: 'I don't want to. I want to use what Larry's been working on.' "

They settled into a routine over the next few days. The CIA turned over the office suite of the National Intelligence Council -- the internal organization that coordinated with other members of the intelligence community to write National Intelligence Estimates -- to Wilkerson and the others engaged in the nitty-gritty of composing the speech and providing material to the graphic designers lodged in the agency's basement. At around 5 p.m., the writing and research team would move to Tenet's conference room with senior officials, eventually including Rice and Armitage, to spend hours going over the new text and verifying the sourcing for Powell.

Powell insisted that they eliminate any intelligence that had come from Ahmed Chalabi, an Iraqi exile favored by the Pentagon and the vice president's office, but widely mistrusted as a charlatan within the State Department. Powell was told by the CIA that evidence that Hussein had built mobile laboratories to conceal his biological weapons programs -- one of the most damning charges -- had been corroborated by four separate sources, including an Iraqi chemical engineer, a civil engineer and an Iraqi military defector. It was, Tenet said, "totally reliable information."

They argued over how to interpret intercepted communications about Iraq's weapons between Iraqi military officers. None seemed definitive, and Wilkerson was worried that they might not mean what the analysts said they meant. But amid the scant information the CIA officials were willing to declassify for public consumption, they said this was the best they had.

The team examined satellite imagery said to reveal prohibited items. Powell was shown, and rejected, a grainy picture of what analysts said was an unmanned aerial vehicle (UAV) site near Basra. It was impossible to tell where it was or even what it was, he argued. Instead, he approved a U.N. photograph of a generic Iraqi UAV, taken years earlier, to illustrate charges that Hussein was developing drones that could spray deadly weapons of mass destruction on population centers.

CIA analysts showed the team additional photographs they said conclusively revealed chemical weapons production and storage facilities, but then insisted that the pictures were too sensitive to be used in a public presentation. Those they were willing to release often appeared -- at least to the uninitiated in the room -- to illustrate nothing more than trucks parked beside buildings. "Don't you have a picture of chemical weapons canisters being moved around?" Boucher later recalled asking Tenet. "Something we can point to and say: 'That's a chemical weapon.' " Tenet replied that no country had left prohibited weapons "out on the lawn" since the Cuban missile crisis. "They know we're looking at them. So we have to go with other things that tell us what they're doing."

They spent hours discussing the aluminum tubes Hussein had tried to import. The Energy and State departments continued to disagree with the CIA's assessment that the tubes were designed for nuclear enrichment. McLaughlin, who had brought one of the intercepted tubes to the table and rolled it back and forth as they argued, insisted that the CIA analysis was correct. The agency, Powell later recalled, "pulled in their experts and swore on a stack of Bibles that they'd done every analysis imaginable, and [the tubes] simply were not for rockets, but for [uranium] centrifuges." The tubes stayed in the speech, although with a brief mention of the disagreement among U.S. government agencies as to their purpose. (U.S. investigators in Iraq after the war later concluded they were meant for rockets.)

Bush had referred in his State of the Union address to Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium from Africa -- the same information the CIA had successfully argued should be excised from a speech he gave the previous October because of questionable sources. No one suggested that it be included in Powell's presentation.

The White House document detailing Hussein's ties to terrorism was, if anything, even more problematic than the portion on weapons of mass destruction.

Powell retreated with Tenet to the director's private office to talk through "what we really know" about the relationship between Iraq and al-Qaeda. Powell was shown the transcript of an interrogation of a captured Osama bin Laden aide who swore that al-Qaeda operatives had received biological and chemical weapons training from Iraq, and the charge became a lengthy portion of the speech. (A year after the invasion, the agency acknowledged that the information had come from a single source who had been branded a liar by U.S. intelligence officials long before Powell's presentation.)

Tempers began to fray as the sessions continued into the weekend. Tenet and McLaughlin became irritated with Hadley, who kept pressing to reinsert jettisoned White House language and information. Powell exploded at McLaughlin, who supplied tortured, five-minute answers to seemingly simple questions. Increasingly, the secretary looked to Tenet for reassurance. "George would give the kind of answers the secretary liked," Wilkerson recalled. "Whether you liked that 'slam-dunk' language or not, George, to his credit, would say, 'Absolutely, Mr. Secretary, I stand by that.' "

Powell later recalled that most of their time was spent "trimming the garbage" of the White House's overwrought verbiage and uncorroborated specifics from the speech. Once that was done, Wilkerson concluded long afterward, "what we were all involved in -- groupthink isn't the right word -- it was a process of putting the data to points in the speech rather than challenging the data itself." As they probed for proof of Hussein's lies, no one thought of looking for evidence that might have raised questions about their assumptions that the weapons existed.

WHEN HE ARRIVED IN NEW YORK ON MONDAY AFTERNOON, Powell was as nervous as Wilkerson had ever seen him. He was worried that the language in the speech was still too methodical and technical to win over an audience. Powell's best performances were modeled on what he had learned as a young instructor at Fort Benning and later at the Pentagon: Use a map or some slides, a rough outline or a few key phrases, and then speak naturally. He always knew his material cold, but it was technique that clinched a sale. This time, however, each sentence had been carefully crafted and debated ad nauseam, and he was going to have to read directly from the text.

On Tuesday night, the team had a final, full-dress rehearsal. The cafeteria on the top floor of the U.S. Mission to the United Nations had been reconfigured into a mock-up of the Security Council chamber. Powell used a stopwatch to check his timing, clicking it off every time someone interrupted with a question or comment. The speech was 75 minutes long.

When he finished, the tension of the last several days seemed to dissipate like the air escaping a balloon, leaving him calm and tired. He believed he had done everything he could do. Departing for his room at the Waldorf, where he hoped to get a good night's sleep, he reminded Tenet that "you're going to be there with me tomorrow." He expected the CIA director to sit in full view of the television cameras, just behind him at the Security Council table. Tenet replied, only half-jokingly, that he was the one who would have to face the intelligence committees in Congress if there were any mistakes. Powell told his executive assistant, Craig Kelly, and Boucher to make sure that Tenet was waiting in the side room they would pass through on their way into the Security Council chamber the next morning. Later, he changed his mind and called Tenet to tell him he would swing by the CIA director's hotel and pick him up on the way to the United Nations, just to make sure there were no glitches.

On Wednesday, February 5, Powell entered the chamber just before 10:30 a.m., smiling and stopping to shake hands as he made his way across the floor. With war hanging in the balance, and the power and prestige of the United States on full display, it was a moment of high drama that owed as much to the player as to the play. A nationwide poll released just that morning had found that "when it comes to U.S. policy toward Iraq," Americans trusted Powell more than Bush by 63 to 24 percent.

"I cannot tell you everything that we know," he began after a brief introduction. "But what I can share with you, when combined with what all of us have learned over the years, is deeply troubling." The facts and Iraq's behavior "demonstrate that Saddam Hussein and his regime have made no effort -- no effort -- to disarm as required by the international community."

"My colleagues," Powell said, "every statement I make today is backed up by sources, solid sources. These are not assertions. What we are giving you are facts and conclusions based on solid intelligence."

The next day, opinion polls indicated that national opinion had shifted literally overnight; most Americans surveyed said they believed an invasion was justified to protect the nation. Those closest to Powell were relieved, but worried about both him and the nation. His wife, Alma, had a sense of foreboding; her husband, she thought, was being used by the White House. Powell's daughter Linda, who had listened to the speech on the radio, had found his performance unsettling. His voice was strained, she thought, as if he were trying to inject passion into the dry words through the sheer force of his will.

Wilkerson, who had left the United Nations immediately after the speech and returned to his hotel room to fall into a deep sleep, awoke depressed. Later, when it became clear that much of the speech on which he had worked so hard was based on lies, he would come to think of that week as "the lowest moment of my life." Back in Washington, he ordered special plaques with Powell's signature made up for the State Department aides who had worked so hard to make the presentation happen.

When they were handed out, Powell asked Wilkerson why he hadn't ordered one for himself. Wilkerson replied that he didn't want one.

AS 2004 BEGAN, U.S. TROOPS WERE HEADED TOWARD A SECOND YEAR IN THE IRAQI QUAGMIRE. No weapons of mass destruction had yet been found, and each day's news brought fresh indications that the administration had exaggerated its case against Hussein. Powell's own prominent role came under increasing question. It was now clear that "a lot of probables, a lot of maybes" had been left out of the assessment of Iraq's capabilities, a reporter confronted him. Given a second chance, would he have "rephrased" his U.N. speech?

"No," Powell replied firmly. "I knew exactly the circumstances under which I was presenting that speech . . . The whole world would be watching, and there would be those who would applaud every word, and there would be those who were going to be skeptical of every word." Whatever doubts were now being raised, he said, the basic conclusions had been solid. "I am confident of what I presented last year. The intelligence community is confident of the material they gave me; I was representing them . . . they stand behind it."

But on Friday, January 23, the CIA announced without explanation that David Kay, the head of its Iraq Survey Group hunting for weapons of mass destruction, was being replaced. Later that day, Kay told reporters he doubted the weapons existed. When Congress demanded answers, Kay said the same thing.

As Powell flew the next day to attend a presidential inauguration in the Republic of Georgia, journalists aboard his plane asked him to reconcile his U.N. speech with Kay's conclusions. "You said a year ago that you thought there was between 100 and 500 tons of chemical weapons [in Iraq]," one reporter said. "Who's right?"

"I think the answer to the question is I don't know yet," Powell replied.

"What is the open question is: how many stocks they had, if any? And if they had any, where did they go? And if they didn't have any, then why wasn't that known beforehand?"

Powell thought there was no sense denying the obvious questions Kay had raised. But it was the first doubt that any senior administration official had publicly expressed about the central justification for the war. The story made headlines around the world, and an agitated Condoleezza Rice called him the next morning in Georgia. Powell was not surprised; it was not the first time that the White House had blown up at him over what he considered honest comment. Rice, he later recalled, was usually the one to make the call. "She'd say, 'Oh, we've got a problem, what are we going to do about this? How are we going to fix this?' "

On this issue, he thought, there was little to be done. "The fact of the matter is, you can't ignore the possibility, since the guy we sent there for eight months as our guy says there's nothing there," he later recalled telling Rice with exasperation. "So, to say there's got to be something there when he, who has been there for eight months, says there's nothing there . . . You can't do that. You've got to at least accept the possibility."

The White House, he advised, should "just be quiet" for now.

DOJ_NMG_0072222

ON HIS RETURN, POWELL SPENT THE WEEKEND carefully reading Kay's congressional testimony, highlighting portions with a yellow marker and scribbling notes in the margins. With the first anniversary of his U.N. speech just days away, the Sunday newspapers and television talk shows were filled with comparisons between the charges he had made and Kay's conclusions.

On Monday, February 2, he arrived for an interview at The Washington Post carrying a blue folder with the marked-up testimony inside. He was "absolutely convinced" that the invasion had been the right thing to do, Powell emphatically told the two dozen reporters and editors crowded around a conference table in the newspaper's eighth-floor boardroom.

Would he still have "recommended the invasion" if Tenet had told him a year before "that there are no stockpiles?" one reporter asked.

"I don't know, because it was the stockpiles that presented the final little piece that made it more of a real and present danger and threat to the region and to the world," Powell replied. But there was no point discussing hypotheticals, he said, because "the fact of the matter" was that the CIA, as well as intelligence agencies in Britain and elsewhere, had "suggested the stockpiles were there."

But what if he had known they weren't there? the reporter pressed.

"The absence of a stockpile changes the political calculus," Powell acknowledged. "It changes the answer you get with the little formula I laid out."

To a White House already reeling from the one-two punch of Kay's conclusions and Powell's comments en route to Georgia, it was another worrisome example of the secretary of state's unwillingness to stay "on message." When his remarks appeared in The Post the next morning, "I think the whole White House operation was mad . . . the NSC, the president -- everybody was annoyed," Powell recalled. "White Houses do not respond well to immediate problems in the morning . . . all the white corpuscles race to the source of the infection, so all the white corpuscles raced to me."

After Rice's inevitable irate telephone call, presidential aides quickly began contacting the media to counteract the secretary's remarks. Annoyed but not surprised, Powell issued a White House-requested "clarification" insisting that Hussein had had the "capability and intent" to produce the weapons even if none had yet been found. Bush, he repeated, had been right to invade.

Still mulling over the situation a week later with a visitor in his dimly lit office, he criticized a persistent White House machismo that took aim at "anything . . . that suggests any weakness in the [administration's] position," regardless of common sense. That, and what he saw as a never-ending effort to humble him personally.

"There are people who would like to take me down," he said, jerking his thumb in the direction of the White House. "It's been the case since I was appointed. By take down, I mean 'keep him in his place'. . . And there are those who, whether it was me or anyone else, just love somebody getting in trouble, because it's usually to the detriment of the person getting in trouble and to the advantage of someone else."

The episode reinforced his already deep-seated disdain for politics and its practitioners. Political thought and decision-making were often polluted by ideology and the exigencies of the election cycle; soldiers breathed a purer, more rational air. "I was not trained as a politician or a think tank guy or anything else," Powell insisted. "I was trained to consider all possibilities."

"I mean, if you're attacking and suddenly you get attacked from the flank," he continued, using his hands to illustrate a military maneuver, "you don't say, 'I'm going to keep attacking straight ahead [and] ignore this new threat coming at my flank.' " He had been asked whether different information would have changed his assessment of the Iraq situation, and "all of my instincts and all of my background and training at that point said the answer to the question is, 'I'd have to reconsider.' "

He shrugged and brought his hands to rest. "But that's the way it goes."

Powell's irritation at the White House was coupled with a growing anger at the CIA. Right or wrong, at least Bush had willingly shouldered the ultimate responsibility for the decision to go to war. Powell felt he had done his own duty by privately voicing caution even as he gave the president his full support. But it was increasingly apparent that the intelligence community had been careless with the truth and hence with Powell's most precious commodity -- his credibility with the American people.

For a week after Kay's report, the CIA had continued publicly to stand by its prewar weapons assessment. But in a hastily arranged speech at Georgetown University on February 5, Tenet finally admitted the possibility of error. His "provisional bottom line," he said, was that the intelligence community had been "generally on target" in its warnings that Hussein was developing long-range missiles. But the CIA "may have overestimated the progress Hussein was making" on nuclear weapons.

As for biological weapons stockpiles and mobile laboratories, he said, "we are finding discrepancies in some claims made by human sources" to whom the agency "lacked direct access." The CIA, Tenet said, "did not ourselves penetrate the inner sanctum" of Hussein's programs but had "access to emigres and defectors" along with high-level information from "a trusted foreign partner." They were now in the process of "evaluating" questions such as, "Did we clearly tell policymakers what we knew, what we didn't know, what was not clear, and identify the gaps in our knowledge?"

Although Powell had been advised in recent months of problems with some of the intelligence sourcing, Tenet's speech was "the first time I heard that the CIA was no longer sticking behind its story" in public, he later recalled. He had been given no advance copy of the CIA director's remarks and listened in his office to a broadcast of Tenet's acknowledgment of "discrepancies" and uncertainties.

Powell stared silently at Wilkerson after Tenet finished speaking. "But the question is," Wilkerson said, reaching for a joke, "are you still friends?"

"I don't think so," Powell replied.

As the evidence continued to unravel, some in the media suggested that Powell should apologize publicly for peddling false information that had pushed the nation toward war. "Is everyone else going to apologize?" he railed within the four walls of his office. "It's not [just] me getting had. I'm not the only one who was using that intelligence . . . they all stood up in the Senate. The president stood up on this material. [British Prime Minister] Tony Blair stood up on this material . . . The whole global intelligence community bears responsibility."

But there was no denying that he had been the most visible and effective salesman. He already knew that the label would follow him around forever. "I'm the guy who will always be known as the 'Powell Briefing' . . . I'm not being defensive, because I did it. But Powell wasn't the only one."

PRESENTATION WAS NEARLY AS IMPORTANT TO POWELL AS SUBSTANCE, and after his inelegant dismissal as secretary of state, he wanted at least to control the way his departure was announced. After submitting his letter on Friday, he spent the weekend putting together a plan: He would inform his inner-office staff at exactly 8:20 a.m. the following Monday, November 15. He would tell his senior aides at their regular 8:30 staff meeting. At 10:15, he would send an e-mail to his friends and extended family. He called Card and told him he expected the White House would then publicly announce his resignation.

At midmorning Monday, the White House released five separate statements under Bush's name, reporting the resignations of the secretaries of agriculture, energy, education and state, and the head of the Republican National Committee. Each statement was three paragraphs long and titled "President Thanks [official's name]." When White House spokesman Scott McClellan briefed the media shortly after noon, all but one of the resignation questions were about Powell. Had Bush tried to persuade him to stay? Had Powell offered? If so, had the president turned him down? McClellan avoided a direct answer. "I think you saw from Secretary Powell's letter that this is a discussion that they've had for some months now, or over recent months at least . . . And Secretary Powell made a decision for his own reasons that this was now the time to leave."

The next morning, Bush nominated Rice as his new secretary of state.

Powell saw Bush regularly over the next two months, passing through the Oval Office for routine meetings that took place as if nothing had transpired. Eventually, the White House contacted his office to schedule what it described as a "farewell call" with the president. Such calls were being arranged for each departing Cabinet secretary.

When Powell saw the January 13 appointment on his calendar, his staff told him they assumed it was a goodbye photo opportunity with Bush. They suggested that perhaps he should bring his family.

"We've got a houseful of pictures," Powell replied dryly. Was he supposed to talk to the president? Or was the president supposed to talk to him?

"Am I supposed to say: 'This is what I think?' Or what?"

He didn't have to say anything, he was told. It was just a "farewell call."

As the meeting approached, the White House -- which had scheduled it in the first place -- inexplicably called the State Department to ask for "talking points" that aides could use to brief the president.

DOJ_NMG_0072224

The appointed time found Powell already in the Oval Office for a routine meeting; when it concluded, he lingered as the others left. As Powell later remembered it, Bush seemed puzzled and called after his departing chief of staff, "Where you going, Andy?"

"Mr. President, I think this is supposed to be our farewell call," Powell prompted.

"Is that why Condi ain't here?" he recalled the president asking.

That was probably the reason, Powell replied.

Card walked back inside, and the three men sat down. Powell had already decided to use the opportunity -- likely his last as secretary of state -- to unload.

The war in Iraq was going south, he said after a few moments of small talk, and the president had little time left to turn it around. The administration's hope was that the upcoming election there would change the dynamics on the ground, and the Iraqi people would finally be ready and able to begin standing up to the insurgents on their own.

But the administration, he pointed out, had entertained such hopes before over the past two years -- when it had set up a new legal framework for Iraq, when it had first turned a modicum of government power over to handpicked Iraqis and when ousted dictator Saddam Hussein had been captured -- and those hopes had been dashed every time. There would be a window of about two months after the election "to start to see progress," he told Bush. "If by the first of April this insurgency is not starting to ameliorate in some way, then I think you really have a problem."

Elections, and talking about democracy, were unlikely to stop the insurgency, he said. Only the fledgling Iraqi army could do that, and it was unclear whether it would ever succeed. Its competence was not just a matter of training, Powell said; it was a question of whether the troops believed in what they were fighting for.

Powell warned about serious internal problems in Bush's own administration, saying that the power he had given the Pentagon to meddle in diplomacy on issues as widespread as North Korea, Iraq and the Arab-Israeli conflict, along with poisoned personal relations between his State and Defense departments, were seriously undermining the president's diplomacy. Bush dismissed his concern. It wasn't any worse, he said, than the legendary battles between State and Defense during the Reagan administration.

The session ended with a cordial handshake, and the secretary returned to the State Department. "That was really strange," he reported to Wilkerson. "The president didn't know why I was there."

U.S. Military Is Still Waiting For Iraqi Forces To 'Stand Up' (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Security Personnel Increase, but Insurgency Is Unabated

The strategy in Iraq, President Bush has said often over the past year, is to stand down the U.S. military as Iraq's security forces stand up.

By strict numbers, the Iraqi side of that equation is almost complete. Training programs have developed more than 300,000 members of the Iraqi army and national police, close to the desired number of homegrown forces. Yet as that number has grown, so, too, has violence in Iraq. The summer was worse than ever, with July the deadliest month in three years, according to U.S. military data.

With the insurgency undiminished and Iraqi forces seemingly unable to counter it, U.S. commanders say they expect to stay at the current level of U.S. troops -- about 140,000 -- until at least next spring. That requirement is placing new strains on service members who leave Iraq and then must prepare to return a few months later. Tours of duty have been extended for two brigades in Iraq to boost troop levels.

So is the "stand down as they stand up" policy defunct? Not according to the Bush administration. But the meaning of the phrase appears to have changed, as leaders have begun shifting the blame for Iraq's problems away from the U.S. military and onto the country's own social and governmental institutions.

When Bush began invoking "stand up, stand down" in 2005, he repeatedly indicated that he was talking about getting Iraqi defense forces trained and on the job. For example, on Nov. 15, he said, "The plan [is] that we will train Iraqis, Iraqi troops, to be able to take the fight to the enemy. And as I have consistently said, as the Iraqis stand up, we will stand down."

More recently, Bush has insisted that "the 'stand up, stand down' still holds." But he added more conditions, saying the troops can come home "when our commanders say . . . the Iraqi government is capable of defending itself and sustaining itself and governing itself."

Military officers and other experts interviewed in recent days said that the Iraqi training program has worked but that its success is undercut by the lack of strong Iraqi political leadership. "You fix the government, you fix the problem," said an Army battalion commander who has seen hard fighting near Baghdad this summer.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld landed squarely in this camp recently. Referring to numbers of trained Iraqi forces, he told a reporter: "If we look at it one-dimensionally like that, there's no answer to the question, because the problem is not a military problem. In fact, the reality is that it's a political governance problem, and it's a governmental problem, and it's a problem of reconciliation."

In this view, it doesn't matter how many Iraqi troops are trained if there is no government to lead them. "I believe that you could have a million Iraqis within the Iraqi security forces and still be ineffective against the insurgents," said an Army colonel who recently returned from a year in Iraq.

Besides weapons and training, an army needs a reason to fight -- and so far, the Iraqi government has not been as persuasive as the insurgency or the militias in providing that key element. "There isn't yet an Iraq to defend," explained Thomas Donnelly, a defense expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "A nation, as well as an army, needs to be stood up."

Other military insiders say that regardless of Iraq's broader problems, the security forces remain an issue because they are not ready for action. The training program may have achieved raw numbers, but it needs more time to finish the job.

"I believe that our U.S. forces need to be here at these numbers for three to five more years, to be honest," concluded Army Maj. Daniel Morgan, a 101st Airborne officer who just completed his second tour in Iraq.

When asked about training of Iraqis, Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for Iraq and the rest of the Middle East, spoke of an even longer term. "It's a generational level of work, not something that's going to be done overnight," he told PBS's Jim Lehrer last week. "And we're making good progress."

This school of thought emphasizes that "standing down" would apply only to U.S. combat forces. Even if Iraqi forces eventually stand up in the promised numbers and fight effectively, they still will need U.S. help in logistics, intelligence, maintenance and other specialized support functions for years to come, said an Army officer experienced in Iraq. He said he has heard from some comrades that providing such support may require a fairly substantial U.S. military presence in Iraq for as long as a decade more.

Some experts believe that the U.S. training program itself is flawed, lacking both funding and enough U.S. advisers and trainers. The training effort is "grossly insufficient, concentrated at battalion and brigade headquarters only," said retired Army Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton, who oversaw the program in 2003 and 2004. He and others believe that the effort will not really succeed until it expands to attach more advisers to smaller units, such as companies and platoons -- which Eaton said would take thousands of additional personnel.

The United States failed to send out enough really good advisers with language skills to work in the training program, added retired Marine Col. T.X. Hammes, another Iraq veteran. "Thus we train Iraqis, push them out the door and fail to support them," he said. This makes them unable to reach the real goal of providing security to Iraq, he added -- "or worse yet, due to lack of U.S. supervision, [they] become part of the problem."

Other experts say the "stand up, stand down" formula has not worked because the target number is insufficient, or because the number is the wrong measurement. The target of 325,000 trained security forces "is arguably inadequate to start with," said

Bruce Hoffman, a Georgetown University defense specialist. Given the total population in unstable parts of Iraq and a standard ratio of population to security forces of 20 to 1, he said, "Iraq really needs 500,000 troops and police."

Alternatively, some say it is not the number of Iraqi troops that counts; it is the quality. " 'Standing up' is a far broader term than many have understood," argued Army Lt. Col. James Gavrilis, a counterinsurgency expert and a Special Forces officer who participated in the invasion of Iraq. "I don't think a lot of people in uniform understood that it would entail developing the quality and character of those forces as well as their numbers."

Finally, some specialists contend that "standing up" Iraqi soldiers and police forces may in fact be contributing to the current outburst of sectarian violence, because the police especially are not seen as impartial players.

"To the degree that 'standing up' a Shia-dominated force is perceived as a security threat to Sunnis, you get a stronger and stronger reaction the more you stand up," said Frank Hoffman, a strategic expert and retired Marine officer. "This may account for what you are seeing -- the sense that national institutions that do not reflect political concerns will produce more violent reactions and a greater reliance on local militias."

A Marine officer who has fought in Anbar province and an Army captain who just returned from Baghdad agreed, both saying they fear that all the U.S. military is doing is training and arming Iraqis to fight a looming civil war.

The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT)

By Nina Kamp, Michael O'hanlon And Amy Unikewicz

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

FACTS have a way of shrinking under the weight of politics. The fierce partisan debate last week set off by the new National Intelligence Estimate on the struggle against terrorism was a case in point. Similarly, our own tracking statistics from the last four years in Iraq will provide ammunition for both supporters and critics of the war. But one fact seems clear: this year's violence was the worst since liberation, and probably the worst over all since 1991.

American troop fatalities, thankfully, declined somewhat this summer, but it is hard to view that as a positive development since much of the modest improvement was due to the reduced rate of American patrols (down from a daily average of 400 to, in the last year, 100 a year). When American forces do venture out of their base, they are in as much peril as ever. Similarly, the drastic falloff in kidnappings of foreigners primarily reflects the fact that foreigners now rarely leave the Green Zone in Baghdad. Iraqis continue to be kidnapped in large numbers.

While the economy is far from healthy, it has shown some improvement. Oil production has returned, at least for the moment, to levels seen at the end of Saddam Hussein's rule, and electricity production is at higher levels, especially outside of Baghdad. School enrollment continues to increase; childhood vaccination rates are now respectable; Iraq's media continue to flourish.

However, unemployment remains at 30 percent or more, as coalition and Iraqi authorities continue to resist the notion of adopting a Roosevelt-style public works program to mitigate joblessness. Inflation is up; private sector investment remains weak because of the security environment; gross domestic product growth has been modest and will probably slow because of the decline in global oil prices. Fuel supplies are stagnant in the face of rising demand.

Public optimism has rebounded a bit since spring, especially among Shiites and Kurds. But Iraqi optimism about the future is still not where it once was. Nor is it clear on what that optimism is based. The Iraqi government continues to flounder in attempts to rein in militias, ensure fair distribution of the nation's future oil revenue, rehabilitate former low-level Baathists into public life and rebuild the economy. On balance, the data suggest that while Iraq is not lost, the United States and its allies there are hardly winning either.

Baghdad Under Curfew After Upturn In Attacks (WP)

U.S. Detains Sunni Leader's Bodyguard

DOJ_NMG_0072227

BAGHDAD, Sept. 30 -- The streets of Baghdad were mostly quiet Saturday, with the capital under total lockdown a day after U.S. troops arrested a bodyguard of a Sunni Arab political leader on suspicion of planning suicide bombings inside the fortified Green Zone.

The day-long curfew in this city of 7 million people was the first to ban both pedestrian and vehicle traffic since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, underscoring the security concerns enveloping Baghdad. It was requested by U.S. military officials concerned about the surge in suicide bombings and other violence since the Muslim fasting month of Ramadan began last weekend.

"There is no single reason," said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman. "What we found was that implementing curfews from time to time helps break up the cycle of violence. It seemed like a prudent measure at this time to recommend a curfew."

The measure was announced Friday night, a few hours after U.S. troops raided the residence of Adnan al-Dulaimi, the leader of the largest Sunni Arab coalition in Iraq's parliament, and took into custody his bodyguard, identified by Dulaimi's supporters as Khudir Farhan Zargan.

"Credible intelligence indicates the individual, a member of Dr. Dulaimi's personal security detachment, and seven members of the detained individual's cell were in the final stages of launching a series of [car bomb] attacks inside the International Zone, possibly involving suicide vests," the U.S. military said in a statement.

The suspect, the statement added, was linked to a car bomb-producing network based in south Baghdad and was believed to be a member of the group al-Qaeda in Iraq. U.S. soldiers searched a security trailer and the suspect's car, but did not enter Dulaimi's home, said the statement.

On Saturday, Dulaimi denied that the bodyguard had any connection to terrorists.

"In the name of God, this news is absolutely not true. This is a suspicion only," Dulaimi said on al-Arabiya television. "This guard has joined the security force one month ago, and we have not noticed anything suspicious. The investigation will prove his innocence."

Dulaimi said his rivals had provided the U.S. military with false intelligence to "corrupt" his reputation and stop his work in parliament.

"This is unacceptable, both from a legal and ethical point of view," said Hussein al-Faluji, another Sunni member of parliament. "This bodyguard does not have any credentials which enable him to get into the Green Zone."

A few hours later, the U.S. military altered its statement to say that "this operation in no way implies [Dulaimi] was associated with any illegal activity; he was not the target in this operation."

In Baghdad's Karrada neighborhood on Saturday, the main road was empty save for police cars. Some food stalls remained open, and some young residents flouted the curfew and walked on the streets. Many expressed frustration, saying the curfew would do little to ease their lives.

"My life is destroyed because of the politicians and the government," said Firas Hatem, 31. "What have we gained from the curfew? Did they destroy the militias? Have they provided us with gas or electricity, or food? The curfew has pushed prices up, and everything is expensive, and the cheapest thing is us, meaning the human being."

In Tall Afar, 40 miles west of the northern city of Mosul, a suicide bomber detonated his explosives-rigged car, killing two civilians and injuring 30.

In the southern city of Basra, provincial Gov. Mohammed al-Waeli escaped an attempt on his life Saturday morning, when gunmen attacked his convoy, wounding three of his bodyguards.

In an interview on al-Iraqiya television, Waeli said the attack was carried out by gang members who had infiltrated Basra's police.

"My bodyguards were ready for them and returned the fire, which made the attackers, whose identities are now known to us, flee," Waeli said. "We are going to prosecute them. . . . They are members of gangs who have recently joined the Major Crime Unit and are using the unit's cars and weapons."

Baghdad Is Quiet With Strict Curfew In Place (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0072228

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 30 — After a troubling and deadly week, Iraq's capital was mostly silent and still on Saturday, except for the occasional whup-whup of a military helicopter overhead and the rare pedestrian testing the limits of a daylong curfew.

Uncertainty remained, however, over what exactly prompted the curfew on vehicle and pedestrian traffic, called Friday night without explanation by the Iraqi prime minister's office. Although vehicle bans have been frequent, it was the first time since the war began that pedestrians had been banned from Baghdad's streets.

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a United States military spokesman, said a number of factors, including an increase in suicide bombings and the rash of violence since the start of Ramadan last week, had led military officials to ask the Iraqi government to impose the curfew.

"We've found curfews implemented intermittently have been very effective in the past," he said.

But Brig. Qasim al-Moussawi, a spokesman for the Iraqi Defense Ministry, referred to a more specific threat. "We have information about a group of terrorists planning to attack civilians by car bombs," he said.

Some residents flouted the curfew on Saturday, shopping for groceries for the evening meal to break the fast for Ramadan, running errands and loitering on the street, albeit mostly off the main roads.

In Toubchi, a mostly Shiite neighborhood in western Baghdad, a line of people waited at a bakery on Saturday afternoon to buy bread, and a few shoppers stopped at the lone pharmacy that was open. Other people headed to prayer at the mosque.

In Adhamiya, a Sunni neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad, the shops were mostly closed.

Ahmed Khalaf was driving alone on Army Canal Highway, which bisects eastern Baghdad, but was puzzled by how empty it was, when he was stopped at a police checkpoint. He had gone to sleep and woke up without turning on the news. He said he had told the officers, "I have no idea about the curfew."

The police were understanding and let him go, he said, telling him that others had been making the same mistake.

The curfew was announced Friday night shortly after news began to leak on Iraqi television that the compound of Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of the largest bloc of Sunni parties, had been raided by the United States military and that a man connected to him was being held on suspicion of helping to plan a bombing.

The United States military said in a statement on Saturday that it had detained a member of Mr. Dulaimi's security detail, identified by Mr. Dulaimi as Khodar Farhan Ghargan, 35. The guard is believed to be a member of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, the statement said, adding that the government had intelligence indicating that he was part of a terrorist cell that was planning a series of attacks, possibly using suicide vests, in the heavily guarded Green Zone.

The troops did not enter Mr. Dulaimi's residence, the statement said, but did search the guard's car and the security trailer. Colonel Johnson, the American spokesman, said no explosive devices had been found.

Military officials later issued a second statement emphasizing that the detention of Mr. Dulaimi's bodyguard "in no way implies" that the Sunni political leader was associated with "any illegal activity."

Mr. Dulaimi denounced the charges against his guard, comparing them to the faulty American intelligence about illicit Iraqi weapons before the war. "This information caused them to occupy Iraq," he said. "Now they are doing the same thing with me just to stop my hard work for Iraqi unity."

But Friday's raid is likely to bolster accusations long made by rival Shiite political leaders against their Sunni Arab counterparts that their guards and staff are insurgents. The American military has expressed concerns that Iraqi political parties have been largely unwilling to sever their links with the militias that many command.

Mithal al-Alousi, a respected independent Sunni Arab, said most Iraqis knew that many political leaders were also militia commanders. "The government should work to investigate this incident and if they discover that Dulaimi knew about this stuff in his house, they should arrest him," he said. "There is no parliamentary immunity for killers."

Violence persisted elsewhere in the country. In the northern city of Tal Afar, a car bomb exploded at 8 a.m., killing two people and wounding 33 others, all civilians. In Kirkuk, a car bomb exploded at 8:30 a.m. at the home of a police official, wounding him, his wife and four others. Another one exploded at 8 p.m. at the home of another police official, wounding 17 civilians. An American soldier from the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, Second Infantry Division, died in a Humvee accident near Mosul.

But at Yarmuk Hospital in western Baghdad, the only patients who came in Saturday had complained of illness, an emergency worker said. It was a rare respite from the normal.

Baghdad Shut Down On Suspicion Of Attack (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

AP, October 1, 2006

The U.S. military said a captured al-Qaida suspect and members of his cell were "in the final stages" of planning an attack on the Green Zone. An unprecedented curfew prompted by the arrest left millions of Baghdadis stranded at home on Saturday without supplies during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan.

The U.S. military said the suspected al-Qaida in Iraq member was arrested late Friday at the home of senior Sunni Arab political leader Adnan al-Dulaimi, where he was working as a personal bodyguard.

Al-Dulaimi is a member of the Iraqi Accordance Front — the largest Sunni coalition in the 275-member parliament, where it holds 44 seats — and the military was quick to distance the politician from the raid, stressing that he was "not the target."

"This operation in no way implies Dr. al-Dulaimi was associated with any illegal activity," the military said, adding that the suspect was captured in a security trailer at al-Dulaimi's home.

After the arrest, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was advised by the U.S. military to shut down the capital and order its 7 million residents to stay at home.

"They have information terrorists entered Baghdad," Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul-Kaim Khalaf told The Associated Press. "The prime minister agreed to give our security forces the freedom of movement to raid certain places."

The curfew was rare both in its scope and severity, catching many residents of Baghdad by surprise. Many people are fasting during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, eating and drinking only after sunset, and they were caught without supplies and fresh bread — a Baghdad staple. Most residents did not have a chance to shop on Friday because of a regular, weekly vehicle curfew to prevent attacks against mosques during prayers.

The U.S. military said the suspected terrorist, identified as Khudhir Farhan, and seven members of his al-Qaida cell "were in the final stages of launching a series" of car bomb attacks "possibly involving suicide vests."

"The detained individual is suspected of involvement in the planning of a multi-vehicle suicide operation inside Baghdad's International Zone," the military said, referring to the heavily fortified Green Zone.

Khalaf said the "intelligence information we received was that there are car bombs and that terrorist Takfiris wearing belts with explosives have entered Baghdad to target civilians." Takfiri is a reference to Sunni Arab extremists.

The Green Zone, also known as the International Zone, is located in downtown Baghdad and is surrounded by layers of concrete blast walls and guarded by Coalition forces and the Iraqi army. The Iraqi government lives and works there, the parliament is housed there and it is also home to the U.S. embassy.

As a bodyguard for al-Dulaimi, Farhan could have had access to the parliament, often attended by the prime minister and his staff, and possibly to offices used by Cabinet members. It is doubtful he could ever have reached the heavily guarded U.S. embassy compound inside the Green Zone.

Farhan also was suspected of having links to a car bomb network operating in the southern area of Baghdad, the military said.

Immediately after his arrest Friday afternoon, al-Dulaimi denied the bodyguard had any terrorist links, but when contacted by the AP on Saturday he acknowledged he could have been mistaken.

"That individual joined my residence as a guard no more than a month ago, therefore I haven't got complete data about his background," al-Dulaimi said. "Anyhow, they are only suspicions about his involvement, which have not been proved."

The U.S. command said al-Dulaimi "did meet the force and offered his home to be searched, which was declined as the operation had no association with him. They only searched the security trailer and the suspect's vehicle."

DOJ_NMG_0072230

There have been fears that insurgents would try to stage a spectacular attack during Ramadan following a series of calls from al-Qaida in Iraq's new leader.

Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, also known as Abu Ayyub al-Masri, has ordered intensified attacks against Americans and the country's Shiite majority, which dominates the government and parliament.

Al-Muhajer — who is believed to have succeeded slain al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi — began issuing the calls — including orders to kidnap Westerners — on Sept. 7.

He has followed al-Zarqawi's belief that starting a sectarian war between the Shiites and Sunni Arabs is the best way to defeat the United States in Iraq.

Following his calls, attacks intensified against both Shiites and the Coalition, and a senior U.S. military official said the first week of Ramadan was the worst for suicide bombings since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

Sectarian violence has surged in recent months and has brought the country to the brink of civil war.

Although Baghdad was quiet Saturday, police said violence persisted in other areas of the country.

Gunmen killed Malik Jebbar, an Iraqi man who had been working as an interpreter for the U.S. military, in an area about 60 miles south of Baghdad. Another person was killed and five others were wounded in nearby Iskandariyah when a bomb exploded in the city center.

In Tal Afar, 260 miles northwest of Baghdad, police opened fire on a suspected car bomber. The vehicle detonated, killing two and wounding 30 others, police Lt. Nejim Abdullah said.

Baghdad police on Saturday found six corpses in the eastern section of the capital, more apparent victims of the sectarian death squads that roam the city.

Two other bodies were turned in to the morgue in Kut, 100 miles southeast of Baghdad.

North of Kut, a policeman was shot and killed by unknown assailants outside his home, police said.

Iraqi Guard Arrested In Green Zone Bomb Plot (WT/AP)

By Patrick Quinn

The Washington Times/AP, October 1, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The U.S. military said yesterday that it had arrested a leading Sunni politician's security guard, who was in the final stages of preparing suicide attacks inside the heavily guarded Green Zone in central Baghdad.

An unprecedented pedestrian curfew prompted by the arrest forced millions of Baghdad residents to remain indoors yesterday, during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan.

The U.S. military said the suspected al Qaeda in Iraq member was arrested late Friday at the home of senior Sunni Arab political leader Adnan al-Dulaimi, where he was working as a personal bodyguard.

Mr. al-Dulaimi is a member of the Iraqi Accordance Front -- the largest Sunni coalition in the 275-member parliament, where it holds 44 seats -- and the military was quick to distance the politician from the raid, stressing that he was "not the target."

"This operation in no way implies Dr. al-Dulaimi was associated with any illegal activity," the military said, adding that the suspect was captured in a security trailer at Mr. al-Dulaimi's home.

After the arrest, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was advised by the U.S. military to shut down the capital and order its 7 million residents to stay indoors.

"They have information [that] terrorists entered Baghdad," Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul-Kaim Khalaf said. "The prime minister agreed to give our security forces the freedom of movement to raid certain places."

The curfew was rare, both in its scope and severity, and caught many residents of Baghdad by surprise.

Many people are fasting during Ramadan, eating and drinking only after sunset, and they were caught without supplies and fresh bread -- a Baghdad staple. Most residents did not have a chance to shop on Friday because of a regular, weekly vehicle curfew to prevent attacks against mosques during prayers on the Muslim Sabbath.

The U.S. military said the suspected terrorist, identified as Khudhir Farhan, and seven members of his al Qaeda cell "were in the final stages of launching a series" of car bomb attacks "possibly involving suicide vests."

DOJ_NMG_0072231

"The detained individual is suspected of involvement in the planning of a multi-vehicle suicide operation inside Baghdad's international zone," the military said, referring to the Green Zone.

The Green Zone in downtown Baghdad is surrounded by layers of concrete blast walls and guarded by coalition forces and the Iraqi army. The Iraqi government lives and works there, the parliament is housed there, and it is also home to the U.S. Embassy.

As a bodyguard for Mr. al-Dulaimi, Farhan could have had access to the parliament, often attended by the prime minister and his staff, and possibly to offices used by Cabinet members. It is doubtful, however, he could have reached the heavily guarded U.S. Embassy compound.

Green Zone Suicide Plot Foiled, U.S. Says (LAT)

A Sunni official's guard is arrested on suspicion of planning to strike inside Baghdad's fortified area. Curfew is tightened in the capital.

BAGHDAD — The government clamped a 24-hour curfew on the capital Saturday shortly after U.S. forces arrested the bodyguard of a prominent Sunni leader on suspicion of plotting a suicide attack inside Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone.

A statement from the U.S. Army said the man was part of an Al Qaeda cell "in the final stages of launching a series of … attacks" that would have used several vehicles and possibly suicide vests.

It said a seven-member cell believed to be linked to vehicle bombings in south Baghdad was planning the attacks on the area that houses the Iraqi government and U.S. and other embassies under heavy military protection.

The Army did not say whether it had detained others.

The guard was arrested at the home of Adnan Dulaimi, one of the main figures in the minority Sunni bloc of parliament. Dulaimi was not under suspicion, the Army said.

U.S. and Iraqi officials denied any connection between the curfew announcement late Friday and the politically sensitive arrest. An Army spokesman said the U.S. had recommended the curfew in hopes of quelling violence that has increased during the monthlong observance of Ramadan.

"We have found these curfews are effective in bringing down the level of violence," the spokesman said. "It just seemed prudent at this time."

An Iraqi police official gave a different explanation, saying the curfew was a reaction to a plot that sounded similar to the one described by U.S. officials but was instead aimed at Baghdad residents.

"We received precise intelligence about the intentions of moving car bombs and terrorists with suicide belts to Baghdad," said Brig. Gen. Qassim Musawi, a spokesman for the Ministry of Defense.

Both the U.S. Army and Dulaimi sought to minimize political fallout from the arrest of the man, who had recently joined his personal security detail.

In television interviews, Dulaimi strongly proclaimed the innocence of the guard, accusing unnamed enemies of trying to damage his reputation and derail attempts at national reconciliation.

He said the guard, Khudhir Farhan Marjan, had no connection to terrorists and wouldn't have been hired if he had.

Even though Dulaimi was not implicated, the arrest left the lawmaker open to scrutiny over his reputed associations with Sunni Muslim insurgent groups. After initially boycotting American-sponsored elections, Dulaimi urged Sunnis to join the political process. But suspicions persist.

In January, U.S. journalist Jill Carroll was abducted and her driver killed as they were leaving Dulaimi's headquarters after the lawmaker failed to show up for a scheduled interview.

Shiite Muslim political leaders reacted cautiously to the arrest of his guard.

"This is a serious sign when the security of a high-ranking official has been infiltrated by terrorist groups," said Abbass Bayati, a spokesman for the United Iraqi Alliance, the Shiite bloc that leads the Iraqi government.

But Bayati said he would withhold judgment until an investigation was complete.

DOJ_NMG_0072232

"The people and the nation really need to know the facts, so the investigation should be finished as soon as possible," Bayati said.

As Saturday's curfew began, the capital was abuzz with another rumor, that the government had called the curfew after uncovering a coup attempt by an element of the military. Officials denied it.

"These rumors are being spread by the terrorists themselves who want to shake the confidence of the Iraqi people," said Musawi, the military spokesman.

The latest curfew, which followed a Friday overnight curfew, was imposed from early Saturday until early this morning. It was widely observed. Some of the capital's 6 million people walked to work despite the curfew, taking up to two hours. But most stayed home.

The normally chaotic traffic all but vanished, leaving the streets empty except for hundreds of police and army checkpoints and American armored patrols.

Baghdad residents are accustomed to curfews, which are in force on Fridays from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. All-day curfews have been imposed intermittently, but usually with more warning.

Some residents complained of the inconvenience caused by the 11 p.m. announcement, which they said did not give them time to prepare.

"There was not enough time for us to shop for today; as you know, we shop day by day for Ramadan," said a resident of the Qadisiya neighborhood who owns a vegetable shop about two miles away. "We are out of gas today to run the generators, and we can't go out even on foot to buy gas."

No new attacks were reported in Baghdad, but police continued to tally the casualties from previous violence.

A mortar shell that landed late Thursday in Zafaraniya in the southeast part of the city killed five people.

Police said they found 12 bodies early Saturday and an additional 23 in the afternoon, all slaying victims in various neighborhoods.

A Shiite cleric was shot to death in Diwaniya, his sister said. Two other clerics were recently killed in the city about 100 miles south of Baghdad.

Mohammed Waeli, the governor of Basra province in the south, escaped an assassination attempt. A British patrol in Basra came under fire and killed one of the attackers.

In the northern city of Mosul, the police commander survived a roadside bombing, and another bomb near a U.S. patrol critically injured five civilians, said Dr. Fadhil Abbas of Jumhouri Hospital. Authorities in Diyala province, a stronghold of the insurgency north of Baghdad, said they had arrested 39 suspected terrorists.

A suicide car bomb targeting an Iraqi army checkpoint killed two people and wounded 30 Saturday, police in the northern town of Tall Afar said.

U.S. Diplomat Defends Maliki's Strategy (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad speaks in support of the Iraqi premier's security plan.

BAGHDAD — U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Saturday that he supported the Iraqi prime minister's plan to disband sectarian militias through negotiations while using his military to go after the most extreme elements.

Khalilzad said he disagreed with recent complaints by U.S. military officials in Iraq and politicians in Washington that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki hasn't been doing enough to rein in Shiite militias implicated in thousands of death squad killings.

Khalilzad said complaints by senior U.S. military leaders that Maliki was too soft on Shiite militias affiliated with his political bloc were evidence of "tactical differences" he has with those military officials. Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American military commander in Iraq, released a statement Friday disavowing the complaints.

Some commanders want to use troops to go after the militias, Khalilzad said, "but I think that as far as Gen. Casey and myself are concerned, we are in agreement that … if political engagement can produce the desired result, then so much the better."

Khalilzad said Maliki would release a "demobilize, decommission and re-integration" plan to begin the disbanding of militias by the end of the year. He also said the prime minister was working on a national reconciliation plan to bring Sunni Arab and Shiite militants into political dialogue.

But he acknowledged that there were still challenges.

"The situation remains difficult and the level of sectarian violence is high," Khalilzad said.

He said U.S. officials were working to support Iraqi efforts to reform the Interior Ministry, which is believed to have been infiltrated by militiamen involved in hundreds of alleged death squad killings.

He said the U.S. conducted an investigation of an Iraqi police detention facility in Baghdad known as Site 4, where abuses were committed against some of the more than 1,300 prisoners held there.

Several high-ranking police officials were indicted as a result of the investigation, but Khalilzad said that Interior Minister Jawad Bolani, who oversees Iraq's police force, has not acted on those indictments.

"He has heard either verbally or in writing that indictments have taken place," Khalilzad said.

Other issues that need resolution include distribution of oil wealth and the pressure for the creation of autonomous zones in Iraq, Khalilzad said. Sunni Arab legislators pushed successfully last week to delay the formation of regional authorities. The Sunni Arabs were worried that oil-rich autonomous regions in the Kurdish north and the Shiite south would cut Sunni Arabs in the west out of a share in the country's oil revenue.

Khalilzad said Iraqi politicians have agreed to distribute oil wealth according to population, which will be determined by a census planned for next year. But he said there was still disagreement about who is authorized to negotiate petroleum industry contracts.

The Kurdistan regional government already has launched negotiations on oil deals.

Khalilzad also said a joint committee this month would present a set of proposals to be used to determine the future role of U.S. troops. Khalilzad said the committee was creating a "road map" that would establish the conditions necessary for transfers of security responsibilities from U.S. to Iraqi troops.

U.S. officials have said that as Iraqi security forces become stronger, U.S. troops will be able to withdraw from Iraq.

The Rebuilder's Tale (NYT)

By Raad Ali Abdulaziz, As Told To Fred Heeren

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

I wanted to make a difference. After earning my Ph.D. in engineering in 2002 at Baghdad University, I became a guest lecturer there, and I also began working for an Italian humanitarian organization — helping to repair schools, water-treatment plants and hospitals. I didn't stop working in 2003 when the American bombs started falling, and I didn't stop when friends warned me that my work was bad because it made the foreigners look good. That was nothing new. Even before the war, most Iraqis believed that all visiting Westerners were working against Islam.

But then one afternoon in September 2004, when I was drawing up plans for local schools, one of my co-workers rushed into my Baghdad office looking worried — followed by a man in a military uniform carrying an AK-47. His comrades chose me along with two Italian colleagues, Simona Pari and Simona Torretta, and pushed us out into the road. They handcuffed us and forced us into a caravan of waiting cars. I hardly had time to feel afraid. I asked the driver what was happening. He told me to be quiet and yelled out the window at the gathering crowd: "We are police! Go home! Or I'll shoot anyone standing in the street!" He waved his pistol around. People scattered.

I tried to focus. This was not a police investigation; it was a kidnapping. Iraqis taken with foreigners are usually the first to die. The day before, I celebrated my 35th birthday. I wondered how my life would end — with a bullet or a knife.

Other uniformed men put me on the floor and draped a blanket over me, and we drove away. As we passed checkpoints and I sweated under the blanket in 110-degree heat, I somehow remembered a film I had seen about the history of nonviolent movements. I decided that no matter what they did to me, I would try to behave gently in return. When a gust blew the blanket off my head, I told them about it — and one of the men actually thanked me as he pulled the blanket back over me.

But when they interrogated me at a house later, things looked very bad. They asked me about my background. I knew they wouldn't like the truth, but I decided to be straight with them: my father was Kurdish, my mother Arabic. Every answer made them angrier. "Are you Sunni or Shiite?" They were Sunnis, but I said I was a Muslim who didn't believe in breaking up Islam that way. They accused me of being a spy for the Italians. I told them I was just helping to rebuild our country.

"Admit it," they said, "you are working against Islam!" I explained again. Finally, one pressed his gun against my head. "We know you are lying. In five seconds you must say that you are working for the Americans or the church!"

The room went silent. But I felt sure they knew I was telling the truth. Now they were playing with me, and I decided to let them know I understood. So. . .I began to smile. I was blindfolded, so I couldn't tell how they were reacting — what if I had misjudged them? — but after a moment, they burst out laughing. Tensions disappeared. One of them tapped me lightly on the head, saying, "You make jokes for us!"

I passed that test, but each day brought new threats to our lives. The first night, a rival militant group attacked us with grenades and machine guns. Another day the emir of our group said that if their ransom demands were not met in 48 hours, they planned to execute us — "probably by beheading." During those 48 hours, I just kept thinking about my 4-year-old son. But the deadline came and went — and the emir had a new idea: the Italian hostages and I would lead an attack against American troops. The assault would be broadcast on Arabic TV. I had to translate between the Italian pacifists and the radicals, who seemed ready to kill us if we declined. This surreal discussion went on for days. And then suddenly, after three weeks, we were released.

We were driven to the back of a Baghdad mosque and ordered out of the car in front of an Al-Jazeera cameraman, there to capture the moment. Later I heard I owed my life to a secret deal with the Italian Red Cross. The Italians flew back to Rome, where everyone celebrated and called them heroes.

My welcome home was different. I learned that many Iraqis and Arabs around the world hoped I would be beheaded — even some people I knew. After many threats against me and a near hit with a bullet, I could not put my family at further risk, and we fled Iraq in secret. We left everything behind. Now I am trying to start over in Europe. This is very painful.

But I keep remembering a strange feeling that came over me during those critical moments. Something told me that I would not die, that I had an unfinished task. Now I wonder if there is a way to make my voice louder than the voice of those who order us to fight all unbelievers. This cannot be God's way.

Suicide Bomber Kills 12 Near Kabul Ministry (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 30 — Central Kabul was rocked by a deadly suicide bombing that killed 12 and wounded more than 40, just hours before President Hamid Karzai announced that his recent trip to Washington had elicited assurances from Pakistan that it would act against Taliban insurgents in its territory.

The suicide attack, the second in Kabul, the capital, this month, took place shortly after 8 a.m., when a man approached the side gate of the Interior Ministry headquarters on foot. There, by the pedestrian entrance to the compound, he detonated, the authorities said. Two policemen were killed, including the chief of staff of security, as were 10 civilians, said Zemarai Bashari, the spokesman for the Ministry of Interior. At least 42 people were wounded, doctors said.

Among the dead were two children — one a boy of 4 or 5 — and a 20-year-old woman, they said. The mother of the boy was critically wounded, according to doctors at Wazir Akbar Khan hospital, and had not been told of her son's death.

Witnesses said police officers had spotted the attacker and tried to stop him. Lailoma, 30, a clerk in the Interior Ministry, was arriving for work and was wounded in the blast.

DOJ_NMG_0072235

"I saw a policeman pull out his pistol to shoot the bomber, but the bomber ran and blew himself up," she said from her hospital bed.

The Taliban claimed responsibility for the attack.

The main goal of Mr. Karzai's recent visit to Washington was to persuade the Bush administration to press Pakistan to cease its support, tacit or otherwise, for the Taliban insurgency, which has caused such widespread violence in Afghanistan this year that it has begun to threaten the state.

On Saturday, President Karzai condemned the bombing and said his 10-day trip to Canada and the United States had specifically concentrated on terrorism in the region. Yet he had little concrete to announce.

"I am glad we had an open talk, and I hope we are going to fulfill what we discussed," he said of the meeting with President Bush and General Pervez Musharraf.

The neighboring countries each agreed to hold tribal jirgas, or conventions, in the presence of the two presidents, to encourage the elders of the tribes that straddle their border to bring peace and stability to the region in time-honored tradition.

Mr. Karzai said General Musharraf had agreed to take action against the command structure of the Taliban, which has found sanctuary in Pakistan. "We did get a very categorical assurance that they will be moving against all extremist terrorist elements."

Mr. Karzai confirmed that cross-border violence had increased in the Waziristan region since the Pakistani government brokered a peace deal with the tribes there earlier this month in an effort to curb militancy.

"So far the effectiveness is not good," Mr. Karzai said, "but again President Musharraf assured me, and we have to wait and see."

German Planes Help NATO in South

BERLIN, Sept. 30 (Agence France-Presse) — A Defense Ministry spokesman confirmed Saturday a magazine report that German military aircraft are supporting NATO operations in volatile southern Afghanistan. The report, set to appear in Monday's Der Spiegel, came after Defense Minister Franz Josef Jung ruled out any possibility of transferring German troops from the relatively peaceful north to help fight the insurgency in the south.

Der Spiegel said German transport aircraft and helicopters had made some 60 flights this year into the south, ferrying allied soldiers and evacuating the wounded.

Bombing Kills 12 Near Afghan Interior Ministry (WP/AP)

By Rahim Faiez

The Washington Post/AP, October 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 30 -- A suicide bomber blew himself up in a busy pedestrian alley next to Afghanistan's Interior Ministry on Saturday, killing at least 12 people and wounding dozens, officials said.

It was the second major suicide attack in Kabul this month, underscoring the rising danger in the once-calm capital as insurgents step up attacks across the country.

Meanwhile, an American was released from an Afghan prison and flown out of the country after serving more than two years for operating a private prison as part of a freelance hunt for terrorists, Afghan officials said.

Brent Bennett, 29, had been arrested in July 2004 with two other Americans after Afghan security forces raided a house and discovered eight Afghan men who they said had been abused.

Court documents filed Friday in Washington show that U.S. officials planned to secure Bennett a passport and a ticket out of the country. An Associated Press reporter saw a man identified as Bennett board a plane for Dubai late Saturday. It was not clear whether Bennett was free or in the custody of U.S. officials. U.S. officials in Afghanistan would not comment on his case.

The suicide attack occurred just before 8 a.m. near a narrow dirt road where employees and civilians pass through a security gate. Shops, street photographers and men who fill out Interior Ministry paperwork for illiterate Afghans make the area a busy cross-section of commerce and government.

DOJ_NMG_0072236

Rahman Shah was standing in line at a security checkpoint with his wife and three children when he heard someone shout, "Suicide attack!" He turned to see a police officer chasing a man, and moments later a blinding explosion threw him and his family to the ground.

"I fell to one side of the road with my son, and when I ran to the other side where my wife, daughter and my other son were, I found them all injured and bloody," Shah said from the side of a hospital bed where his wife and 4-year-old daughter were recovering.

President Hamid Karzai condemned the blast and said that "suicide attackers come from outside Afghanistan and target the most devoted and the poorest Muslim people of the world."

Insurgents have stepped up roadside and suicide bombings across Afghanistan over the past several months. Earlier this month, a suicide car bomber rammed a U.S. military convoy in Kabul, killing 16 people, including two American soldiers, and a suicide bomber killed 18 people outside the Helmand provincial governor's compound in the town of Lashkar Gah on Tuesday.

American Imprisoned For Private Jail Set Free (WT/AP)

By Jason Straziuso

The Washington Times/AP, October 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- An American was released from an Afghan prison and flown out of the country yesterday after serving more than two years for running a private prison as part of a freelance hunt for terrorists, officials said.

Court documents filed Friday in Washington show that U.S. officials planned to secure Brent Bennett a passport and a ticket out of the country, and an Associated Press reporter saw a man identified as Bennett board a plane for Dubai late yesterday.

It was not clear if Bennett, 29, was free or in the custody of U.S. officials. He was held in a private room at the airport and journalists were prevented from talking to him.

Bennett, former U.S. soldier Jack Keith Idema and Edward Caraballo were arrested in July 2004 and convicted of running a private prison in Kabul after Afghan security forces raided a house and discovered eight Afghan men who said they had been abused.

Idema told The Washington Times by phone from his prison cell Thursday that Bennett had been kidnapped from prison by Afghan soldiers and would not survive the night.

Abdul Qayum, the commander of the Policharki prison where Bennett had been jailed, told the Associated Press the American was in good spirits when he left yesterday.

An Afghan airport official showed an AP reporter a copy of the passport of the man boarding the plane in the name of Brent L. Bennett. The official asked not to be named because of the sensitivity of the issue.

No U.S. officials in Afghanistan would comment on Bennett's case, and an American lawyer filing paperwork on his behalf said he didn't know if Bennett was free or in U.S. custody. When Bennett boarded the plane he was not wearing any restraints.

A spokesman for the U.S. Embassy declined to comment on the case yesterday.

Caraballo, who has said he is a video journalist, was released in April.

In a separate development, a suicide bomber blew himself up in a busy pedestrian alley next to Afghanistan's Interior Ministry yesterday, killing at least 12 persons and wounding dozens, officials said.

The blast was the second major suicide attack in Kabul in September, underscoring the rising danger in the once-calm capital as militants step up attacks across the country.

Afghanistan Mulls Herbicide In Drug War (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, October 1, 2006

With profits from this spring's record opium crop fueling a broad Taliban offensive, Afghan authorities say they are considering a once unthinkable way to deal with the scourge: spraying poppy fields with herbicide.

Afghans including President Hamid Karzai are deeply opposed to spraying the crop. After nearly three decades of war, Western science and assurances can do little to assuage their fears of chemicals being dropped from airplanes.

DOJ_NMG_0072237

But U.S. officials in Kabul and Washington are pushing for it. And on Thursday the country's top drug enforcement official said he would contemplate spraying opium crops — even with airborne crop-dusters — if other efforts fail to cut the size of the coming year's crop.

"This year, we'll wait and see how it goes. Next year, the 2008 season, we will consider it," said Lt. Gen. Mohammed Daoud Daoud on the sidelines of an anti-poppy gathering in Jalalabad, the ancient and verdant capital of Nangahar province, once the heart of Afghanistan's poppy belt.

This year Nangahar was a success. Poppy cultivation stayed low amid a boom that saw Afghanistan produce 82 percent of the world's opium, providing for 90 percent of its heroin, according to U.S. and United Nations figures.

Opium eradication is one of the great failures of the five-year period since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001. In 2000, under the Islamist Taliban government, Afghanistan produced virtually no opium.

Planting has skyrocketed since then, jumping 59 percent this year, enough to produce 6,700 tons of opium that fetched around $750 million for Afghan farmers and eventually sold for $50 billion on the street, mainly in Europe, according to a U.N. report.

Opium poppies have become Afghanistan's chief crop and economic mainstay even as Washington and Britain have pumped hundreds of millions of dollars into eradication schemes and complex efforts to create markets for legal crops.

In the meantime, drug money nourishes the insurgency. In the opium-rich southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, Taliban commanders protect growers in return for a 30 to 40 percent tax, which is spent to recruit fighters, experts in the region say.

Retired U.S. Gen. Barry McCaffrey, the Clinton administration drug czar, said crop dusters may be the only way to preserve Washington's project in Afghanistan, before drug profits undermine the country's elected government.

"We know exactly where these fields are. They're absolutely vulnerable to eradication. And it is immeasurably more effective to do it with an airplane," McCaffrey said by telephone from Virginia. "I've been telling the Pentagon, if you don't take on drug production you're going to get run out of Afghanistan."

But in Helmand, home to 42 percent of this year's crop, Daoud said it remains too dangerous to spray. A former mujahedeen commander, Daoud said the Taliban can down low-flying planes.

"They have rockets," the bearded general said, fingering a string of prayer beads. "We can't spray there."

U.S. and U.N. experts here say eradicating the drug from this Texas-sized country will take decades.

Inside Afghanistan, with just 150,000 opium users among its 30 million people, poppy eradication is seen as an outside issue. Two speakers at the counternarcotics conference here said it was more urgent to stop people drinking wine.

"We want all drugs banned. Not only poppy," said provincial council chief Fazal Hadi Muslim Yar.

If Karzai approves herbicide, he risks losing the support of 3 million people involved in poppy growing. But without eradication, he could see his government undermined by drug-funded insurgents.

Karzai has said in the past that herbicides pose too big a risk for families and livestock, contaminating water and killing grapes, melons and vegetables grown alongside poppies. But the president approved Afghan eradication teams that used tractors to eliminate thousands of acres of poppies this year.

"Anywhere we eradicate a field, we must immediately provide the farmer with an alternative livelihood," Karzai spokesman Khaleeq Ahmad said on Saturday.

Aerial spraying is especially feared. Rumors have coursed through farm communities blaming sicknesses on secret poppy spraying, said Mohammed Nabi Hussaini, the head of Afghanistan's Poppy Eradication Program.

"There were diseases in children who ate apricots and parents said they saw helicopters nearby," Hussaini said. "But how long can we wait? The longer you wait the more it will get out of control."

McCaffrey said crop-dusting with common herbicides like Roundup was key in drug eradication programs that found success in Thailand and Peru.

Crop spraying is not the preferred option of the United Nations, but would be considered as part of a broad rural development program, U.N. spokesman Dan Norton said on Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0072238

Tens of thousands of Afghan farmers are now making crop decisions, weighing options between poppies and Afghanistan's robust vegetables and melons.

For now, the government counternarcotics campaign is friendly. Afghan government officials held a tent rally at the former winter palace in Jalalabad. With 200 turbaned elders and clerics listening, Daoud urged them to snuff out the illicit trade before it turned Afghanistan into a narco-state.

"Addiction will destroy the young generation that is Afghanistan's future," Daoud told the crowd. "Once you're addicted you're a burden to your family."

Across Afghanistan, tougher action is coming. Counternarcotics officials warned local leaders that they will be fired if cultivation rises.

Finally, Kabul officials drove the message home using the twin pillars of God and honor. Assadullah Sajid, an imam in a starched white tunic and long beard, pointed forcefully at the elders and policemen, invoking the Quran and warning them not to disgrace Nangahar.

"Last year our governor was honored because we didn't cultivate," Sajid said sternly. "Let's keep that honor."

NATO To Lead U.S. Troops In Afghanistan (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, October 1, 2006

NATO will take command of up to 12,000 U.S. troops and the territory they control in Afghanistan in "few days," a spokesman for the alliance said Sunday.

The planned expansion of the alliance's operation to the rest of the country will consolidate most military responsibilities under the command of top NATO leader, British Lt. Gen. David Richards.

The overall American force level in the country will remain unchanged, said Mark Laity, an alliance spokesman in Kabul.

Some 8,000 U.S. troops tracking al-Qaida terrorists or involved in aerial operations will remain under direct U.S. command, Laity said, but the U.S.-led coalition commanded by U.S. Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry will be phased out.

"In a few days, on a date yet to be declared, you will see the completion of the steady expansion of ISAF," the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, Laity said.

The 12,000 U.S. troops in the regional command in eastern Afghanistan headed by U.S. Army Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley will fall under NATO command.

The move leaves Eikenberry's role in doubt. ISAF spokesman Maj. Luke Knittig said Eikenberry may remain in Afghanistan but under the auspices of the U.S. embassy.

"He won't be in our chain of command," Knittig said.

Eikenberry "may work with the U.S. ambassador. But no decision has been made," said Knittig, a U.S. Army officer with NATO.

SOMEWHERE along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, the Taliban leadership and their Qaeda allies must be pleased.

When the leaders of Pakistan and Afghanistan visited the United States last week, they got into an ugly public spat over who was to blame for a Taliban resurgence that has killed hundreds of Afghans this year and shaken confidence in Afghanistan's new government.

There was Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan, accusing Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan of failing to crack down on the Taliban. Mr. Musharraf struck back, saying Mr. Karzai was behaving like "an ostrich" and ignoring problems in his own land. Finally, President Bush played host at an unusual White House dinner for the two, trying to soothe tensions and promote a united front against the Taliban.

"We've got a lot of challenges facing us," President Bush said as the two leaders stood silently at his side. "All of us must protect our countries, but at the same time, we all must work to make the world a more hopeful place."

DOJ_NMG_0072239

The two leaders' public feud increases already growing pressure on the Bush administration to deal with criticism of the American-led effort to stabilize Afghanistan, which until recent months was seen in bright contrast to the problems in Iraq. Members of Congress, former administration officials and experts argue that missteps by the United States and its allies squandered an early opportunity to bring order to Afghanistan so it could be more completely rebuilt. Stabilizing the country remains possible, they say, but it will now be far more difficult.

"I think the mission continues to be doable," said James Dobbins, a former Bush administration special envoy to Afghanistan. "But it's going to be a longer, harder, more expensive mission by virtue of the fact that we did not seize opportunities."

But what can be done?

The issue is not just a matter of American troop levels, Afghan officials and American experts say. Or of Afghan warlords, once so powerful. There are three critical problems today: the weakness of Afghan security forces, a rampant opium trade and allegations that Pakistani officials turn a blind eye to Taliban activity in their territory.

Those three problems are wrapped up with a fourth: a creeping skepticism among Afghans and Pakistanis about the seriousness of the American and NATO commitments to stay in Afghanistan. The more it looks as if the Americans will leave, the harder it is to gain villagers' cooperation against the Taliban. Farmers become less willing to give up their profitable opium crop. And — perhaps most important — Pakistanis anticipate the day when their old allies, the Taliban, can again be their proxies to counter Indian influence in Afghanistan.

American officials discount such dire scenarios. They say the American effort in Afghanistan has been and continues to be a success. The current violence, they contend, is the result of a move by NATO troops and an increasingly strong Afghan central government to extend their authority into remote areas that Taliban fighters and drug traffickers have used as havens. Taliban attacks are largely centered in the country's south, they say, and will be defeated.

"In recent months, the Taliban and other extremists have tried to regain control, mostly in the south of Afghanistan," Mr. Bush said Tuesday in a joint White House press conference with Mr. Karzai. "We've adjusted tactics and we're on the offense to meet the threat and to defeat the threat."

But several members of Congress and American experts on Afghanistan said the United States needs to make a grand gesture soon, like doubling American reconstruction assistance. Over the last year, they point out, the United States cut aid to Afghanistan by 30 percent and handed over security in southern Afghanistan to NATO troops.

"Something dramatic" is needed, said Barnett Rubin, a New York University professor and Afghanistan expert. "To convince people that we really mean it. That we're really committed." The country's police present one such opportunity, cited by Mr. Karzai himself. In a meeting with reporters and editors at The New York Times on Sept. 21, he said the failure to create a professional Afghan police force was a central mistake in the early post-Taliban period. He said police training still must expand.

"We would like to get much more support for the training of the police from the United States and our allies," he said. "Where we failed was to focus in time on having a police force."

In 2001, Afghanistan's 80,000 police officers were a poorly equipped hodgepodge of Soviet-trained officers, veterans of the anti-Soviet jihad and gunmen loyal to local warlords. Seventy percent were illiterate.

In 2002, the United States promised to train a new Afghan army and Germany promised to retrain the country's police. But German officials dispatched only 40 police trainers and focused on developing a core of 3,500 skilled commanders at a reopened police academy. Some foreign military units conducted short training courses outside Kabul. But the tens of thousands of officers outside Kabul received no systematic training until 2004, when the United States opened seven regional training centers.

Opium cultivation, now exploding, is another sore subject. Last month, the United Nations announced a record 6,100 metric ton crop, 50 percent higher than the 2005 yield. Afghanistan now produces 92 percent of the world's opium poppies, or raw heroin. And in some parts of southern Afghanistan, American officials say, drug traffickers have formed an alliance with the Taliban.

One advocate of a steeply increased anti-opium effort is Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, who offered an amendment this summer calling for $700 million in additional Defense Department funding for narcotics eradication in Afghanistan. The Republican-controlled Senate passed the measure. But when the bill reached a conference committee, the amount was cut to $116 million for all of Central Asia, according to Mr. Schumer."You cannot win one of these wars by just paying attention to the military side," the senator said Friday. "They don't seem to understand that." He also has called for an increase in reconstruction aid to Afghanistan.

Beyond those more familiar problems, though, there are lingering questions about Pakistan and the Taliban, made more pointed by a sense that the United States may eventually abandon Afghanistan, as it did after the Soviets were driven out in the 1980's.

Seth Jones, an Afghanistan analyst with the RAND Corporation, said the United States must revamp its approach to Pakistan even as it works to counter an increasingly successful Taliban propaganda campaign that portrays the United States as trying to eradicate Islam from Afghanistan.

Mr. Jones and other analysts said Pakistan allows the Taliban to continue to operate on its territory because it sees the group as a useful tool to counter the growing influence of its archrival, India, in Afghanistan. Pakistan supported the Taliban in the 1990's in its civil war against an Indian- , Russian- and Iranian-backed Northern Alliance. After the Taliban was driven out, it was that same Northern Alliance that took power in Kabul. Now, with the American commitment to Afghanistan being questioned, a version of that same proxy war is beginning to take shape again.

Analysts argue that stabilizing Afghanistan is still possible, but it would require a long-term American commitment to rebuilding the country. It would also require intensified American diplomacy in the region, they say.

Christine Fair, an analyst at the United States Institute of Peace, a government-funded Washington-based research institute, suggests that an American diplomatic drive to ease tensions between India and Pakistan could be a key to stabilizing Afghanistan as well. "What we need," she said "is a grand bargain. You have to take a regional picture."

But time is short.

There are indications that public support for a long-term American and NATO role in Afghanistan may be dropping in both the United States and Europe. Recent requests by NATO commanders that Germany and other countries eliminate restrictions on sending their troops to the country's volatile south have fallen on deaf ears. Countries have also been slow to respond to appeals for additional NATO troops in Afghanistan.

A CNN poll released last week showed increased skepticism among the American public as well. When asked, "Do you favor or oppose the U.S. war in Afghanistan?" 50 percent were in favor, and 48 percent were opposed.

That indicated a slide from the heady days in 2001 and 2002, just after the Northern Alliance had toppled the Taliban with the aid of a few American troops. Back then, 80 or 90 percent of Americans were supportive.

The Taliban strategy appears to be working.

Musharraf: An Accuracy Test (NYT)

By David Rohde

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

PRESIDENT PERVEZ MUSHARRAF of Pakistan was in Washington, New York, and on TV screens across the United States last week to promote his country's efforts to counter Al Qaeda, but that was not all. He was also promoting his new autobiography "In the Line of Fire: A Memoir."

Speaking at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York Tuesday, the general repeatedly made statements that his critics, and some experts, questioned. Here are some of his remarks as transcribed by the Federal News Service, with responses from United Nations, Pakistani and United States officials.

ECONOMIC GROWTH

"Today, our G.D.P. growth over the last four years is 7 percent. Our per capita income has more than doubled. Our G.D.P. has doubled."

Kaiser Bengali, a Pakistani economist, says doubling Pakistan's per capita income and G.D.P. would require a higher growth rate than 7 percent or more time than four years.

PAKISTAN'S TRIBAL AREAS

"Now, there is no change in the ground military situation — not one soldier has moved out. We are in position."

DOJ_NMG_0072241

Pakistani officials say that under a deal with tribal leaders, Pakistani forces have withdrawn to their barracks and tribal militias now patrol the border area, where American officials believe Taliban members cross into and out of Afghanistan.

WHO RULES AFGHANISTAN

"Fifty to 60 percent of Afghanistan is Pashtun. Tajik — total percentage of Tajiks — is 5 percent." A member of the audience states the percentage is higher. "So, O.K., this will be about 7 or 8 percent, 9 percent. O.K."

General Musharraf was making a case that ethnic Pashtuns, a group that has been the Taliban's base of support in the past, are under-represented in the Afghan government, and that ethnic Tajiks from the country's north — including Panjsheris from the Panjshir Valley — hold too many positions. Pakistan has generally supported Afghanistan's Pashtuns. India has generally supported its Tajiks and Panjsheris.

The State Department says Pashtuns make up from 38 to 44 percent of Afghanistan's population, and Tajiks make up 25 percent. Half of the government ministers, including President Hamid Karzai, are Pashtuns, say American experts.

AFGHAN SECURITY FORCES

"In the ministry of interior and intelligence — if 50 percent people are Panjsheri, how will the Pashtun, the 50 percent population of Afghanistan, be feeling about it?"

American officials have led the training of the army, intelligence service and police, and see ethnical balance. The army is 49 percent Pashtun, 21 percent Tajik, a 2005 Congressional report said.

Musharraf's Memoir (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf has been hawking his memoir, "In the Line of Fire," from the White House to "The Daily Show." Several of the book's claims have already attracted wide notice, including details about nuclear technology obtained by North Korea and the assertion that then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage threatened to bomb Pakistan "back to the Stone Age" if it did not cooperate after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But the book packs a few lesser bombshells as well. Here's a guide to some of Musharraf's more notable passages:

On the killing of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl:

"Only after all the pieces had been put together did I realize that Omar Sheikh had panicked because the situation had spiraled out of his control. . . . The man who may have actually killed Pearl or at last participated in his butchery, we eventually discovered, was none other than Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, al Qaeda's number three." (p. 227-228)

Musharraf's remarks about the Pearl case have provided an unexpected boost to Sheik, a British militant who is awaiting execution in Pakistan. Sheik's lawyer now hopes to use the book to force a new hearing in the case.

On the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden:

"The fact that so many Saudis are in the Konar area [of Afghanistan] perhaps suggests that this is where Osama bin Laden has his hideout, but we cannot be sure. I have said, half-jokingly, that I hope he is not caught in Pakistan, by Pakistan's troops." (p. 221)

This claim amounts to a public slap at Afghan President Hamid Karzai -- who complains about Pakistani tolerance of militants along the border -- and U.S. intelligence officials, who have long thought that bin Laden is in Pakistan. The affront was made worse by timing: President Bush hosted Musharraf and Karzai last week at a joint dinner meant to improve relations between the two feuding leaders.

On reacting to pressure from the United States after 9/11:

"This was a shockingly barefaced threat, but it was obvious that the United States decided to hit back, and hit back hard. . . . I war-gamed the United States as an adversary. . . . [I]f we do not join them, can we confront them and withstand the onslaught? The answer was no, we could not. . . . " (p. 201)

DOJ_NMG_0072242

Armitage has denied making the "Stone Age" threat, and Musharraf's characterization of himself as defender of Pakistani prerogatives could be aimed at domestic politics.

On Pakistan's role in capturing al-Qaeda militants:

"We have captured 689 and handed over 369 to the United States. We have earned bounties totaling millions of dollars. Those who habitually accuse us of 'not doing enough' in the war on terror should simply ask the CIA how much prize money it has paid to the government of Pakistan." (p. 237)

U.S. officials immediately expressed ignorance about this claim, in part because the Justice Department's rewards program for information on terrorism suspects is supposed to dole out money to individuals, not governments.

On the 1999 military clash with Indian forces in the Kargil district of Kashmir:

"The Indians actually ran short of coffins, owing to an unexpectedly high number of casualties. . . . Our army, outnumbered and outgunned, fought this conflict with great valor. The number of Indian casualties proves the fighting prowess and professionalism of the officers and men of the Pakistan army." (p. 98)

Musharraf's boastful characterization of Pakistan's battle with India has once again roiled relations between the two neighboring nuclear states. The Kargil conflict, widely viewed as a disaster, set the stage for the coup that resulted in Musharraf's rise to power.

Iraq And Our Military Crisis (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, October 1, 2006

America has tough rebuilding process ahead

The U.S. military hasn't failed in Iraq. It accomplished exactly what it was asked to do, which was overthrow Saddam Hussein. What its leadership didn't bargain for – and what our military isn't built for – is the messy aftermath. Simply, Washington has asked its military to do too much with too little.

With massive technological superiority, the U.S. remains the world's most capable fighting force. But our inability to crush sectarian violence and terrorist insurgencies in Iraq illustrates the limits of military might. After all, a close-quarters conflict is an environment in which an improvised explosive device is more effective than a Tomahawk missile.

This unconventional fight has deeply strained our nation's military core and resources. Congress and President Bush must confront the manpower crisis and the threat it poses to preparedness and national security. The core of this country's readiness – the men and women in uniform – must be restored as smartly and quickly as possible.

Postponing this major overhaul only kicks the problem down the road. Politicians in Washington must address this before the next war – for surely there will be one.

It's time to listen to military leaders like Army Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, who recently held back a 2008 budget plan because he believes it didn't provide enough resources to perform its mission in Iraq and meet other worldwide commitments. That move probably did little for the general's career, but it is the dose of reality that Washington needs.

Unless things unexpectedly improve in Iraq, the Pentagon forecasts needed troop levels at about 144,000 through year's end. Any call for more troops ignores the obvious. We have gotten ourselves into such a bind that we can't send more without compromising vital military readiness elsewhere.

The Army has provided about 102,000 of the U.S. troops in Iraq and 16,000 of the 21,000 troops in Afghanistan. Many of these soldiers face second and third deployments. Two brigades recently had their scheduled departure dates from Iraq delayed.

The Army National Guard and Reserves face the same manpower and overdeployment issues. Additionally, equipment needed to train yet-to-be-deployed reserve units is being used – and destroyed – in Iraq, which exacerbates the training and readiness gap at home.

Some analysts contend that the Army needs to add as many as 100,000 troops to its 505,000 active-duty force to meet current commitments and future threats. For an all-volunteer force, that is a decade-long effort – not a fix for the immediate crisis in Iraq.

As this war drains resources at a troubling rate, we now have an even tougher rebuilding program ahead, one that will demand serious sacrifice by government and the people.

The elements of that sacrifice – whether a tax increase, a draft or some other drastic measure – are unpalatable topics headed into an election.

But we can't ignore them. Whatever problems the military faces today, we only compound them by dithering before the next big crisis. We must rebuild now.

The Humanitarian War Myth (WP)

By Eric A. Posner

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

More than 40,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed since the American-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, and the rate at which civilians die has been increasing in recent months. Many thousands of innocent Iraqis have been detained, and some have been abused by American troops. Many others have been tortured or killed by Iraqi police. Basic services have been lacking in large portions of the country for three years. Civil war looms, conjuring memories of the 16-year Lebanese civil war, during which more than 100,000 people were killed out of a population of fewer than 4 million.

Yet, if the United Nations were to have its way, the Iraqi debacle would be just the first in a series of such wars -- the effect of a well-meaning but ill-considered effort to make humanitarian intervention obligatory as a matter of international law. Today Iraq, tomorrow Darfur.

Civilians suffer in all wars, but the suffering of Iraqi civilians in this war is particularly unfortunate because one of the main justifications for the war was humanitarian: to rescue suffering Iraqis from a tyrant. There were other justifications, of course, including the related but distinct idea that bringing democracy to Iraq would enhance America's long-term security. But the humanitarian justification was embraced by many who rejected the other justifications, including liberal elites as well as some conservatives, and it helped mobilize public opinion behind the war. Events have served the humanitarian justification poorly.

The idea that war can have a humanitarian as well as a national security justification has a long pedigree and surface plausibility. Some of the worst atrocities of the 20th century occurred in weak states whose governments could not have resisted a foreign military invasion. The genocide in Rwanda, which killed more than 800,000 people in a few months, was eventually halted by a force of Tutsi rebels; surely a Western army could have stopped it sooner. If nations can intervene at little cost to themselves because the target nations are weak and by doing so they prevent massive human suffering, then surely they should do so. The logic seems compelling.

But logic is no substitute for experience, and experience shows that humanitarian war is an oxymoron. The first blow to the idea was the failed intervention in Somalia in 1993. U.S. forces sent to maintain the peace while aid was distributed to millions of starving civilians were withdrawn after just 18 U.S. soldiers died. Policymakers drew the lesson that the American public will not tolerate casualties in a humanitarian war that has no clear national security justification. This lesson guided President Bill Clinton's refusal to authorize military intervention during the Rwandan genocide and his decision to limit U.S. military intervention in Kosovo in 1999 to high-altitude bombing, which ensured that no American pilots were killed -- at the expense of civilians on whose heads errant bombs fell. The Kosovo intervention, although regarded as a success in some quarters, has cost billions of dollars, required a seven-year occupation and could turn out to be a slow-motion version of Iraq.

The Iraq war itself has dealt the second blow. The problem with humanitarian intervention is not only that the costs are usually too high, but it turns out that the benefits usually are low. There are just too many risks and imponderables when war is used to prevent atrocities rather than to defeat an enemy. Military weapons inevitably kill civilians, and smart tyrants foil smart bombs by using their own civilians as shields. Dictators understand that a war premised on humanitarianism fails if they can make the invader kill their citizens. Removing the dictator risks civil war, which is almost always worse than the original abuses.

Replacing him with another dictator only puts off the atrocities until another day. Long-term occupation breeds hostility, then insurgency and violence. In comparison with this, the original ruler might not seem so bad after all.

Saddam Hussein was an especially bad tyrant, and Iraqi civilian casualties attributable to the U.S. intervention do not yet equal what he was able to accomplish, albeit over a longer period. The Kurds and many Shiites are better off. And many Iraqis continue to think that the war was worth it, according to polls.

But polls do not reveal the opinions of dead Iraqis. The humanitarian effect of the war has been at best ambiguous against the baseline of the containment period that preceded it, and if current trends continue, the overall effect will be that of a humanitarian disaster.

Many people blame the humanitarian costs of the war in Iraq on the Bush administration's execution of it. This view is a psychological crutch that allows defenders of humanitarian intervention to keep the ideal alive for the next, presumably competent, administration of a President Hillary Clinton or John McCain. But complaints about this war are not noticeably different from complaints about earlier wars, where small mistakes (identifiable as such with the benefit of hindsight) resulted in enormous harm.

The Iraq war, consistent with experience, suggests that humanitarian wars will rarely yield humanitarian results. Why, then, is there a so-called "responsibility to protect" movement to make humanitarian intervention obligatory as a matter of international law? And why was this idea endorsed by the United Nations during its millennium summit?

The best humanitarians of our day recognize that we face a painful dilemma: to tolerate atrocities in foreign states or to risk committing worse atrocities in the course of ending them. From Rwanda, many people drew the lesson that failure to intervene is the worse option. The Iraq war may be the first step in unlearning this lesson. If not, an intervention in Darfur surely will be.

The writer is a professor of law at the University of Chicago and co-author of "The Limits of International Law."

ARROGANCE AND IGNORANCE (SFC)

By Todd Oppenheimer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 1, 2006

Three authors make the case that time and again, the U.S. has made disastrous mistakes in Iraq

During an army briefing in late 2003, as the opposition movement, and bloody battles, were mounting in Iraq, a lieutenant colonel presented his boss, a tough colonel, with a question: "Sir, what is the battlespace?" The colonel, reports Thomas Ricks in Fiasco: The American Military Adventure in Iraq, said it is the enemy, wherever you are fighting it. "Sir, wrong answer," the lieutenant dared to reply. "In counterinsurgency, the battlespace isn't physical, it's psychological. The battle is for the people."

To Ricks, the senior Pentagon correspondent for the Washington Post and winner of a Pulitzer Prize, and to the dozens of military historians, counterinsurgency experts and veteran commanders he quotes, this lieutenant was explaining the ABCs of counterinsurgency strategy. "The objective," he writes, "is first to gain control of the population, and then win their support." Why a lowly lieutenant colonel would have to lecture his commander on such fundamentals is at the core of three different but interrelated new books on the United States' series of campaigns in Iraq.

Individually, each of these books -- "Fiasco" (The Penguin Press; 482 pages; $27.95), Imperial Life in the Emerald City: Inside Iraq's Green Zone (Knopf; 320 pages; $25.95) and The End of Iraq: How American Incompetence Created a War Without End (Simon & Schuster; 260 pages; $26) -- has its shortcomings. But those misses are dwarfed by the weight of persuasive material each author has found, and by the elegance of their presentations. Taken together, their evidence makes a staggering case against President Bush and his staff. Their argument, in sum, is that the administration staged a war with a grateful, homogeneous country in mind rather than the proud, deeply sectarian culture it confronted; that it failed to plan for any contingency or any stabilizing follow-up beyond achieving quick success in toppling Saddam Hussein; that its officials in Iraq lived and behaved in a thoughtless, corrupt, imperious manner; that this wasted billions of dollars and alienated the Iraqis, thereby encouraging the insurgency. And, as things further unraveled, that it misinterpreted, and thus mishandled, one crisis after another.

How could prominent federal officials stumble so badly? A primary reason, according to these writers, is disturbingly simple: For those in charge of the Iraq campaign, neither knowledge of the Middle East nor expertise at one's job was a priority.

What mattered most was political commitment to Republican ideology, especially faith in the appeal of capitalism, preferably of the nouveau, top-down, supply-side variety. Critiques of this sort can sound ridiculous, like ill-informed whining from out-of-power liberals. That is not the case this time. Each of these books goes to extraordinary lengths to document the way key moments were poisoned, again and again, by amateur, often young ideologues who were playing Monopoly with one of the most volatile regions in the world.

Consider this from "Imperial Life in the Emerald City" by Rajiv Chandrasekaran, an editor at the Washington Post and formerly its Baghdad bureau chief. When new staffers were needed in Baghdad (and they were needed constantly), job applications were sent to James O'Beirne, the White House liaison at the Pentagon. O'Beirne considered one young man "an ideal candidate" primarily because he had worked for the Republican Party in the 2000 Florida recount. Two people said O'Beirne's staffers asked applicants if they supported Roe vs. Wade and had voted for Bush. A former staffer who worked near O'Beirne "saw senior civil servants from agencies like Treasury, Energy ... and Commerce denied positions in Baghdad that were instead handed to prominent Republican National Committee contributors." The job of reforming the Iraqi stock exchange -- a critical piece of the administration's privatization program -- was given to Jay Hallen, a 24-year-old political operative who had no business experience; he soon fired his sole assistant, a 39-year-old family man who had worked in insurance and financial services, been a private investigator and spent six years in the Navy.

The president's team especially liked swaggering tough guys, believing that people of this ilk get things done. Often they did, but at a cost. One example was Bernard Kerik, who achieved fame as New York City's Rambo-like police commissioner during the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Kerik was appointed chief training adviser for the Iraqi police force, which had been almost entirely scattered after the war by looters and insurgents, both of whom had more powerful weapons than police officers did. Rather than bother with formal training programs, or pesky meetings where he could be briefed by people who knew the lay of the land, Kerik, an accomplished publicity hound, started staging nighttime raids.

The raids produced a stream of glowing news stories, but they also endangered innocent Iraqis and American soldiers, who sometimes fired on the raiders thinking they were insurgents. It was all great fun for Kerik, who abruptly resigned three months into the job. ("I was in my own world," he told Chandrasekaran. "I did my own thing.") Incidents like this became so consistent that British occupation officials -- presumably informed by their own history of imperialism in Iraq -- posted a sign in their compound saying, "YEE-HAW IS NOT A FOREIGN POLICY."

It is if you think the battle space is nothing but sand, weeds and people desperate for U.S.-style capitalism. An indication that President Bush's views were roughly that simple occurs in early 2003, just two months before he launched the invasion. That January, Bush met with three prominent Iraqi Americans. "As the three described what they thought would be the political situation after Saddam's fall, they talked about Sunnis and Shiites," reports Peter W. Galbraith in "The End of Iraq." "It became apparent to them that the president was unfamiliar with these terms. The three spent part of the meeting explaining that there are two major sects in Islam."

Although the ultimate blame for a campaign that fails at a cost of $5 billion a month obviously falls on the president, the finger in each of these books points repeatedly at a more direct target: Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Judging from these and other reporters' accounts, Rumsfeld has little patience for scholarly deliberation, and he seems allergic to the concept of planning. In Rumsfeld's view, wartime events are so hard to predict that lengthy strategy discussions are a waste of time. The consequences of this outlook fill much of Ricks' book. In one chapter after another, we see veteran commanders by turns stunned, confused, enraged and finally saddened, as they watch both Americans and Iraqis getting killed in conflicts that are far more chaotic and violent than they needed to be.

Rumsfeld's survival, despite these disasters, proves how expertly he has mastered the art of dodging responsibility. He even tried to avoid responsibility for Paul Bremer, the man he hired to head the Coalition Provisional Authority, and who left after a year under a cloud of disappointment. After one White House meeting, Ricks reports, where "there was a lot of 'grousing' about Bremer," Condoleezza Rice (then the national security adviser) reminded Rumsfeld that Bremer reported to him. " 'No, he doesn't,' Rumsfeld responded -- incorrectly -- [an] official recalled. 'He's been talking to the NSC [the National Security Council], he works for the NSC.' "

After finishing these books, one is struck by how differently each one succeeds, and fails, both as a story and as an argument.

In the case of "Fiasco," we simultaneously have a tour de force and an incomplete work. Page for page, Ricks' reporting shows unparalleled diligence, fairness and knowledge of military affairs -- much of the reason, no doubt, that the book has gotten such well-deserved attention. One way Ricks' mastery of his subject comes through is in his approach to sourcing. Ricks uses two techniques that other nonfiction writers -- journalist and scholar alike -- would do well to copy.

First, his every assertion is backed up by a web of confirming material from experts or authoritative documents, often both. Second, when he quotes people, he tells you who they are. A random example: "I don't think you can understand [the 2003 invasion of Iraq] without understanding the end of the 1991 war, especially the distrust of Americans' that resulted, said Army Reserve Maj. Michael Eisenstadt, an intelligence officer who in civilian life is an expert on Middle Eastern security issues." For a skeptical reader, nothing is more satisfying.

For all of Ricks' knowledge, however, he remains strangely blind to the larger implications of his material. One of his main arguments is that the Iraq campaign failed because the military lacked a coordinated strategy, which should have been formed at the top (by Bush and/or Rumsfeld) and sent down through the chain of command to be transformed into supporting tactics for soldiers in the field. Ricks certainly supports this claim. But he also presents scenes of some of the military's smartest commanders putting great effort into developing supposedly sound counterinsurgency strategies, which are soon foiled by Iraqi militants.

The prime example is the famous battle of Fallujah, in March 2004. The soldiers there were Marines, who, Ricks indicates, were generally more sensitive to Iraqis than the Army was. Fallujah was a well-known hotbed of opposition. So the Marines' commander, Maj. Gen. James Mattis, rigorously prepared his troops to execute a judicious, surgical strategy. No one, it seems, could have carried this off better than Mattis. He is restrained, highly respected and unusually well read on the history of warfare, including counterinsurgencies; Ricks calls him "one of the most intense intellectuals in the U.S. military." Pages later, Ricks describes how thoroughly Fallujah blew up in the Marines' faces. And he leaves it at that.

If strategy is paramount, and an unusually enlightened strategy fails, something bigger must be going on. From all appearances, plenty of strategies were tried. The problem is the administration never found one that worked. Could that mean that a military campaign in Iraq was doomed to fail, regardless of the approach taken? Strangely, Ricks never ponders this contradiction.

It's possible that, like many diligent researchers, Ricks may have simply gotten lost in the sheer abundance of his material -- an excess, unfortunately, that is too often dumped on the reader. Midway through "Fiasco," one begins to notice a redundancy in his scenes, and a creeping sense that, for all the riveting details, he won't get much beyond his basic critique. I particularly longed for a thorough conversation with Rumsfeld. Not only is this yet another moment of accountability that Rumsfeld escapes, there is also no indication that Ricks, or any of these authors, even pursued an interview.

Still, Ricks' best arguments are solid, and groundbreaking. He shows how American officials unwittingly recruited, financed and armed Iraqi insurgents. Blame for these moves, well explained by all three authors, points directly at Bremer. In his effort to rid the government of Saddam loyalists, Bremer ordered a purge. Unfortunately, his directives, which were never cleared in Washington, went too far, suddenly putting more than three-quarters of a million Iraqis out of work. (Many of these people were innocent civilians who belonged to Saddam's party simply to avoid prosecution.) This not only broke the economy -- indeed, the entire society -- it also produced hordes of angry Iraqis, who now saw great opportunities in the insurgency.

In his final chapter, Ricks sheds valuable new light on how the Iraq war has hurt U.S. prestige and credibility, and empowered our opponents. He then lays out four scenarios, from best case to a chilling worst case, of our future in the Middle East. Even the best case "means staying in Iraq for years," Ricks writes. Its closest analogy is the American war in the Philippines, which ran from 1899 to 1946, and which started as a similarly naive conventional campaign, turned into a messy guerrilla war, and eventually transformed into a peaceful, even friendly, long-term effort at containment. Two worse possibilities are repeats of France's humiliation in Algeria in the 1950s and 1960s, or Israel's in Lebanon, where the invader wins the battle but sorely loses the global PR war. Those scenarios may allow for an early, face-saving pullout, in Ricks' view, but they're likely to leave a civil and perhaps regional war and unsecured oil fields at the center of these disputes. This could prompt yet another U.S. invasion of Iraq, and maybe of its neighbors, too.

The final, "nightmare" scenario involves a new Iraqi strongman, an outcome that a 2005 poll says three-fourths of Iraqis want. That strongman, Ricks writes, is likely to be an Islamic purist who could unify the Arab world against the West. Propelled by both popular support and oil revenues, this leader might well restart some weapons programs. In such a scenario, Ricks writes, "the West would have to consider a war of preemption -- but this time its soldiers might really face nuclear, biological, or chemical weapons."

For his part, Chandrasekaran hardly misses a trick. His main subject is the dysfunctional culture inside the Green Zone, the lavish palace compound that used to be Saddam's and that, ironically, became the walled-off command center for Iraq's new occupiers. This narrower target allows for more focused inquiries, which Chandrasekaran milks abundantly. Seemingly every time some odd screw-up or oversight occurs, Chandrasekaran follows it up, tracing it out into the field in Iraq, and back to its source in Washington. Each misstep is described fully, calmly, concisely, with plenty of drama when necessary. In fact, when incidents come up in all three books, Chandrasekaran is sometimes the one who explores them with the greatest nuance.

Unfortunately, his book's virtues also lead to its demerits. He has no grand, novel argument, and no significant vision for the future. But he doesn't pretend to. He delivers exactly what he promises.

Which leaves us with Peter W. Galbraith, who, despite having the shortest book ("The End of Iraq"), attempts the most ambitious argument of the three. Galbraith is the son of the economist John Kenneth Galbraith. He's also a former U.S. ambassador to Croatia and a former staffer on the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee, for which he traveled in Iraq working in support of the Kurds. Such extensive experience laces Galbraith's story with compelling scenes. (In one incident he even goes undercover, dressing as a local.) His background also emboldens Galbraith to speak in stronger terms. An example is one of his chapter titles -- "Arrogance and Ignorance" -- three words that may be the most concise explanation yet for the whole American story in Iraq.

Galbraith's finale is his argument for how Iraq should be remade. He calls this "the three-state solution" -- that is, three quasi-independent regions for Iraq's three warring sects, the Sunnis, the Shiites and the Kurds. Galbraith's idea has already gotten some traction in Congress, primarily with Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del.. And, upon reading through his accounts of the gruesome, relentless persecution that the Kurds have endured ("After all that I heard and saw," he writes, "I was convinced the Kurds would never voluntarily agree to be part of Iraq again."), it is tempting to side with him. The problem is that Galbraith's vision dumps him into the strategic quagmire that now surrounds Iraq.

Even a casual reading of Middle East history demonstrates that Iraq's political landscape has long been complex, and its internal alliances and demographics ever-changing. Even on fundamentals of Iraq history -- and the new Iraq constitution that Galbraith helped draft -- other Mideast experts have very different takes. (See, for example, 2005's "Understanding Iraq," by veteran Harvard historian William Polk, and the writings of University of Oxford historian Reidar Visser, especially 2006's "Basra, the Failed Gulf State: Separatism and Nationalism in Southern Iraq.") Iraq's future, as Galbraith at times argues, is probably best left to the Iraqis.

Curiously, a missing ingredient in Galbraith's book, and in the two others as well, is any serious look at the region's glorious but eternally troubled history. We get close a few times, once in a delicious conversation, reported by Galbraith, between an Iraqi and an occupation official:

" 'You must have thoroughly studied the history of the British occupation of Iraq,' the Iraqi said to the self-confident American.

" 'Yes, I did,' the latter replied.

" 'I thought so,' said the Iraqi, 'because you seem determined to repeat every one of their mistakes.' "

Actually, the administration has been more thorough than that. A little further reading of history, in combination with these three books, shows that the Bush administration has repeated mistakes made in Vietnam as well.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE: Federal Prosecutor Admits Passion For Corruption Cases May Not Translate Into Shift In Political Culture (NIT)

By Joe Carlson

Northwest Indiana Times, October 1, 2006

After five years, Van Bokkelen says corruption indictments still major priority

With a mission to fight political corruption, Joe Van Bokkelen knew he had a major job on his hands in becoming the top federal prosecutor in a district that included Lake County.

Sure, Van Bokkelen and his prosecutors in the U.S. attorney's office have sent hundreds of drug dealers and gang thugs to prison -- particularly felons carrying firearms in defiance of strong federal anti-gun laws.

But when he came to office five years ago this month, Van Bokkelen carried a bias toward fighting public corruption.

In a wide-ranging interview last week, he said he's proud of the work accomplished under his watch. Those jailed include a former U.S. congresswoman (Katie Hall), a former state party chairman (Peter Manous), a former town judge (Deborah Riga), and more than 30 county, city and township employees.

"For the life of me, I don't understand why public officials think they're entitled to more money than the statute says," he said. "You shouldn't become a public servant to get rich. I have no tolerance for people who think they're entitled to more."

But some observers question the long-term impact of his work. Can one watchdog office change a political culture? Even Van Bokkelen acknowledged disappointment that his prosecutors' efforts don't seem to have changed the expectations voters have for their public servants.

U.S. Sen. Dick Lugar, who nominated Van Bokkelen to the office five years ago, had only praise for Van Bokkelen's "extraordinarily aggressive" efforts at fighting public corruption.

"His remarkable anticorruption and law enforcement efforts have been impressive and are appreciated locally as well as by the U.S. Justice Department and the White House," Lugar said in a written statement.

County Republican Party Chairman John Curley and Democratic Chairman Rudy Clay said Van Bokkelen had put the fear of God into certain political figures across the county.

"I think corruption in Lake County has diminished because of Joe Van Bokkelen," Clay said. "It's obvious that if your hand is caught in the cookie jar, you're going to suffer the penalties."

Scott King had a less sanguine view.

King has worked with Van Bokkelen in various roles since the 1970s, most recently as mayor of Gary, a city where federal prosecutors have spent considerable energies over the years.

King said public officials inclined to do wrong may not make their decisions based on what prosecutor happens to be in office at the time.

"I don't think good government gets made by outside investigative forces," King said. "It doesn't hurt, but that doesn't make it."

Van Bokkelen described a view that was closer to King's than Clay's.

He admitted disappointment that his focus on public corruption and the number of public officials his prosecutors have sent to jail have not created more desire to shake up the status quo in Lake County politics.

"People complain about government, but you tend to get the government you vote for," he said. "If at the end of the day you have to look to this office to get rid of those people, you've got problems. It has to start with the voters."

That doesn't mean Van Bokkelen, a Republican, wants to discourage voters from their long history of Democratic dominance. Voters can also voice their dissent in primary elections, but they haven't, he said.

"Lake County, as an electorate, seems satisfied with the status quo. They seem happy to let this office and (County Prosecutor) Bernie Carter's office take care of the people who get too far out of line," Van Bokkelen said.

Regardless of long-range impact, Van Bokkelen said he will not serve under another president, meaning he will retire by 2008 at the latest. He says he already knows when he will step down, but would not discuss it further.

In response to the requisite media inquiry about whether the near future holds more public corruption indictments, he put up a foot on his coffee table and replied in the affirmative.

"I think it's been a reasonably busy summer, and it's going to be a busy fall. I don't think I'll be wrong about that," he said. "We're going to be vigilant. ... And if anyone thinks we're not going to prosecute because we're stretched to the limit, they've got another thing coming."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Silicon Valley A 'Hotbed' For Spying (CCT)

By K. Oanh Ha

The Contra Costa Times, October 1, 2006

One day last June, FBI agents swooped into two affluent Silicon Valley homes and arrested two engineers. Lan Lee and Yuefei Ge stand accused of stealing proprietary chip designs and software from their employer, NetLogic Microsystems of Mountain View and Taiwan Semiconductor Manufacturing Co. in San Jose.

Now investigators are asking the Justice Department to charge Lee, an American citizen, and Ge, a Chinese national, with a more serious crime: economic espionage to benefit China.

The case highlights China's role as the main adversary in a complex game of 21st century espionage where many agents aren't trained spies in trench coats but businessmen, students and researchers. Silicon Valley, counterintelligence experts say, is ground zero.

"Silicon Valley is a hotbed" of economic espionage, said Don Przybyla, who heads a FBI counterintelligence unit in San Jose. The valley is home to many of the estimated 3,000 Chinese front companies nationwide set up to steal secrets and acquire technology, according to the FBI.

Lee and Ge allegedly set up a front company backed by a Beijing venture capital firm with links to China's military and planned to go into business with the Chinese government.

In a global economy where intellectual property has become a valuable currency, state-directed espionage increasingly targets technology and commercial trade secrets to advance a nation's military and economic strength.

The intertwining of the economies of America and China complicates the problem, experts say.

"America's being robbed blind. ... We simply don't want to believe it," said John Tkacik Jr., of the conservative think tank Heritage Foundation, who headed China intelligence analysis at the State Department in the early '90s.

Other countries -- including U.S. allies such as France and Israel -- also steal American secrets, but China tops the list, experts say.

China is "the No. 1 counterintelligence threat that the U.S. faces," said David Szady, who until this spring was assistant director of the FBI's counterintelligence division.

"If you look at where the Chinese are going to get a lot of the research and development, cutting edge technology, from nanotechnology to quantum physics to the next generation of missiles and planes -- that all points to Silicon Valley," he added.

To counter the growing problem, the FBI added the San Jose economic espionage and counterintelligence unit in September, said officials. The FBI also operates an economic espionage unit in Palo Alto.

"We see the same people and institutions in China popping up again and again," said Julie Salcido, who oversees a Commerce Department unit in San Jose that focuses on export violations of technology with potential military uses.

The culprits may be government-backed research institutions, state-owned enterprises or individual provincial governments.

China's central government runs a program linked to its military, dubbed 863, that invests in companies with innovative technologies and that the FBI suspects is involved in many economic espionage cases.

China has a "market-driven espionage effort. What they collect is what they need," said Paul Moore, who served as the FBI's top analyst on Chinese counterintelligence for 20 years.

Jianhua Li, a Chinese embassy spokesman in Washington, D.C., scoffed at the claim that China is the chief threat to U.S. trade secrets.

"That assessment is not true," he said in a telephone interview. "You don't have evidence that the Chinese government is sending people to the United States to do this."

Experts say Chinese espionage often involves tapping the hundreds of thousands of Chinese students and visiting business executives in the United States.

A modest number of Chinese nationals living in the U.S. and Americans of Chinese descent also are recruited to help acquire information or technology, experts say.

U.S. spy catchers have been accused of unfairly targeting ethnic Chinese. That charge arose in the case of Los Alamos nuclear weapons scientist Wen Ho Lee, a Taiwanese-born American citizen suspected of giving nuclear secrets to China.

He was released in 2000 after pleading guilty to a felony count of mishandling classified information.

Even in the aftermath of Lee, some Asian-Americans still complain of racial profiling.

Szady counters that the government isn't singling out Chinese-Americans -- the Chinese government is.

The FBI's Palo Alto office is investigating about a dozen economic espionage cases with suspected ties to China, said Przybyla.

Nationwide, the number of cases involving China is not available, but it has spiked more than 50 percent in the past few years, said Szady.

The economic espionage unit only investigates cases in which it suspects involvement by a foreign government, though perpetrators often are charged with the lesser crime of trade secret theft.

That's because proving government involvement is difficult, partly because money isn't always a visible ingredient of the plot, experts said.

"Typically, China doesn't directly pay people dollars for documents," said Moore. But he added that money or a business deal might be in the background.

The Chinese word for intelligence agent is "pengyou," or friend, added Moore, who is compiling a dictionary of Chinese spying.

Appealing to the sympathetic to help China modernize is China's "holy grail of motivation," Moore said.

In many espionage cases in which suspects were simply charged with the theft of trade secrets, investigators suspected the Chinese government was the intended beneficiary, said Ross Nadel, the U.S. attorney who until this year handled all of the economic espionage cases in the Northern District of California court.

The FBI has set up an outreach program for defense contractors and Silicon Valley companies, but agents say they often encounter resistance from victimized firms.

Many corporations don't want the exposure, particularly public firms that fear news of a lost trade secret might hurt stock prices, say investigators.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pirro Receives Support At S.I. Rally (NSDY)

By Bryan Virasami, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 2, 2006

At a Staten Island rally, Jeanine Pirro got a warm welcome from her Republican colleagues who also slammed her opponent and vowed to stick with her through Election Day despite her recent bug planting scandal.

In a show of Republican unity, Pirro, the state GOP candidate for attorney general, was among friendly faces at the rally that included gubernatorial candidate John Faso and Rep. Vito Fossella of Staten Island.

DOJ_NMG_0072251

After the rally, Pirro made another defiant call for Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to appoint a special prosecutor to investigate the leak about her alleged plot to bug her husband's boat over suspicions he was having an affair.

Pirro said she wants a "fast track" probe of the leak to help clear her name so that she can focus on the campaign.

"We've seen it too often. You hear about smears in a political campaign and then all of a sudden at the end of the campaign it all goes away," Pirro said. "Not this time, not with this candidate and not here in New York any more."

At the rally, inside an office of Fossella's, a few dozen supporters showed up, including veterans and union leaders.

A man in the crowded office, appearing as if to counter the views of some critics, shouted words of encouragement to Pirro: "You're an extremely serious candidate, extremely serious. Don't drop out."

Faso issued the strongest words of support to Pirro and knocked her opponent in the race, Andrew Cuomo.

"If you put the credentials of our candidate for attorney general versus their candidate, you will find their candidate ... has a last name but he has no credentials," Faso said.

Some Republicans said Pirro can remain a strong candidate.

"I think she's handling it well," said former Republican mayoral candidate Thomas Ognibene of Queens. "It was no harm, no foul but the fact this information was released ... in the middle of the campaign is something we need to be concerned about."

Pirro later marched in the annual Staten Island Columbus Day Parade. Among the officials there were Mayor Michael Bloomberg and his girlfriend, Diana Taylor and City Council Speaker Christine Quinn.

Some women along the route were jumping to Pirro's defense yesterday.

"I like what she stands for and I don't like what they're doing to her, the other side," said Joyce Nolan, a doctor's receptionist from Staten Island, referring to Democrats. "I think they're giving her a raw deal because she's really good."

Pirro Plan A Conspiracy? (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler And Jennifer Sinco Kelleher, Newsday Staff Writers

Long Island Newsday, October 1, 2006

To federal prosecutors, it may not matter that attorney general candidate Jeanine Pirro and former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik did not fully act on discussions about planting a bug on her husband's boat to try to find out if he was having an extramarital affair. Regardless, the two still may have violated federal conspiracy laws, sources familiar with the investigation said Saturday.

One source noted that if someone plans and takes steps to carry out a bank robbery, one doesn't actually have to rob a bank to be charged with conspiracy.

But in an interview Saturday, Pirro's attorney, Paul Shechtman, scoffed at the entire investigation.

"As Gertrude Stein once said, 'There is no there there,'" Shechtman said. "Conspiring to put a recording device on marital property is not a federal crime."

Kerik's attorney, Joseph Tacopina, could not be immediately reached for comment.

It is not entirely clear under what circumstances one spouse can bug another or whether the site of the potential bugging -- in this case, the boat of Pirro's husband, Albert -- is a joint marital property, the sources said.

Pirro, a Republican who formerly served as Westchester district attorney, has admitted discussing the bugging plan, but has said she did so in anger over the possibility that her husband was cheating.

The sources also rejected Jeanine Pirro's suggestion that the investigation was politically motivated or a continuation of what she calls a vendetta against her and her husband by Elliott Jacobson, an assistant U.S. attorney.

Jacobson successfully prosecuted Albert Pirro for tax evasion, for which Pirro was sent to prison for 11 months, and is actively involved in the current investigations of Jeanine Pirro and Kerik. The sources acknowledged that the current investigations are centered in the U.S. attorney's branch office in White Plains, where Jacobson works.

But the sources noted that Michael Garcia, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District, was appointed by President George W. Bush and that he is not known for launching what might be considered controversial investigations.

Saturday afternoon, one of Jeanine Pirro's neighbors shouted at reporters in front of the candidate's sprawling Harrison home that the family should be left alone.

"I think they need privacy," barked Anthony Pergola from his red BMW, its engine idling. "What happens in her personal life shouldn't affect her winning the election."

Pirro herself voiced a similar message in a radio interview Saturday on WABC/770 AM, in which she said the FBI should focus on terrorism and other issues plaguing society -- not people's private lives.

"The private lives of everyone are really not relevant and shouldn't be a part of federal investigations," Pirro said. "Since when does the federal government have no work to do? We've got terrorism on the plate. We've got all kinds of major issues -- gangs, drugs. And they want to get involved in the married lives of couples? This isn't what law enforcement should be about. The FBI should have better things to do."

News reporters and photographers have been camped in front of the Pirros' home since Friday, when the photograph of Al Pirro's reputed mistress was plastered on the covers of newspapers and aired on television. Sources have confirmed that Jeanine Pirro suspected her husband was having an affair with Lisa Santangelo, who has long been a friend of the Pirros. She and her husband, attorney Michael Santangelo, live nearby. Michael Santangelo defended Al Pirro at his trial for tax evasion in 1999 and 2000, and negotiated deals for clients with Jeanine Pirro, then the Westchester district attorney.

In the radio interview Saturday, Pirro described the bugging plan as a kind of extension of her lawyerly instincts.

"I wanted to know if my suspicions were correct," she said. "I've always put evidence where my allegations are. I didn't want to be in a situation accusing someone without knowing."

Aside from the radio interview, Pirro kept a low profile Saturday. Through the morning and much of the afternoon, no one emerged from her home, where a large black poodle frolicked on the manicured lawn.

Today, Pirro is expected to attend a rally on Staten Island and later march in the Columbus Day parade there. After that, she is scheduled to make an appearance at a street festival in Brooklyn.

Jurors Acquit Vigil On 23 Of 24 Counts (LAT/AP)

By Tim Korte, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE — A former state treasurer was convicted Saturday of one count of attempted extortion and acquitted of 23 remaining counts of extortion and racketeering in his public corruption trial.

Robert Vigil's conviction for attempted extortion carries a possible prison sentence of up to 20 years, but the judge could sentence him to as little as 12 months.

Vigil sat motionless as the counts were read in court shortly after 1 p.m. His wife, Viola, and other relatives began to cry as U.S. District Judge James Browning read "not guilty" on the 23 counts.

When they first indicted Vigil last year, prosecutors alleged a web of public corruption in which Vigil gave business to investment advisers in exchange for kickbacks. Vigil resigned in October 2005, after the Legislature started impeachment proceedings.

The federal investigation -- code-named "Midas Touch" -- spanned two years and also led to the arrest of Michael Montoya, Vigil's predecessor. Montoya pleaded guilty to lesser charges and aided the prosecution in its case against Vigil.

The charges sent shock waves through state government and triggered a flurry of proposals to tighten oversight of the treasurer's office and its investment of nearly $5 billion in public money.

The jury began deliberations Friday, after a nearly four-week trial during which the defense called no witnesses.

Outside the courthouse, Vigil's lawyer Sam Bregman said of the single conviction: "That one count is where we feel we have our best legal basis to overturn it." Vigil did not take questions.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Gerson said he was pleased the jury had found Vigil guilty on the one count. The attempted extortion count involved a former treasurer's office employee who claimed Vigil pressured him to hire the wife of a former treasurer as a subcontractor.

Vigil, a Democrat and former state auditor, was elected to a four-year term as treasurer in November 2002 and took office in 2003.

Jury foreman Bill Strouse said the panelists didn't believe government witnesses, including Montoya. "The acquittal doesn't mean Mr. Vigil was universally admired," he said. "It just means he wasn't guilty of a crime."

Because he was not convicted of racketeering, Vigil will not have to face proceedings to forfeit about $255,000 that the government had claimed was linked to kickbacks.

Vigil was allowed to remain free pending a sentencing hearing. A date for that hearing was not immediately set.

His first prosecution last spring ended in a mistrial May 22 when one juror held out for an acquittal.

Vigil Guilty In Corruption Case (KRQE-TV)

KRQE-TV, October 1, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE -- Former State Treasurer Robert Vigil faces up to 20 years in prison after being found guilty Saturday of one of the 24 racketeering and extortion charges filed against him.

The federal court jury acquitted Vigil of the other 24 counts convicting him of attempted extortion.

The verdict ending the four-week trial was reached after 1 1/2 days of deliberations. At 11:35 a.m. jurors sent U.S. District Judge James Browning a note indicating they were ready to share the verdict read in open court early this afternoon.

Vigil walked out arm in arm with his family today ending his second trial.

Jurors found him not guilty of demanding and accepting kickbacks while state treasurer despite what appeared to be compelling evidence against him including secret recordings and testimony from former colleagues who cooperated with the FBI and federal prosecutors.

Undercover video showed Vigil accepting thousands of dollars in cash from a man doing business with the state. However juror Michael Cisneros told KRQE News 13 the evidence didn't convince him Vigil demanded any payments but did suggest he had been set up.

Jurors agreed on the one extortion count because some things Vigil did couldn't be overlooked, he added.

"They convicted Mr. Vigil of the 24th charge, and they've adjudged him a felon," Assistant U. S. Attorney Jonathon Gerson said. "The jury found the government proved beyond a reasonable doubt Mr. Vigil committed extortion while in office."

The charge of attempted extortion centered on the testimony of George Everage, a former employee in the treasurer's office who resigned to pursue contract work.

Everage testified Vigil would not hire him for the independent contract position unless Everage hired the wife of former State Treasurer Michael Montoya, Vigil's predecessor.

Vigil's attorney Sam Bregman promised an appeal.

"He was found guilty on one count, and that count actually is where we feel we have our best legal basis to overturn that count," Bregman said. Right now Vigil and his family would like some time alone, his attorneys said.

A sentencing date for Vigil has not been set. He faces one to 20 years in prison for attempted extortion.

Vigil trial began Sept. 5 with testimony ending Thursday when the defense rested without calling any witnesses and relying instead on vigorous cross-examination of prosecution witnesses.

The defense used the same strategy in the first trial which ended in May with jurors saying they were hopelessly deadlocked 11-1 for conviction on some of the charges.

Joan Vennochi Column: Carnage On The Streets Falling On Deaf Ears (BOS)

By Joan Vennochi, Globe Columnist

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

ACROSS THE COUNTRY, violent crime is on the rise. Does anyone in Washington care?

No, complains a growing chorus of police chiefs and mayors.

``They're not home," says Boston's mayor, Thomas M. Menino, when asked about the federal response to pleas for assistance in fighting urban crime. ``Mayors are frustrated. They're on the frontlines, and no one's helping."

The global war on terrorism -- the one fought in Iraq, Afghanistan, and at home -- is now the Bush administration's priority. The other war on terror -- the one against street gangs and miscellaneous thugs across America -- is left to resource-deprived locals.

``The federal government has stepped back significantly from dealing with the issue of local crime," charges Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton. ``This administration in Washington clearly feels that local crime is an issue for local towns and municipalities."

Bratton said he and other local law enforcement officials met last summer with US Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and ``expressed our frustration" with the lack of support from Washington. According to Bratton, Gonzales was not moved by their pleas: ``He told us the priorities of the federal government have to be focused on issues of terrorism, to prevent the cataclysmic casualties we saw clearly at the World Trade Center [during the Sept. 11, 2001 attack]. But the reality is, the 16,000 American citizens we are losing to gun violence and many thousands of others being shot, far surpasses anything launched by groups engaged in terrorism."

The FBI's latest statistics show that violent crime -- murder, robbery, and aggravated assault -- increased by 2.3 percent between 2004 and 2005. This is the largest one -year increase in 14 years, according to research done by the Police Executive Research Forum, a law enforcement policy center based in Washington.

A spike in homicides and robberies forced the police chief in Washington to declare a crime emergency over the summer. Overall, crime is down in New York City; but as The New York Times has reported, crime committed by young people, including murder, is rising.

Boston is confronting an increase in shootings -- 256 nonfatal shootings and 39 homicides with a firearm so far in 2006, versus 208 nonfatal shootings and 30 homicides with a firearm at the same time in 2005. This past week, shots were fired at a group of Charlestown High School students. Fortunately, no one was hurt in the brazen attack, which may be linked to a notorious street gang. Indeed, Boston police believe 65 percent of such shootings are gang-related.

``We are on the front end of a tipping point of a surge in violent crime," said Chuck Wexler, head of the Police Executive Research Forum.

In August, police chiefs and mayors gathered in Washington at a forum sponsored by Wexler's group to discuss the problem. The session led to follow-up conversations with top Justice Department officials, but as of yet, no funding commitments. During a recent press briefing, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty emphasized the decrease in property crime and downplayed more ominous trends.

As violence increases, the federal government is offering fewer resources specifically targeted to fight such crime . In the 1990s, local officials successfully lobbied the Clinton administration for help in fighting gang violence. In Bill Clinton's last budget cycle, $500 million in discretionary funding went straight to police departments across the country. The money put officers on the street and supported gang prevention programs. The Bush administration has since redirected funding from police departments to faith-based organizations; from community policing to homeland security; from discretionary funding to restricted.

In Boston, for example, the police department averaged about $6 million a year in discretionary funding from 1996 to 2002. From 2003 to 2005, the Boston Police Department averaged $3 million a year. So far in 2006, the BPD received a little over $2 million. Meanwhile, federal homeland security grants were specifically designated for port security and emergency training and equipment.

The willingness to ignore the latest crime statistics might also be explained by its flesh-and-blood victims. ``Males, blacks, and persons age 24 or younger continued to be victimized at higher rates than females, whites, and persons age 25 or older," concluded a National Crime Victimization Survey, released recently by the US Department of Justice.

The global war on terrorism is now a national priority, but it took the shock of 9/11 to make that happen.

What will it take to make the homegrown violence on America's streets of equal concern in the nation's capital?

Experiment Will Test The Effectiveness Of Post-Prison Employment Programs (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

CHICAGO — As raw garbage streamed by on a conveyer belt, newly released convicts pulled out paper, plastics and other recyclables on a recent morning, throwing aside the occasional brick or mattress.

DOJ_NMG_0072255

Noisy, dusty and smelly, paying $6.50 an hour, the jobs yield neither the swagger nor the swag that these men and women chased as drug dealers, thieves or worse. But many of them see the temporary work as a fresh start.

The jobs are arranged by a Chicago charity, the Safer Foundation, which works with current and former prisoners. Offering transitional jobs like these — immediate, closely supervised work and help finding permanent employment — is a growing tactic in the effort to usher felons back to society and curb recidivism. Now the effectiveness of this approach is about to be tested scientifically for the first time.

Starting in January, the employment and recidivism rates of 2,000 newly released male prisoners, all with similar histories of little work and poor schooling, will be studied in Detroit, Milwaukee, St. Paul and Chicago.

Half of the men will receive more limited aid: instruction in work behavior, résumé preparation and other employment skills and help looking for a job. The other half will get those services and also a few months of temporary work in places like the recycling plant here — a chance for them to get into the unfamiliar rhythms of a regular job.

The experiment, which will track the two groups over three years, is being sponsored by the Joyce Foundation in Chicago and directed by the Manpower Development Research Corporation in New York, which specializes in scientific studies of poverty programs.

Separately, the research group is conducting a controlled study of the transitional jobs program at the Center for Employment Opportunities in New York, which provides maintenance crews for public facilities and has been a national model.

"If you ask inmates what they want most, they want a job," said Mindy Tarlow, executive director of the center in New York. "But they don't know what that means."

She added, "What we're competing with is making some money at night on a street corner instead of having to show up somewhere at 8 a.m. every day."

Despite the apparent promise of transitional jobs, questions remain about their long-term effectiveness that the study hopes to address.

Are those who last through these programs such a select group — so motivated to change — that they would succeed anyway, or can well-timed help turn others around, too?

Can work-site counseling, sobriety meetings and a strong dose of mainstream work overcome the criminal pull of old haunts and friends?

And more fundamentally: will people with low skills, even if they adapt to steady work, ever make wages high enough to support a family and stifle the temptation to return to crime?

Roberto Reyes, a 36-year-old high school dropout in Chicago who has served seven years on burglary, gun and drug charges, works the conveyer belt at a recycling plant that is run for the city by Allied Waste Services.

Mr. Reyes has labored at the plant for four months, the longest he has held a job. "The money here is not that much, but it's better than nothing," he said. "Sometimes you wake up and don't want to come to work, but I'm not going to leave this until I find another job. I knew I couldn't just keep going on with that lifestyle and see life pass me by."

Mr. Reyes's determination is evident, but the numbers and records of people in his situation are daunting.

In Chicago, more than 20,000 prisoners come home from state facilities each year. Fifty-four percent are re-incarcerated within three years for new crimes or parole violations — a tale of wasted lives and victimized communities that is repeated nationwide among more than 600,000 prisoners that are released annually.

While common sense, and prisoners themselves, say that employment is vital to an honest new life, the obstacles are huge. A majority of those leaving prison did not finish high school and have little legitimate work experience. Many have serious drug or psychological problems that must be treated before they can hold a regular job. And while transitional programs may acclimatize them to the time-clock world of the workplace, many are likely to remain stuck in low-end jobs anyway.

Those who work with prisoners say that enticing onetime thugs to give work a try is not always as hard as it sounds. "They tell us that what comes with the street life is looking over your shoulder all the time," said Diane Williams, president of the Safer Foundation. One key, she said, seems to be getting released prisoners into work quickly, when the desire to normalize their lives is strongest.

Jimmy Parker, 24, was in and out of prison and hustling until six months ago when he decided, as he put it, "enough is enough."

"This job is rough, but I'm trying to change my life around," he said during a break at another recycling site run by Allied. "I've accomplished one thing — I got my own studio apartment — and someday I want to get custody of my daughter."

The Safer Foundation has eight employees who search for companies willing to hire former prisoners. Allied Waste's experience with such workers has been positive, said Robert Kalebich, general manager for the company in Chicago. Safer keeps a full-time "job coach" at each work site to advise workers and deal with disputes.

"If anything we see an advantage in this arrangement," Mr. Kalebich said. "If we hire off the street we have to wonder are they trained, are they here legally, are they properly drug tested."

Raphael Carter served drug time when he was 18, stayed out for nearly a decade, then found himself in prison again. "I woke up and said, I can't do this anymore, it's a dead end road," he recalled, adding that he now has two children, 13 and 6, who depend on him.

"You have to weigh the options, would you rather go back to jail or get a little increment of money and see your kids," said Mr. Carter, 30, who lives with his girlfriend and her four children. "Being older, I made the right choice."

He worked for six months at the recycling job, then found a chance in a nearby city driving a forklift for the attractive wage of $11.60 an hour. But his car broke down once too often during the hour and a half drive to work, he said, and he was let go.

Now he works for a company that erects large party tents, a seasonal job at $8.50 an hour, and he is consulting the Safer listings for a permanent job.

"By myself I wouldn't have had any of these opportunities," he said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Wisconsin A Gay Marriage Battleground (AP)

By David Crary

AP, October 1, 2006

When it comes to statewide votes on gay marriage, the score so far is 20-0 in favor of keeping it a one-man, one-woman institution.

If there's a chance to break the streak on Nov. 7, it might be in Wisconsin, where activists believe that support from unions, college students and church leaders — coupled with hoped-for conservative apathy — could enable them to finally overcome the string of losses.

Among the hopeful are Debbie Knepke and Candice Hackbarth, devoted partners for nine years, raising a 3-year-old daughter and 7-month-old son in pleasant Milwaukee neighborhood. They have joined some 8,000 other volunteers in a bid to defeat a proposed state constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage and civil unions.

"It makes us mad that the Christian conservatives are so against us," said Knepke, 41. "If they came into our house, they'd find we're no different from anybody else. We're every single thing they consider good parents to be."

Eight states will vote on ban-gay-marriage amendments in November, following 20 that previously approved such measures. Passage is considered certain in Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota and Tennessee, but gay-rights strategists believe their side is at least competitive in Arizona, Colorado, Virginia and Wisconsin.

Supporters of banning gay marriage remain confident of victory, but optimism also is high in the ranks of Fair Wisconsin, a coalition fighting the proposed amendment since it surfaced in the Legislature in 2004. Large labor unions, many religious leaders, and top Democratic officials — including Gov. Jim Doyle — have spoken out against the measure.

"This could be the state where we beat this thing," said Fair Wisconsin campaign chief Mike Tate. "I'm not saying it's easy, but we've got the right ingredients on the table."

Tate believes the gay marriage issue — which helped motivate conservative voters in 2004 — is no longer fueling the same urgency, possibly diminishing conservative turnout. One reason is recent court rulings in New York and Washington state against same-sex unions, leaving Massachusetts as the only state allowing gay marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0072257

The head of the rival campaign, Julaine Appling of Vote Yes For Marriage, said her side may wind up being outspent and out-advertised, but she believes Fair Wisconsin's confidence is misplaced.

"It's a gross misunderstanding of the people of Wisconsin," she said. "They are good solid stock. They understand that marriage is a good public institution — it's appropriate to protect it as the union of a man and a woman exclusively."

There have been no major opinion polls since mid-August, when a survey showed Appling's "Yes" side with 48 percent support, compared to 40 percent against the amendment. Tate says the gap is narrowing as undecided voters tilt against the measure; Appling believes the final result will be in line with Michigan and Ohio, where similar measures prevailed with roughly 60 percent support in 2004.

One of Appling's allies, Marquette University political scientist Christopher Wolfe, believes the amendment will pass, but perhaps narrowly.

"It's certainly a lot closer than the people favoring the amendment would like," said Wolfe, who observed that even at his Roman Catholic school many students oppose the ban.

Tate, at 27 a veteran of numerous campaigns, believes campuses statewide will provide vital support for his side. "This is a motivating issue for young people, whether they're gay or not," he said.

While Milwaukee and the state capital, Madison, tend to veer leftward, the rest of the state is generally more conservative. But opinions are deeply divided.

Among those opposing the amendment is Sue Werblow, 60, a longtime school board member in Oshkosh whose three children include a gay son now practicing law in Seattle.

"I would hope and pray people will stand up for nondiscrimination in our constitution, but it's anybody's guess," she said. Her son, observing from afar, "thinks we're going to lose this battle."

Kathleen Mentink, a college instructor in Eau Claire who favors the amendment, said most people in her area share her position, "but it's a quiet support." Some voters, she suggested, have been wary of revealing pro-amendment views for fear of being depicted as narrow-minded.

Debbie Knepke finds it hard to be dispassionate. Because the children she helps raise, Sienna and Nolan, were borne by Hackbarth, Knepke has no legal standing as a parent and fears passage of the amendment would dim her chances of ever gaining such recognition.

"It's the living in fear of what might happen," she said, fighting back tears. "I can't imagine, if something happened to Candy, that I would not have my children."

The campaign has divided Milwaukee's black community. U.S. Rep. Gwen Moore is among several black leaders opposing the amendment, while the "Yes" campaign has recruited a cadre of black pastors who are urging their congregations to support it.

Among them is the Rev. Walter Harvey, pastor of the 2,500-member Parklawn Assembly of God.

"Those who oppose the amendment are more aggressive in their advertising for a reason," he said. "The burden of proof is upon them — they have a longer hill to climb, more people to convince. They will ultimately lose."

Moore, a single mother, vehemently objects to the second sentence of the amendment, which would ban civil unions and other legal arrangements "substantially similar" to marriage.

She worries that such terminology could spawn litigation challenging all sorts of informal family relationships, including benefits her own children have received from their father.

Appling insists that domestic partnership benefits will not be barred as long as they don't parallel marriage rights.

But Moore contends the amendment betrays Wisconsin's politically progressive tradition.

"A constitution is a sacred document — we use them to confer rights on people, not to write in discrimination," she said. "It's completely the wrong vehicle for this kind of negative activity."

Chaplain Prayer Provision Stricken From Military Bill (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Congress removed a controversial provision in a military bill on Friday that would have permitted chaplains to offer sectarian prayer at mandatory nondenominational events. At the same time, lawmakers moved to rescind guidelines issued last year by the Air Force and Navy meant to curtail the risk of religious coercion and proselytizing within the ranks.

"The provisions in today's bill represent a full step forward and a half step back," said Representative Steve Israel, Democrat of New York and a member of the House Armed Services Committee. "We removed dangerous language undermining religious freedom and military effectiveness, but I am distressed that instead of moving forward with unequivocal religious tolerance in the military, we are reopening old loopholes that permitted some acts of coercion and proselytizing."

For several weeks, wrangling over the chaplain prayer provision had stalled the National Defense Authorization Act, a bill that sets military spending levels. The House version of the bill introduced language that would have allowed for sectarian prayer, but the Senate version had no such provision.

Chaplains can pray according to the traditions of their faith at worship services, where attendance is voluntary. But they are also called upon to offer prayers at mandatory functions, like changes of command, banquets and speeches.

The provision's backers — among them Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee — contended that Christian chaplains had long invoked Christ in nondenominational settings. The provision was championed by some evangelical chaplains and Christian groups, like Focus on the Family.

But it was opposed by the Pentagon, the National Association of Evangelicals and a dozen or so ecumenical groups. They argued that at mandatory events the longstanding custom had been to offer a nonsectarian prayer, for example, mentioning God rather than Christ. Those groups maintained that offering sectarian prayer would create division within the military.

Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, suggested that the issue of chaplain prayer be taken up in hearings at the next session of Congress.

Congress did hand some evangelicals a victory by abrogating the Air Force and Navy guidelines on religious expression. Those guidelines were issued in the wake of a 2004 scandal in the Air Force Academy, when some staff members, alumni and cadets accused evangelical Christians in leadership posts of aggressive proselytizing and discrimination. The Air Force guidelines were softened earlier this year to allow officers to discuss their religion with subordinates.

"We're pleased with it, though we would have preferred the strong language that was proposed in the defense bill," said Billy Baugham, a retired Army chaplain and executive director of the International Conference of Evangelical Chaplain Endorsers, a consortium of nine denominations that sponsor members of the clergy in military chaplaincy. Of the guidelines, he said: "It puts us back to where we were. Now chaplains can go back to the business of being chaplains."

Other critics of the guidelines, which they saw as too lax on proselytizing, also welcomed their removal. The Military Religious Freedom Foundation, a watchdog group, said it would give organizations like theirs a chance to push for stricter guidelines. The group is led by Mikey Weinstein, an Air Force veteran and graduate of the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs who is Jewish. Mr. Weinstein said he had become concerned about religious proselytizing at the academy while his two sons were attending.

Spokesmen for the Air Force and the Navy said Friday that they had not had a chance to review Congress' decision and so had no comment on eliminating the guidelines. Maj. Stewart Upton, a spokesman for the Pentagon, said, "We intend to comply with the law."

Coeducation No Cure-all, Foes Say (WT)

By Ruth Lang

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

Some alumnae and teachers at Randolph-Macon Woman's College say accepting male students to resolve financial problems is a shortsighted effort that undermines the school's 115-year-old tradition.

DOJ_NMG_0072259

"As we try to adapt ourselves to the educational needs of men, I fear we will descend into mediocrity," James Peterson, chairman of the English department said in a letter to the school's board of trustees. "We'll do all right. We'll survive. But we won't be able to continue to give that special quality of education to young women."

Board members voted 25-2 last month in favor of admitting men in the fall of 2007, the culmination of a three-year effort by the board to develop strategies to ensure the college's future. The vote also brings in a new strategic plan that emphasizes a "global honors curriculum," which focuses more on individual study, travel and honor-system values.

Interim school President Virginia H. Worden and Alumnae Director Heather Garnett said less income as a result of 15 years of dwindling enrollment in part led to the changes.

"It comes down to needing more students on the campus," Miss Garnett said. "We need more students who are paying a greater percentage of their tuition."

However, the changes have sparked a backlash -- from alumnae withdrawing their support to protests and boycotts by many of the about 680 female undergraduates on the pastoral Lynchburg, Va., campus

In a survey days before the Sept. 9 vote, 71 percent of the alumnae who responded said they were "very unhappy" with the new plan, and some have joined forces to seek a legal remedy to overturn the decision.

About 79 percent of the students also responded as "very unhappy," according to the survey. However, the majority of the respondents said they would rather the school accept male students than close.

"I hope that we can come up with a way alumnae can support Randolph-Macon moving forward, although I understand the feelings our alumnae are having right now," said Miss Garnett, a 1986 alumna.

Though an alumnae revolt could result in less scholarship money, Miss Worden, of the Class of 1969, said the board still sees coeducation as the future.

"I don't think [the board] will reverse that decision," she said.

Miss Garnett said "good things" will come from the changes. She said, for example, the college will be able to compete better in the higher-education market and offer more opportunities to students.

"We aren't changing what we do, to accommodate men," Miss Garnett said. "We are expanding our offerings and opening our doors in order to offer this unique experience to more students."

Miss Worden acknowledged the school will lose some of its identity and perhaps provide less individual attention, but she said it will still offer a quality education.

Despite the opposition, some students embrace the changes.

"I think, to be more of a global college, to better prepare women for the work force, they should have men around them," said Amanda Weller, a sophomore dance major from Pennsylvania.

Angela Grove, a junior philosophy major, said having male students will likely challenge female students' views on competition and school spirit, but the changes "can only enhance our campus."

Miss Worden does not expect a large number of male applicants during the first few years and pointed out that other women's colleges that switched to coed had a large number of female applicants after the change.

"I think it's going to be an interesting next year," Miss Weller said.

ANTITRUST:

Coalition Urges Smithfield Inquiry (SFAL)

By Kevin Dobbs

Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader, October 1, 2006

Meatpacker's proposal ignites antitrust fears

A coalition of agriculture and consumer groups threw its support behind Midwest lawmakers who want the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate Smithfield Foods' plan to buy rival Premium Standard Farms of Missouri, a deal that would merge the nation's two largest hog producers.

DOJ_NMG_0072260

The coalition contends that the proposed acquisition, if approved, will hasten the consolidation of livestock markets and swing open the doors to inflated pork prices for consumers. That, critics say, could happen because the deal would lessen competition in the livestock industry.

That, they say, should raise antitrust concerns for federal investigators.

"Ensuring that livestock markets operate in a free, fair and transparent manner is critical to our nation's agriculture economy. Without such open and competitive markets, independent producers cannot survive, and consumers lose," the coalition, which includes 15 groups in all, said in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The coalition includes Dakota Rural Action, Dakota Resource Council, the National Consumers League and the National Farmers Union.

Virginia-based Smithfield, which owns the John Morrell & Co. meatpacking plant in Sioux Falls, announced in September it would buy its rival for about $650 million in cash and stock.

The deal is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007. If it does, Smithfield will own about 20 percent of the nation's hogs. That could limit independent hog producers' options and ability to get good prices for their meat, lawmakers said.

South Dakota Sens. John Thune and Tim Johnson backed Iowa's senators in calling for an antitrust investigation in September. Thune said the deal deserves "scrutiny" in large part because it could hurt South Dakota's small farmers.

The Department of Justice has yet to give final word on how or when it will investigate the deal. But it could block the merger on antitrust grounds, or it could require the companies to sell off some of their operations.

Dennis Treacy, Smithfield vice president of government affairs, acknowledged shortly after the deal was announced that it represents more consolidation in the pork industry. But he said the merged companies will continue to work closely with independent producers. He said the company is confident that the Justice Department will approve the merger.

Aside from antitrust concerns, analysts said last week that Smithfield has a history of making shrewd acquisitions.

Timothy Ramey, senior research analyst with D.A. Davidson & Co. in Oregon, which tracks the meatpacking industry, said Smithfield "has a very good track record" of acquiring companies and lifting profits.

The company's critics don't dispute that. But they worry corporate profits will come at too steep of a cost to producers and consumers.

"It obviously will have significant impacts on both independent hog producers and those who raise hogs under contract," Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa said.

National Farmers Union President Tom Buis said, "The livestock industry is already at an unacceptable level of concentration, and allowing the proposed acquisition to move forward is only going to make the situation worse."

The Battle for Guantánamo

It seems that the prisoners at Guantánamo are rewarded if they betray their political and religious beliefs and give information that may result in the death of their comrades (Tim Golden, Sept. 17). An American citizen who did that would be disgraced and, if he was a soldier, tried and imprisoned.

It is clear that their lives and the lives of their families will be in danger if they become “compliant” and word gets out. The prisoners know that word will eventually get out as to who cooperated and who did not.

Lastly, these men are not cowards. Their treatment does not meet reasonable standards. They, their friends, relatives and fellow believers will have very personal reasons to seek revenge, and they will. Treating them this way will surely come back to haunt us.

Michael Bérubé and I share the same politics; so do the vast majority of our colleagues (Sept. 17). Bérubé doesn't think that's a problem, however, because our students continue to challenge us in the classroom. But that's hardly a fair match, and Bérubé knows he can win it every time. Wouldn't our intellectual lives be richer if we faced sustained and sophisticated challenges from other professors, rather than from 18-year-old neophytes?

People like Bérubé and myself are fond of criticizing President Bush for surrounding himself with like-minded ideologues. Maybe it's time we looked in the mirror.

To suggest that liberal professors could sway their conservative students in the voting booth is somewhat akin to the old argument that gay teachers could sway straight students to a different lifestyle. To illustrate the dubiousness of this premise, I would point out that there was a generation of students on American campuses in the 60's and 70's who stood shoulder to shoulder with self-declared socialists and flagrantly liberal professors, all wanting to start the revolution. Many of these baby boomers voted for Republicans in the last two elections. So much for the influence of those professors.

Michael Bérubé is certainly right to say that if professors are doing their jobs right, students of all stripes should be made "to feel uncomfortable" about their beliefs. But I'm surprised that he does not see that that is just why the liberal bias in humanities departments is so damaging to education; students on the left seldom hear arguments from their teachers that might make them reconsider their positions.

My Satirical Self

Like Wyatt Mason's father, I am 79, a veteran of the U.S. Navy, and I, too, rage against what the Bush right-wing political machine has done to our country (Sept. 17). Both us old guys vent our anger at the madness around us by wrestling with the news in the columns and op-ed pages.

Wyatt is also perturbed, but he doesn't confront. He quells his frustrationby taking "shelter in the ridiculous," the satirical discourses of the Jon Stewarts and Rob Corddrys night after night on TV. I stopped watching them a long time ago. It's an exercise in futility. I, and apparently other members of my generation, are wary (and weary) of playing that game.

If the national news media have served to "contain" the outright lies served up by this administration, to package them in such a way as to make them seem within the parameters of acceptable political discourse, haven't satirists like Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert, however inspired, also served to contain our outrage at this process by packaging our potential for anger in exquisitely written and produced comedy?

Parallels with the Roman Empire are instructive: I wonder if something similar happened when Roman citizens, unable to act meaningfully against the original fascists, resorted to honing their wits rather than their weapons?

When Jon Glaser whips out a bottle of water from his special pocket and floods the spot where his dog goes No. 1, all he is doing is assuaging his own misguided guilt (The Funny Pages, Sept. 17). He asserts that he is sanitizing the scene of the crime, but unless his bottle is filled with a strong disinfectant, he is merely spreading the bacteria to a wider area.

Glaser is also risking serious damage to a rotator cuff with his constant attempts to pat himself on the back; not to mention dooming himself to years on a psychiatrist's couch, dealing with what is clearly a desperate need for affirmation from complete strangers. He should stop doing "the thing that makes me better than you" immediately, before he hurts himself.

Glaser may never have considered his actions from his dog's point of view. Dogs communicate with one another by marking territory with urine. To a city dog, the sidewalk is just one big aromatic blog. Dogs can tell gender, age, health, breed, diet and sexual availability, all from smelling urine and other doggie doings. Jon's dog has probably given up trying to figure out why his owner censors every message she sends, deleting entire blocks of text with his water bottle.

Bad Bidness

In the Sept. 3 column, the Ethicist told an art collector that accepting a proposal from a fellow collector to agree not to bid on the same prints in eBay auctions would be unethical. I agree. The Ethicist also reported a lawyer's advice that "collusive bidding is illegal in the auction world," adding that it "may not be illegal online — Internet auctions are largely unregulated." But the federal antitrust laws apply to competition on Internet auctions as much as to physical auctions. Agreements between bidders not to bid against one another or to bid at certain prices are criminal violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act, punishable by up to 10 years in prison.

The way the National Rifle Association is promoting a universal right to bear arms left me wondering about the N.R.A.'s position on the rights of nation-states to arm themselves (Joshua Kurlantzick, Sept. 17). If removing the right to own a weapon is the first step toward eliminating civil rights, then limiting a nation's ability to arm itself may be the first step toward making it vulnerable to invasion. As weapons of all kinds have become more powerful, the gun-ownership debate might open new paths for discussion on nuclear-arms control.

Citgo Pollution Charges In Corpus Highlight Problems With Law (SAEN)

By Anton Caputo, Express-News Staff

San Antonio Express-News, October 1, 2006

CORPUS CHRISTI — Two massive vats of oil, each capable of holding 12 million gallons, sat uncovered in this city's sprawling refinery row for at least a dozen years, releasing unknown quantities of toxic benzene into the air.

In August, the Justice Department leveled a 10-count criminal indictment against Citgo Petroleum Corp. and the environmental manager of its Corpus East plant, alleging the refinery released tons more of the cancer-causing chemical than allowed by law in 2001 and 2002 — while company officials knowingly underreported the emissions.

But state regulators have been trying unsuccessfully to force Citgo to install lids and pollution-control systems since 1999, according to a review of thousands of pages of regulatory documents obtained by the San Antonio Express-News under state open records laws.

The review revealed that the refinery's pollution issues go back much further than the indictment shows. State regulators, documents indicate, seemed to exert little influence over the the refinery's operation, and enforcement efforts often dragged on and on, letting the company operate with violations for years before paying fines.

Texas Commission on Environmental Quality records show that the refinery spewed tons more benzene than permitted not just in 2001 and 2002, as the federal indictment charges, but also in 1998, 1999 and 2000.

(William Luther/Express-News)

Kelly Arkadie talks with environmental advocate Suzie Canales as Canales tours the area around Citgo's Corpus East refinery in Corpus Christi. Canales' sister died of cancer after living in a Corpus neighborhood built on a landfill full of oil industry waste.

CITGO INDICTMENT

Document: The 16-page indictment

The federal government has criminally indicted Citgo Petroleum Corp. and Philip Vrazel, the environmental manager of Citgo's Corpus East Plant, for a series of pollution-related violations. If convicted, Citgo faces fines of up to $500,000 or twice the gross economic gain (whichever is greater) and five years of probation. Vrazel faces fines of up to $500,000 and up to five years in prison.

The charges are:

Two counts of violating of the National Emission Standard for benzene waste operations.

Two counts of operating open top tanks as oil-water separators without first installing the emission controls required by federal and state regulations.

Failing to identify in its 2000 report filed with the state all of the points in the refinery wastewater system where benzene was generated.

Five counts of violating the Migratory Bird Treaty Act, a result of birds landing in the open oil tanks.

After years of wrangling between regulators and oil company officials, lids now are being installed on the tanks. The work is scheduled for completion this year.

But the drawn-out process has fueled the ire of local residents and others around Texas who long have accused state environmental regulators of being soft on polluters — a charge underscored in a 2003 state auditor's report that found it was significantly less expensive for the industry to pay fines for polluting in Texas than to comply with the law.

"They're not afraid of the TCEQ," said Suzie Canales, an environmental advocate whose sister died of cancer after living in a Corpus neighborhood built on a landfill full of oil industry waste. "It's like my 4-year-old grandson. He won't do what I tell him because he knows I won't do anything."

Little action In fact, state regulators did cite Citgo for a dizzying array of violations, filing report after report and levying a fine every two or three years since 1999. But an analysis of the records shows how slow such a process can be.

The state first asked the company to equip the two massive tanks with roofs and pollution controls in 1999 as part of an inspection that netted about 50 violations at the plant. That case was combined with two others, bringing the total to 76 violations, said Mary Risner, the TCEQ's director of litigation.

Citgo fought all 76. And when the case was finally settled in 2002, regulators fined the company $750,000 but dropped the violation regarding the tanks. There simply wasn't enough evidence to force the point during the three years, the state argued, and the oil company fought the charge hard.

Citgo has long argued that the tanks were being erroneously treated as oil-water separators and didn't need the lids or pollution-control equipment. In its written response to the federal indictment, the oil company claims to have an Environmental Protection Agency memorandum and expert legal advice to back its claim.

Citgo officials did not respond to calls or e-mails for comment for this story, but vehemently denied any wrongdoing in a written statement that termed the federal charges "unprecedented."

Federal prosecutors, though, paint a starkly different picture in the indictment, citing company documents from the early 1990s that refer to the tanks as oil-water separators and, when discussing the environmental problems posed by the tanks, conclude that "installing floating roofs on tanks 116 and 117 is a sure fix for environmental compliance purposes, but it may not be the most cost effective option."

Despite what federal prosecutors claim Citgo knew, company officials were able to convince state regulators that they could not be forced to cover the tanks and add pollution-control equipment. After acquiescing and pulling the issue from its 1999 case, state regulators added it to another massive enforcement case in 2001.

That case involved 17 violations and was settled in 2004 with a $1.74 million penalty and the understanding that, among other things, Citgo would either take tanks 116 and 117 out of service or not use them as oil-water separators unless proper pollution control was installed.

The job, according to Citgo documents, should be complete this year.

Dragged on too long John Sadlier, the TCEQ's director of enforcement, admits that some of these cases probably dragged on too long. But he said much can be attributed to the sheer number of problems at the plant, and the state's habit at the time of combining enforcement actions as they came up, as opposed to filing and prosecuting separately.

Critics and others who have long followed the state's dealings with large industry are less kind.

"The agency dropped the ball on this," said Neil Carman, clean air director for the Lone State Chapter of the Sierra Club. "All of these benzene violations are serious violations."

Carman, who worked as an environmental regulator for the state of Texas before joining the Sierra Club, said the Citgo case illustrates a coziness between regulators and industry, particularly at TCEQ field offices such as Corpus Christi.

Victor Flatt, the A.L. O'Quinn Chair in Environmental Law at the University of Houston Law Center, believes that coziness is endemic to the state's environmental regulatory system. That's because Texas adopted a mindset of "cooperative enforcement" under the administration of Gov. George W. Bush that has prevailed ever since.

The idea is that a more punitive agency would just drive people to avoid environmental regulators altogether, while a softer approach encourages businesses to cooperate. This method hasn't exactly worked as advertised in Texas, where regulators have to deal with some of the largest and best-funded industries in the country, Flatt said.

'They got it going on' Jerome Bradford, 64, lived most of his life in the Oak Park Triangle, a neighborhood hemmed in by refineries on two sides and Interstate 37 on the third. Citgo bought out residents in the late 1990s after a series of refinery explosions and contamination problems caused an outcry. Bradford's father died of prostate cancer in 1993, about five years before the son took the buyout.

"The power of the refinery is something else," he said. "They got it going on, brother. They got it going on."

The biggest worry among nearby residents is benzene, a common pollutant naturally found in crude oil. Prolonged exposures at high levels can cause cancer, including leukemia, and other health problems.

One of the local air monitors — located in the now-abandoned Oak Park area — routinely shows the highest or among the highest levels of benzene of any monitors in the state. And this isn't the first time the federal government has stepped into this coastal Texas city with criminal charges against a local refinery because of benzene pollution.

Hiding and misreporting benzene pollution was the central theme of a massive criminal indictment the federal government brought against Koch Petroleum Group LP in 2000. A year later, Koch agreed to pay a $10 million fine and conduct $10 million worth of environmental projects to settle the case.

Despite the danger posed by benzene, there are no hard regulatory standards for the amount that can be in the air in Texas — only screening levels that act as a sort of guideline.

State toxicologist Michael Honeycutt said those guidelines are enforced by permits that limit the amount of benzene a facility can emit. He acknowledges that the method breaks down when refineries knowingly exceed those permit levels, as is charged in the Citgo and Koch cases.

"There are good companies. There are bad companies and there are ignorant companies," he said. "Some work hard to do the right thing and some hire good attorneys."

DOJ_NMG_0072265

The state's screening level for benzene is a yearly average of one part per billion. The monitor in the Oak Park Triangle has been above that level since it was installed in 1997 — running more than double in 2002, 2003 and 2004 before dropping to 1.7 last year.

Another monitor in the nearby Hillcrest neighborhood has normally been below the screening level, but nudged just over it last year.

Although the benzene is over the state screening levels, Honeycutt said it really doesn't pose a major threat, particularly because the Oak Park neighborhood is now abandoned. Even if it weren't, levels at the Oak Park monitor are roughly equal to those found in a home of someone who routinely parks a car in the garage.

The state's heath-screening levels are based on the theoretical risk of one person in 100,000 getting cancer over a lifetime. Benzene levels of two double that risk. Benzene levels of three triple the risk, and so on.

"If those numbers were 10 or 15 I'd say, 'Oh, yeah, we need to be down there,'" Honeycutt said.

Retired preacher and Hillcrest resident Harold Branch, 84, has heard it before over the decades he's been fighting the area refineries. And he has a hard time balancing the talk of risk calculations and annual averages with what he's seen.

"They have polluted the area and so many people have died of cancer and other related diseases," he said. acaputo@express-news.net

To Control Avalanches, Railroad Seeks To Shell Park (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Environmentalists Protest Request to Protect Trains Using Artillery, Saying Wildlife Could Be Harmed

KALISPELL, Mont. -- The famed symbol of the Great Northern Railway was a mountain goat perched on a rock in Glacier National Park.

That railroad's successor, the Burlington Northern Santa Fe Railway, now wants to lob artillery shells into mountain-goat habitat inside the park, which straddles the Continental Divide here in northwest Montana. The shelling would help control winter avalanches that sometimes threaten BNSF freight trains, about 40 of which pass daily through mountains just south of the park's border.

Besides seeking federal permission for the occasional wintertime bombardment of the park, the highly profitable railroad stands to benefit from little-known legislation -- passed in the Senate and pending in the House -- that would spend as much as $75 million in federal grants to pay for avalanche control.

The legislation, introduced by two senior Republican lawmakers from Alaska and written, in part, by an avalanche expert who is a paid consultant to BNSF, would approve the use of federal money to assist "avalanche artillery users."

Those who probably would benefit include state highway departments, ski areas and BNSF, if it receives permission from the National Park Service to bombard Glacier. The consultant and a railway spokesman said the railroad had nothing to do with the crafting of the bill and has not lobbied for its passage.

Using artillery for avalanche control is a well-established practice in Alaska and parts of the mountainous West. The 105mm shells used are military ordnance that spray shrapnel.

But advocates for the national parks and some of the nation's leading avalanche experts have strongly criticized BNSF's request to bombard Glacier. They have said the subsidized shelling of the park is aesthetically inappropriate and potentially harmful to wintering mountain goats, elk, deer, wolverines and endangered grizzly bears.

"There is a great hush over this park in the winter," said Steve Thompson, Glacier program manager for the National Parks Conservation Association, an advocacy group that works to protect the parks. "It would be a travesty to fire howitzers into the heart of one of our wildest natural lands."

It is unknown whether shelling would wake the bears, which hibernate during what could become the artillery season.

The Bush administration has strongly objected to the cost of the proposed avalanche legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0072266

For most of the 100 years that trains have crossed the Rockies along the southern border of Glacier National Park, railroads have spent their own money to build and maintain snow sheds that cover the tracks. The sheds have worked well to protect passing trains, according to the Park Service.

Over the years, though, some snow sheds have been destroyed by fire. In addition, the snow pack in the park has been shifting, requiring avalanche protection on new stretches of track.

BNSF, a freight giant that is an amalgam of 390 railroads merged or purchased over the past 150 years, has chosen not to rebuild some burned avalanche sheds or to build new ones to protect track now threatened by avalanches.

The railroad has opted for artillery bombardment as the "efficient, proven practice used in potential avalanche areas in North America," said Gus Melonas, a spokesman for BNSF. He said the railroad prefers artillery because snow sheds are "are time-consuming to construct and extremely expensive."

The railroad has estimated the cost of building new snow sheds and replacing old ones at $110 million; they would cover a total of about a mile of unprotected track.

While shelling is much less expensive, avalanche experts say snow sheds are a safer, more reliable way to protect long freight trains in mountain areas, as well as to ensure that busy east-west rail lines remain open throughout the year.

"Using explosives to release avalanches is not a sure-fire method to maintain a safe rail corridor," said Don Bachman, president of the board of directors of the Center for Snow and Avalanche Studies in Silverton, Colo. "It's cheaper in the short run, but it could be terribly costly in the long run, not just in monetary cost, but lives and property."

The BNSF rail line near Glacier is a critical link in the economy of the Pacific Northwest, carrying about 33,000 container cars a day on trains that are often more than a mile long. When snow blocks the line for 36 hours or more, rail traffic sometimes stalls all the way from the West Coast to Chicago, causing backups of container ships in Seattle.

Bachman said BNSF should make the long-term investment in snow sheds, noting that it has the income to do so.

According to its annual report, the railroad is enjoying record growth and soaring profitability, with revenue of $13 billion last year and a 73 percent increase in operating income. To handle record freight volumes, the company said it plans to spend $2.4 billion this year on tracks, locomotives and technology.

"Our message to the railroad is this: You guys are making a lot of money, you can afford to do it right," said Thompson, of the National Parks Conservation Association.

The National Park Service has been studying the railroad's request to use artillery in Glacier and plans to release its assessment of the environmental consequences in late October. Officials in the park say the prospect of wintertime shelling is worrisome.

"We are concerned about the impacts on threatened and endangered species," said Mary Riddle, who monitors environmental protection in Glacier. "We are also concerned about explosives going off in areas where grizzly bears den. There is not a lot of research about this."

The consultant who helped write the avalanche bill, David Hamre, an Alaska-based avalanche expert, said he worked with the offices of Sen. Ted Stevens and Rep. Don Young, both Alaska Republicans, to write legislation to aid avalanche-prone areas across the United States, not just places where BNSF is threatened.

A spokesman for Young said Hamre "provided analysis for the bill and did help draft it." A spokesman for Stevens said the bill grew out of the concerns of many groups in Alaska and the senator's own interest in avalanches.

Local Governments Get Serious About The Environment (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

In the absence of serious national action, state and local governments and the private sector are taking the initiative in confronting the interlocked problems of global warming and energy conservation.

The most dramatic example is the legislation California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed last week mandating reductions in the state's emissions of the gases associated with global warming. But city governments and the private sector are also formulating some of the most innovative responses to a problem the federal government still refuses to confront head-on.

DOJ_NMG_0072267

Exhibit A is a recently announced partnership between the American Institute of Architects and the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

The two groups have committed to an exhilarating goal: cutting in half by 2010 the amount of fossil fuels used to construct and operate commercial and residential buildings — and then achieving steady further reductions. By 2030, they want to produce "carbon neutral" buildings that will rely on conservation and renewable energy sources to completely eliminate their use of fossil fuels.

With this effort, the architects and the mayors are spotlighting an often overlooked element of the global warming challenge.

Discussions about controlling global warming usually focus on reducing the greenhouse gases produced by vehicles and factories. But the best evidence is that the energy used to heat, cool and light buildings (as well as the energy used in their construction) generates more greenhouse emissions than either transportation or industry. Depending on the estimates, buildings contribute anywhere from more than a third to nearly half of all greenhouse gas emissions in the United States.

Those figures define the challenge. Another number frames the opportunity. "Between now and 2035, three-fourths of the built environment will be new or renovated," says RK Stewart, a principal with the architectural firm Gensler, and the incoming president of the architects institute. "So the opportunity to change the energy profile of the built environment in this country is right there. We have the opportunity to drastically reduce our energy consumption."

In communities across the country, developers, architects and local governments are already pursuing that goal. One of the most aggressive cities has been Chicago. Under the spur of Mayor Richard M. Daley, the city is pursuing a remarkably comprehensive program to encourage green development.

The city has retrofitted hundreds of city facilities to reduce energy use and committed itself to constructing new municipal buildings to the highest standards of energy efficiency established by the U.S. Green Building Council, a private group that has set the most widely respected benchmarks in the field.

Chicago is also using more renewable energy in its buildings. And it is constructing dozens of "green roofs" — extensive rooftop gardens that dramatically lower roof temperatures (from 160 degrees on a summer day for a conventional roof to about half that) and thus reduce buildings' need for air conditioning.

Just as important, the city is encouraging private developers to move in the same direction. It offers attractive incentives for builders who commit to green development — not only grants and loans but something even more precious in a place like Chicago: a fast track through the city bureaucracy.

"You get a building permit faster if you are building a green building," says Sadhu Johnston, the city's environment commissioner. Among those who found the offer too good to refuse was Wal-Mart, which constructed a 70,000-square-foot green roof on the new store it opened last week.

In San Francisco, another milestone project is nearing completion. Sometime this winter, the first tenants will move into an 18-story federal office building there that offers a brilliant "back to the future" response to the challenge of reducing energy consumption.

Through an innovative design conceived by the Santa Monica architectural firm Morphosis, tenants in most of the building will rely on natural ventilation, rather than air conditioning, to control the temperature.

On the building's upper floors, the architects devised a sophisticated system of windows and vents that will open at night to capture the city's cool evening air and allow wind to push out the warm air that accumulates during the day. (For security reasons, the building's five lowest floors will operate with conventional air conditioning.)

The final step was to design a heavy concrete structure for the building that will hold the cool air during the day. "It was a very old idea in the architecture," says Morphosis principal Tim Christ, the building's project manager. "It's why buildings in the Southwest have very heavy walls: The structure stores the cooling energy."

Washington isn't entirely a bystander in this effort. The federal government commissioned the Morphosis design (under the Clinton administration). Last year's energy bill included a tax credit for developers who significantly reduce energy consumption in new buildings. And the Department of Energy is funding useful research into energy-efficient building materials, lighting and heating systems.

What's missing is a clear signal from Washington that reducing greenhouse emissions and increasing energy efficiency are national priorities. That's what it will probably take to make green development a truly mass phenomenon.

"The top performers are doing some very exciting things," says Judith Greenwald of the nonpartisan Pew Center on Global Climate Change. "But we need to bring the bottom and the average up more."

The real message of the green development movement is that American ingenuity can meet the test if the federal government challenges us to combat global warming by using energy more efficiently. Now all we need is a government with the confidence and foresight to issue the challenge.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Shooter's Letter Recounted Childhood Abuse (DENP)

By Kirk Mitchell, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, October 1, 2006

A fishing trip with his older brother was the only happy memory Duane Roger Morrison recounted in a farewell letter in which he describes a difficult, abusive childhood.

His childhood was so crippling, he told five siblings in the rambling 14-page letter, that he was never able to function normally, and it was time to end his pain, a law enforcement official said Morrison wrote.

The letter said that as long as he lived, he would never forget the abuse at home and how petrified he was whenever his father approached him.

The Denver Post obtained previously unpublished details Saturday about the contents of the letter.

The letter, mailed from Shawnee, just outside of Bailey, was received by one of Morrison's brothers Thursday, the day after Morrison entered Platte Canyon High School, took six girls hostage, sexually assaulted them and ultimately killed Emily Keyes, 16, and himself.

Morrison gave no hint in the letter of what he planned to do at the high school, Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener said.

The letter stated that Morrison was in emotional pain because of treatment by his father, said Joe Gordon, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' assistant agent in charge of a five-state region that includes Colorado.

"He said his father was always screaming and yelling," he said. "That in no way justifies the horrific crime he committed."

Contacted by phone Saturday, Duane Morrison's father, Bobby Morrison, who lives in Tulsa, Okla., did not comment. A woman got on the phone and said: "This is private."

"It was a very sad letter," Gordon said. "At the end he makes it clear this is his final farewell.

"He wants (his family) to know his final moment will be painless and he will be at peace. He said, 'Don't you feel guilty for this. You're absolved from any responsibility.'"

The letter said he loved all his brothers and sisters and apologized for what he was about to do, Gordon said. He thanked them for trying to help him over the years.

The letter only indicated that he would take his own life, he said.

Morrison mailed the letter Wednesday to one of his older brothers. Gordon did not know which brother.

Two ATF agents spoke with the brother for two hours

Wednesday night, and the brother gave the letter to them unopened after he received it in the mail Thursday.

"He couldn't emotionally bear to read it," Gordon said.

The ATF turned the original letter over to Park County officials.

A team of ATF and FBI profilers at the National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime in Quantico, Va., will study the letter for years to come, Gordon said.

The ATF has traced the two guns Morrison used in the school attack from the store where he bought them to the manufacturers, he said. They were purchased legally, he said.

While Morrison did not threaten the school in his letter, he clearly considered a grudge with a Littleton motorcycle shop to be unsettled.

"That jumped off the page at you," Gordon

IMMIGRATION:

Congress Leaves Immigration Bill For Another Day (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

Both houses are unable to agree on what is reform

WASHINGTON — For all the fierce debate that raged this year in congressional corridors and spilled onto the streets of Houston and other cities in massive demonstrations, Congress has left town essentially stalemated over illegal immigration.

Though congressional Republicans can claim some success in adding billions of dollars for enhanced border security and securing approval for 700 miles of fencing along portions of the U.S.-Mexico boundary, the philosophical clash between the enforcement-minded House and the legalization-friendly Senate has been postponed — most likely until next year.

"It's essentially a tie, a stalemate in which neither vision of reform has won out," said Frank Sharry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum. "The debate will continue to boil, and it will be left to Congress in the future to deal with."

Several factorsIn the end, vastly different diagnoses about how to prevent illegal immigration, internal Republican divisions, President Bush's loss of clout on Capitol Hill and a highly competitive clash for control of Congress in the November elections all contributed to lawmakers' failure to deliver on an issue they vaulted to public attention.

House Republican security hawks raced out first last December, passing an enforcement-only bill that would criminalize illegal immigrants, crack down on their employers and set up a mandatory employment-verification system requiring new identification procedures for all workers, American and foreign. Champions of the security-first approach insist that the borders must be secured before any broader changes to immigration policy can be contemplated.

Outraged by the criminalization provisions, millions took to the streets in Houston, Los Angeles, Chicago, Milwaukee and other cities last spring and denounced the House bill as anti-immigrant and inhumane.

Siding much more closely with Bush's vision, the Senate responded in May with a vastly different plan pairing increased enforcement with an opportunity for citizenship for most of the country's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants and a guest-worker program for future immigrants. Backers of what has become known in Washington shorthand as comprehensive immigration reform argue that illegal immigration can't be fully resolved unless all aspects are addressed together.

House Republicans swiftly deemed the bipartisan Senate plan an amnesty program that would repeat the mistakes of 1986, when Congress pledged to halt illegal immigration for all time by legalizing nearly 3 million people in exchange for making it more difficult for foreign workers to be hired. The legalization went through, but employer sanctions were never properly put into place or enforced. Illegal immigration continued apace until exploding in the late 1990s and this decade.

Dismissive of the Senate plan and courting conservative voters vexed by illegal immigration, House Republicans refused this summer to negotiate over differences in the bills. Instead, they launched a flurry of hearings around the nation, designed to fan opposition to the Senate bill. And, into the waning hours of their legislative session that ended Friday night, House GOP leaders sought unsuccessfully to convince the Senate to embrace House-passed measures speeding deportation, cracking down on criminal gangs and reducing court power over federal immigration enforcement.

What did get doneHouse Republicans point out they did succeed in adding billions of dollars to expand the Border Patrol, add thousands of detention beds and begin funding a multibillion-dollar "virtual" fence comprising motion detectors, lighting, unmanned aerial vehicles and other high-tech surveillance equipment. And, Congress prodded the Department of Homeland Security to end the much-criticized practice of "catch-and-release" policy in which the Border Patrol, because of a lack of detention space, released non-Mexican illegal immigrants pending their deportation hearings. The vast majority never showed up for the hearings.

Some Republicans say the new measures are working.

"If you talk to people on the border now, they are starting to see a tightening up," said Rep. Michael McCaul, an Austin Republican who chairs a House Homeland Security subcommittee and represents parts of west Harris County. Illegal immigration "didn't happen overnight. It's not going to get solved overnight. But I think what you're going to see is the American public realizing that a lot of the things we've done up here are having an impact on the border."

Such a realization by the public could pave the way, lawmakers suggest, for greater acceptance of solutions for dealing with the illegal population. One plan calls for a guest worker program to bring in the foreign workers that U.S. business interests, agriculture and others insist are absolutely essential in a low-unemployment economy.

"I think there's a recognition now that this is an urgent — perhaps the most single urgent — domestic issue confronting the country," said Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican who chairs the Senate immigration subcommittee. "And I don't believe it will be delayed forever."

Dead or still kicking?Cornyn retains some hope that Congress could resume the immigration debate in comprehensive fashion when lawmakers return for a brief session after the November elections. Others predict Congress won't take up the topic until after the new session is gaveled in next January with new members who were elected in November.

Others say it may be well after that before the legislation comes up again.

House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King, R-N.Y., for one, indicated little desire to address a broader immigration fix until the borders are battened down.

"The position of the House is that we're not going to be looking toward amnesty or toward a path to citizenship until we first show that we control the border," he said. "And then, we can get back to that."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff estimated earlier this year it would take until the end of 2008 for his department to gain operational control of the southwest border.

What works, what doesn'tSome lawmakers tout fencing and other border-control measures; others argue illegal immigration won't be solved by a build-up. Nearly half of all illegal immigrants came here legally but overstayed visas.

House Republicans are seeking to achieve "an impossible dream," said Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., a key champion of the Senate plan. "You're not going to secure the border unless you also provide a legal means for people to travel to do the jobs that America needs done."

For some, Congress' inability to undertake a widespread fix this year is a deep disappointment. "It's really a lost opportunity," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat from California, where the state's $30 billion agriculture industry is struggling to find workers amid heightened border enforcement. "We've got food on the ground that's not being harvested; we've got people plowing under fields; we've got people who are not going to plant. It's a very difficult time."

Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican who staunchly opposed the Senate bill, offered a far different assessment: "In one sense it has been productive. We didn't make a big mistake by passing a terribly flawed bill."

In Texas, Little Support For Putting Up Fences (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Along the Rio Grande, residents say the barrier approved by Congress would sever cultural and economic ties, and cut off access to the river.

Few Americans are more fed up with the unending human caravan of illegal immigration — or more familiar with its macabre toll — than rancher Mike Vickers.

Multitudes of bedraggled migrants cut through his South Texas homestead every day to skirt U.S. Border Patrol checkpoints on their journey north, and many do not make it out alive. Vickers has found frightened children sitting in fields alone, abandoned. His dogs once brought home a human head.

DOJ_NMG_0072271

He very badly wants to stop the trail of death and despair that passes by his doorstep. But when he considers the wisdom of building twin steel walls along the Rio Grande to seal off the Mexican border — the plan Congress approved early Saturday before heading home for the November election — his verdict is swift and harsh: stupid idea.

"That's just a big waste of money," said Vickers, a Texas Republican activist who heads a group opposed to illegal immigration that until recently was the state branch of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps.

"The Rio Grande is the lifeblood of South Texas," he said. "A wall is just going to stand between farmers and ranchers and others who need legitimate access to water. It's not going to stop the illegals."

From Laredo to Brownsville, a meandering 200-mile stretch of the Rio Grande that would be walled off if President Bush signs, as expected, the bill to fence 700 miles of the border, reaction was overwhelmingly negative.

Many of these Texas border towns blossomed on the riverbanks not even a football field away from Mexico, a bilingual, binational culture where everyone knows someone on the other side. Here, the fence was widely seen as a federal government misadventure that would trample private property rights without accomplishing anything.

"Whether it's over rivers or deserts — or now, this wall — people will keep coming, as long as they can find a job here that's so much better," said Angelica Garcia, 26, a worker at a shop on McAllen's bustling Main Street that caters to Mexicans visiting Texas. "This wall isn't going to do a thing."

Many expressed shock that a proposal they considered a pipe dream by pandering Washington politicians had been approved, and that a fence they likened to the Berlin Wall could soon separate them from their neighbors.

"For so many years, we talked about tearing down that wall. Now we want to build a wall between us and Mexico? It makes us look like hypocrites," said Denise Carreon, 21, who like many border residents still had family members to the south.

Many others expressed outrage that the Rio Grande, a near-mystical river in the Texas imagination and one of the most prized bird-watching spots in North America, could soon be blocked from view.

"Zero — that's how many people I know who support this. People are opposed from Brownsville to El Paso," said Eagle Pass Mayor Chad Foster, head of a group of frontier leaders called the Texas Border Coalition.

"The Rio Grande is a very historic and scenic place, one of the natural treasures of Texas. We're going to wall it off?"

As Congress approved building the fence, it was hard to find a South Texas politician, merchant, economic analyst or academic who believed a wall would work — and who did not consider it an insult to the people of Mexico, with whom the region shares a strong social and economic bond, especially since passage of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

"I am reminded of when Jesus Christ was nailed to the cross and he said, 'Father, forgive them because they know not what they do,' " said Richard Cortez, the mayor of McAllen, which became one of the fastest-growing areas in America after NAFTA.

"I don't know who is advising the Senate," Cortez said. "A fence is not going to keep people from crossing the border, but it's certainly going to hurt us."

Like many of those who live along the Rio Grande, Cortez travels frequently between its banks; his two sons married Mexican-born women, and although they are U.S. citizens, many of their relatives are not, so reunions often take place south of the border.

Cortez and other border leaders worry that long-standing friendships, and family ties that go back generations, will be frayed.

"If you're building walls, what message are you sending to your neighbors? Do you think they are really going to want to visit? It's a slap in the face to them," said Laredo Mayor Raul G. Salinas, a former FBI agent. "People who have never been to the border, who do not understand the border, are shoving this down our throats."

Although the fence plan allows Mexicans to legally visit Texas with temporary visas permitting travel within 25 miles of the border, local politicians and business leaders worry that they will no longer feel welcome.

Mexican shoppers are a major source of money for Texas border towns, and gleaming malls and vast big-box outlets have been built to cater to them.

Between 1978 and 2001, Mexican shoppers made 26% of all retail sales in Brownsville, 35% in McAllen and 51% in Laredo, according to economists at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas. Local officials said more recent estimates are higher.

DOJ_NMG_0072272

"The Wal-Mart with the largest number of retail transactions in the United States is in Laredo, and if you go to that parking lot, more than half the cars have Mexican plates," said Eddie Aldrete, senior vice president for the Laredo-based International Bank of Commerce. "The fence is a knee-jerk reaction by Congress. No one really studied the economic impacts, the environmental impacts."

Ray M. Keck III, the president of Texas A&M International University in Laredo, said the idea of building a wall to deter immigrants ignored the lessons of history, which clearly showed that such barriers do not work unless they are patrolled by soldiers willing to kill. More important, he said, he feared that the expensive proposal demonstrated a lack of priorities.

"Are we really so terrified of what might come from Mexico," he asked, "that we must spend billions to construct this wall, then billions to maintain it, at a time when healthcare and education so desperately need better funding?"

To Mike Allen, a former Catholic priest who helped the poor in the colonias of Texas' Hidalgo County, then switched careers and became a leading economic booster for the border region, the fence is a manifestation of politics at its ugliest.

"It is just so sad that the relationships we have worked years to build are being torn down by politicians in Washington, who quite frankly don't have any idea what they are doing," Allen said.

"I'll say it: It's the browning of America, and people are afraid of that. That's what this is all about. I have lived on the border most of my life. I'm not scared."

Farms Facing Worker Shortage For Harvest (AP)

By Elizabeth White

AP, October 1, 2006

J. Allen Carnes needed 200 workers for the onion harvest this year on 500 acres of South Texas fields. The onion business is big in the area, and with only two months to harvest, there's little room for delay.

But Carnes ended up with less than 100 workers and fell two weeks behind, with bits and pieces of the fields unpicked. His income fell about $150,000, a significant loss.

"It's become increasingly tight over the last three or four years," said Carnes, president of Winter Garden Produce in Uvalde, 80 miles west of San Antonio. "Companies are jockeying back and forth (for workers). Last year it was just short all around."

Growers say tightened border security and longer lines for day crossers have cut the numbers of farm workers who cross the border legally or illegally. Illegal immigrant workers who used to travel the country picking different crops as the seasons changed are hesitant to migrate for fear of being caught. And the lure of higher paid jobs with better working conditions, such as construction, are keeping some farm workers away.

And the labor shortage will only get worse until Congress tackles immigration reform, growers and worker advocate groups say. The House and Senate are at an impasse over proposed legislation and whether it should include an eventual path to citizenship and guest-worker program in addition to border enforcement.

Like others who employ migrant workers, Carnes checks employees' paperwork, but said some illegal immigrants probably end up working in his fields.

According to the Department of Labor's National Agricultural Workers Survey, 53 percent of the hired crop labor force lacked authorization to work in the U.S. in 2001-02. Worker advocates and grower associations agree the actual figure is probably closer to 80 percent.

Three-quarters of the hired farm work force in the U.S. was born in Mexico. And more than 40 percent of crop workers were migrants, meaning they had traveled at least 75 miles in the previous year to get a farm job, the survey showed.

Carnes said he couldn't lure workers away from other fields with incentives like higher pay for the late-spring onion harvest because there just weren't enough workers to go around.

"We're seeing the wolf at the door," said John McClung, president of the Texas Produce Association, referring to what he said is worsening shortages reported by many of the 300 growers, shippers and importers his organization represents.

But a spokesman for the United Farm Workers said farmers need to raise salaries to get workers.

DOJ_NMG_0072273

Even if they start out in the fields, "the pay is so low, the benefits mostly nonexistent and the conditions so harsh that many workers don't stay," spokesman Marc Grossman said. "It's essentially minimum-wage work."

And that can be backbreaking, hot work, especially picking berries in the early summer sun.

Carnes said increased border security is keeping even legal day laborers from crossing the border because lines have lengthened.

"There becomes a point where the paperwork and time doesn't equal the money," Carnes said. "I think we just scared them off with all the talk about immigration and closing the borders."

The U.S. Border Patrol has caught well over 1 million people along the U.S.-Mexico border in the last three fiscal years, including the one set to end Sept. 30, according to U.S. Customs and Border Protection. In 2003 alone, it caught just over 900,000 in the four border states.

Howard Rosenberg, an agricultural labor economist at the University of California, Berkeley, said while he's heard complaints about shortages for years, the concerns have worsened recently.

"It varies in how intensely it's felt and where it's felt and how much it's reported," Rosenberg said. "It is very difficult to tease out the realities from the perception."

Rosenberg said a border crackdown may not have as much to do with reductions as with the immigrant community spreading out geographically and to different industries.

"If people think that a crackdown on the border is keeping people away, how do they really know that?" Rosenberg asked. "There's still an awful lot of activity."

Growers and farm worker advocates say the beginning of a solution is the Agricultural Job Opportunities, Benefits and Security Act of 2005, dubbed "AgJobs."

The bill would provide temporary legal status for farmworkers who can prove they worked at least 100 days during a certain period. The workers could apply for a green card if they work an additional 360 days in agriculture over the subsequent six years. A slightly modified version of AgJobs passed in May in the Senate's immigration reform bill, which the House has not yet voted on.

Without comprehensive immigration reform, growers will continue to move their operations south of the border, said Tim Chelling, a vice president of the Western Growers Association, which represents growers in California and Arizona.

"It's more than anecdotal; we know that they're down there to the tune of thousands and thousands of acres," he said.

Growers are "half out the door already," said Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the conservative New York-based Manhattan Institute think tank.

"A Mexican worker is going to pick these crops one way or the other, and the only question is whether they pick them here or across the border in Mexico," Jacoby said.

Mexicans See Good And Bad Side To Wall (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

There's much talk about the void migrants leave behind, but the planned border fence still chafes.

MEXICO CITY — At the beginning of every school year, bad news comes from Mexican heartland states such as Zacatecas and Queretaro: Local authorities are closing hundreds of schools because so many families have moved north to the United States.

Mexicans feel helpless before the migrant exodus, and talk about it the same way they talk about the weather. Everyone complains about it, but there's not much you can do about it.

On Friday night, the U.S. Senate approved a 700-mile-long border wall in a bid to stop the immigrant flow. The decision has left many Mexicans wondering whether the open door to the north may slowly be closing.

Some Mexicans saw the vote as a collective slap in the face that highlighted the failure of their country's leaders to give Mexicans a reason to stay home.

"Our politicians have not lived up to their responsibilities toward the people who migrate," said Homero Aridjis, a poet, activist and onetime Mexican diplomat. "Our government has failed before the economic and social plight of the poor.

DOJ_NMG_0072274

"I'm from Michoacan," said Aridjis, naming a state west of Mexico City known for exporting its sons and daughters to the U.S. "When I go there, I see fertile farmland and orchards that have been abandoned."

Few observers here expect the new barriers to stop people from Mexico and Central America from seeking a better life in the United States. New smuggling routes are expected to open through ever-more-remote stretches of desert, or over the waters of the Rio Grande.

But the bill approved by Congress, and soon to be signed by President Bush, signals a new shift in an era that has seen dramatic cultural and demographic changes in both countries.

The wave of Latin American migration that began in the 1980s helped make Latinos the largest minority in the U.S. and the largest ethnic group in Los Angeles and many other American cities. The beginning of the 21st century saw Latino immigration spread to almost every corner of the United States, with Spanish-speaking communities booming in states such as Tennessee and Ohio.

Latin Americans see the congressional initiative as a rejection of the cultural changes brought forth by Latinos in the United States. In angry editorials and speeches, Mexican writers and politicians have compared the border fence project with the Berlin Wall and the Great Wall of China.

"The exploitation of fear among the citizens of the United States has been at the center of the debate," the newspaper El Universal said in an editorial Saturday. "This wall, like all those built with xenophobic aims, will be far from effective."

President Vicente Fox and President-elect Felipe Calderon have denounced the new fence, as have a host of Mexican political leaders.

For decades, social scientists here have seen migration to the north as a "safety valve" that keeps Mexico from exploding into social conflict. Now, a small number of voices are saying the brain and muscle drain to the U.S. cannot continue indefinitely.

When the head of Mexico's central bank told a Texas newspaper last week that a new wall between the United States and his country might not be such a bad thing, his remarks were front-page news here. Surprisingly, there were few public expressions of disagreement.

"It would be best to keep its people in Mexico, and it would give incentives for Mexico to create jobs that are needed," Guillermo Ortiz, the bank official, said in an interview with the editorial board of the Dallas Morning News.

The border fence will be an expansion of the measures first undertaken in the mid-1990s by U.S. authorities as part of Operation Gatekeeper in San Ysidro, Calif., and Operation Hold the Line in El Paso. The U.S. Border Patrol built a new fence of corrugated steel, installed motion detectors and hired thousands of new agents.

The measures pushed illegal immigrants into the Sonoran Desert in Arizona and other remote areas, where several hundred die each year from dehydration and exposure.

Many analysts believe the border enforcement measures of the last decade have done little more than change the traditional back-and-forth patterns that saw thousands of Mexicans take seasonal work in the U.S. and then return home to their families.

In testimony to the House Judiciary Committee in August, Wayne Cornelius of the Center for Comparative Immigration Studies at UC San Diego said that the get-tough approach at the border had only succeeded at "bottling up" millions of immigrants in the U.S.

"Given the high costs and physical risks of illegal entry today, they have a strong incentive to extend their stays in the U.S.," Cornelius said.

Rather than return to Mexico, many immigrants are sending for their families, accelerating the declining enrollment in rural Mexican schools, analysts say. In Zacatecas, state education officials said last month they were closing 269 schools because of declining enrollments.

Before 1929, Mexicans were not required to obtain a visa to enter the United States. Ever since, "the history of the border has been a history of closing the border," said Tony Payan, a professor at the University of Texas in El Paso and author of "The Three U.S.-Mexico Border Wars: Drugs, Immigration, and Homeland Security."

DOJ_NMG_0072275

The new measures approved Friday will seal off most of the Arizona-Mexico border. Immigrant smugglers are likely to move farther east, to remote crossing points on the Rio Grande upriver from the Texas cities of Eagle Pass and Del Rio, Payan said.

Cornelius told the Judiciary Committee that even if the entire land border was sealed off, immigrant smuggling would probably move to the waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

Lorenzo Meyer, one of Mexico's leading historians, argued that the Senate vote had revealed an essential hypocrisy in U.S.-Mexico relations.

"In 1993 we signed the North American Free Trade agreement," Meyer said. "It was supposed to be the beginning of a period of cooperation and friendship." Now the U.S. government has "unilaterally" announced the construction of a wall, he said.

"We see now that the idea of a united North America is fiction," Meyer said. "The reality is the wall."

Illegal -- But Essential (LAT)

By David Streitfeld

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Experts say undocumented immigrants are a driving force in the economy, despite a toll on public services and unskilled workers

Shortly after dawn, the day laborers began gathering beneath a San Diego Freeway overpass in West Los Angeles.

A house painter pulled up in a pickup, looking for an assistant. He offered $12 an hour. A worker jumped in.

Next to arrive was a white-haired woman driving a Honda. Her garden needed a makeover. She'd pay $11 an hour. She departed with a second worker.

On the freeway above, commuters were heading to offices in Century City and El Segundo. Down here, at the West L.A. Community Job Center, arrangements were being made to remodel their living rooms, landscape their yards, rebuild their decks.

The work is undertaken by men from Mexico and Central America. Most are in this country illegally. The jobs, which last only a day or two and pay cash, are all but invisible to the state and federal governments. No one has to fill out paperwork, follow safety regulations or pay taxes.

Yet what happens here is far from marginal. The jobs that flow out of this day-laborer hiring spot — and from thousands of others around the state, some as informal as a street corner — are a pillar of California's economic strength.

To see why, check out Adrian Lopez, 20, who is kicking around a soccer ball as he waits. Lopez, who came here from the Mexican state of Oaxaca, is carrying in his Everest backpack a Sony Walkman from the Best Buy across the street.

It's got a CD by the Argentine group Los Enanitos Verdes inside, bought at a Ritmo Latino store. He has a bottle of Kirkland Premium Drinking Water, purchased at Costco, and a spare Old Navy shirt. He likes the grilled steak at Baja Bud's. He wasn't impressed by "Monster House."

"Immigrants buy everything here," Lopez said in Spanish.

The presence in the United States of Lopez and 12 million other illegal immigrants is one of the most contentious issues of the era. Hundreds of thousands of immigrants have repeatedly demonstrated this year for legal recognition, sparking a backlash from many native-born Americans. Congress has been stalemated between legalization advocates and those pushing punitive measures.

Economists are less divided. In the main, they say the American engines of industry and commerce have always been fueled by a steady supply of new arrivals. Immigrants, they contend, contribute to consumer spending and, instead of replacing native workers, create jobs.

"Overall, immigration has been a net gain for American citizens, though a modest one in proportion to the size of our $13-trillion economy," 500 economists wrote in an open letter to Congress on June 19.

Measuring the contributions of illegal workers is a difficult task, however. Many numbers are vague or open to dispute. A few experts contend that the gains are not clear-cut and that any benefits are far from being universally shared.

DOJ_NMG_0072276

Special interests that benefit from immigrant labor — including agribusiness, restaurant operators and unions courting new members — tout their gains as gains for all, said Michael Teitelbaum, who was vice chairman of the bipartisan U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform in the 1990s.

"It all comes down to where you sit," said Teitelbaum, a demographer at the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation. "The upper tiers benefit from immigration, and the lower tiers lose."

The 500 economists concede that a "small percentage" of native-born Americans may be hurt by competition from illegal immigrants who are willing to work cheaply. But any harm, they say, is outweighed by the benefits to the overall economy.

Lopez is a case in point. Start with his willingness to work for little. Add his eagerness to spend. Multiply that by the more than 2 million illegal workers in the state.

One result: Restaurant prices are pushed down by illegal labor in the kitchen, fruit and vegetable prices by illegal field hands, new-home prices by illegal drywallers.

Immigrants aren't just a weapon against inflation. The tens of thousands of illegal nannies in the Los Angeles area, for example, lower the cost of child care, freeing mothers to return to work. This in turn increases families' incomes, which encourages spending and fuels the economy.

Many immigrants send a portion of their earnings home to their families, but their influence here remains potent. The Economic Roundtable, a Los Angeles think tank, estimates that the 400,000 illegal workers in L.A. County spend $5.7 billion annually on food, rent, transportation and other necessities.

The sales taxes they pay on all those consumer purchases boost the state treasury. The growing number of immigrants who use false papers to get payroll jobs are contributing to Social Security without the right to receive payments from the fund.

That props up the beleaguered system by at least $5 billion a year, analysts say.

Other benefits may be less obvious, such as the gains in property values enjoyed by homeowners.

Prices surged for a number of reasons over the last few years, including very low interest rates, but experts say immigrants made a big difference in California. Their apartments and houses may be shabby, but their sheer numbers exert a profound effect. In a state that never has enough housing, the hundreds of thousands of units rented to immigrant families put upward pressure on all prices.

Then there are the bad things that aren't happening despite the immigrants' presence. For instance, they don't seem to be creating an unemployment problem. Joblessness in California, with 24% of the country's illegal immigrants, has tracked the low national rate.

All this evidence, many economists say, makes a powerful argument that immigrants' role can be characterized as somewhere between important and irreplaceable.

"The only people to benefit from the deportation of millions of low-skill workers would be other low-skill workers, who would get an immediate increase in pay rates," said Timothy Kane, an economist with the conservative Heritage Foundation. "However, they would also be the first to lose their jobs during a recession — which would be inevitable if the economy were shocked in this fashion."

Many Californians forcefully disagree with this assessment, saying immigrants have dragged down the quality of life in the state. They point to neighborhoods overflowing with poor immigrants. In some occupations, such as landscaping and construction, workers who don't speak Spanish say they can't get hired.

Other costs carry a more defined price tag. The California Hospital Assn. says emergency-room care for uninsured immigrants, including delivery of babies, costs taxpayers and private insurers about $650 million a year.

Whether born here or brought here, children of illegal immigrants have access to a free education. The Palo Alto-based Center for the Continuing Study of the California Economy estimates that this schooling costs as much as $6 billion annually.

Teitelbaum says the cost is even higher if you take into account how the influx has strained classrooms.

"California used to have one of the best systems of public education," he said. "Now it has one of the worst."

Feeling Squeezed Out

Sean Jourdan stood on the sidewalk at an Inglewood shopping center, hawking DirecTV satellite subscriptions. A natural salesman, he charmed passers-by into taking his bright yellow leaflets.

DOJ_NMG_0072277

"Let me give you a flier," he said to a woman and her grandson coming out of the Giant Dollar Store. "What do you have at home? Comcast? I'll give you double what they're giving you for half of what you're paying."

Jourdan took classes at two community colleges but dropped out before getting a degree. When he was in his early 20s, he attended the Maxine Waters Employment Preparation Center in Watts, a school started after the 1965 riots. Trained as a telecommunications technician, he was soon making $50,000 a year installing TV systems.

"It was a living wage," said Jourdan, 32, who is African American. "There are a lot of jobs out there, but only a few pay a living wage."

At first, many of his co-workers were black. Over time, however, his firm reduced payments for installation. Meanwhile, it hired more Latinos. Many couldn't speak English, Jourdan said, so he assumed they were new arrivals from Mexico and Central America.

By the time Jourdan left his last installation job in June, the pay rate for each house call had shrunk so much that he was making only about $25,000 a year. The last company he worked for had two black technicians out of about 25, he said.

Jourdan was briefly in the media spotlight a few months ago after attending a rally for the Minuteman Project, which vehemently opposes illegal immigration. "They're the same type of people who hunted us down when we escaped from the plantation," he said. "But on this issue, I unite with them."

Jourdan grew up near this mall, but it's no longer the place he knew. There's a machine that makes fresh tortillas in the Superior supermarket, signs in Spanish in the Rite Aid and a Latino construction crew redoing a vacant storefront.

"Give me a call. I'll save you money," he promised a young Latina. She smiled and took the flier. Jourdan may be upset by illegal immigrants, but many make good customers because they "haven't had 25 years to run up their credit." Every sale that survives DirecTV's credit check nets Jourdan a $150 commission.

"Although I can make money, it's a hustle," he said. "I'm going to have to learn Spanish."

Workers on the margins can be hurt by illegal immigration, economists note. A 2005 study by Harvard economist George Borjas and Lawrence F. Katz of the National Bureau of Economic Research concluded that native-born high school dropouts lost as much as 8% in wages from 1980 to 2000 because of illegal immigration.

UC Berkeley economist David Card has challenged those findings, saying cities such as Los Angeles are absorbing large numbers of laborers without wages being affected.

The plentiful supply of workers, Card speculates, has led companies to keep people at jobs that might otherwise have been automated.

Other economists wonder whether the reason for the limited effect on wages is even more basic: Instead of competing with immigrants, many native workers simply surrender, perhaps relocating to cities with better prospects.

In a new book titled "L.A. Story: Immigrant Workers and the Future of the U.S. Labor Movement," UCLA sociologist Ruth Milkman uses census data to show how some jobs have changed over the decades.

From 1970 to 2000, Milkman calculates, the percentage of janitors in Greater Los Angeles who were black fell from 24% to 5.2%. Meanwhile, the foreign-born Latino share rose from 10.3% to 63.4%.

Similar transitions occurred among construction drywallers, truckers and garment workers.

As in satellite TV installation, wages for these jobs are a far cry from what they once were. But Milkman says that's not because the companies replaced the natives with illegal workers.

Instead, the employers first squeezed benefits and salaries under the mantle of "competitiveness." The lengthy decline of trade unions undermined workers' ability to fight back.

Natives who could get out did so. The gaps were typically filled by immigrants, but in Milkman's analysis their hiring was a consequence, rather than a cause, of the jobs' lost allure.

The surprising development is that the immigrants, far from being pliant, have reinvigorated the union movement and in some cases won higher wages. "The people who have been demonized, the illegal immigrants, are in some ways showing the way forward for everyone," Milkman said.

For Jourdan, precisely what happened to his installation wages is of little consequence. What matters is the constant worry about slipping behind.

DOJ_NMG_0072278

"As a technician, you knew that if you went in every morning and did the work, there'd be a check at the end of the week," he said. "Now I don't have that security."

He's thinking of moving — maybe north to Palmdale or east to Moreno Valley. That's what some of his Inglewood friends have done.

"There are so many homes being built out there, so many potential customers for satellite systems," he said. "Maybe I should go too."

A Region Revitalized

When Panorama City in the San Fernando Valley boomed after World War II, the developers allowed only white people to buy houses. For four decades, General Motors made Chevrolets there, offering at peak production a solid income to more than 5,000 workers.

In 1992, the plant, the Southland's last car factory, was closed. With unemployment in the county running at 10%, few of the assembly-line workers were able to find new jobs paying them the $17 and $18 an hour they had been earning.

Similar closures happened throughout the country. But when the plants shut down in Ohio or Pennsylvania, they tended to become permanent ruins. The surrounding streets festered with abandoned houses and empty storefronts. Pittsburgh, Detroit and Cleveland have had to grapple with massive, long-term population declines.

In Panorama City, vitality quickly reemerged in a new language and a new culture. What it had — which the cities back East lacked — was the proximity of Mexico.

In the 1990s, L.A. County gained 1 million immigrants, most of them from Latin America, many of them illegal. In Panorama City, the Latino population grew from a significant minority to an outright majority.

The community around the former GM plant is thriving, if not exactly upscale. The plant itself is a shopping center called, straightforwardly enough, the Plant. It is anchored by a Home Depot where illegal immigrants wait for work that will pay about half what the autoworkers got, with no benefits and no promises about tomorrow.

On the surrounding streets are clinics, cheap restaurants and music and furniture stores catering to Latinos. It's one of many centers of the informal economy in L.A., where most transactions are in cash.

To many Californians, this is not a change for the better.

"I really don't consider the low-income parts of California to even be California anymore," said Kevin Waterson, an administrative employee of UC Davis, near Sacramento. "The quality of life is much more like that in Mexico."

A year ago, the Public Policy Institute of California polled state residents on whether immigrants were "a burden to California because they use public services" or "a benefit to California because of their hard work and job skills."

"Benefit" was picked by 56% and "burden" by 36%. Many of those in the latter camp, including Waterson, see illegal immigrants as competition. The struggle is less about jobs than scarce community resources, including affordable homes, gridlock-free roads and good schools.

Waterson grew up in Fontana in San Bernardino County, the son of a computer programmer and a billing clerk who were able to buy a three-bedroom house, own two cars and build a nest egg. That status, achieved by millions of Californians after World War II, now feels out of reach.

"There are a lot of places in Los Angeles I want to live that I can't afford," said Waterson, 27. "The places I can afford, I don't want to live."

It's not just his perception. The Brookings Institution recently found that Los Angeles was the nation's most polarized city by wealth. Fewer than a third of L.A. neighborhoods are middle class, according to its study. The rest are either rich or poor.

Waterson keeps looking for all those benefits the economists say immigration has brought to him. But if the informal economy benefits both the immigrants and the well off, it doesn't seem to be helping him and his wife, Julia, very much.

They don't use immigrants to mow the lawn or wash the car or take care of the kids. They can't afford to eat out, so they don't gain from the toil of illegal restaurant workers. They're renters, so any immigrant-driven boost to real estate just puts a home of their own further out of reach.

The informal economy that much of California has embraced so enthusiastically can be criticized on other grounds.

DOJ_NMG_0072279

Small cash-and-carry shops and vendors who cater to immigrants may not pay sales taxes to the state or business license fees to local government. People who hire day laborers cheat the state by not using companies that pay payroll taxes. The laborers cheat the state by not paying income taxes. All of these groups put legal workers and legal businesses at an unfair competitive disadvantage.

The most sweeping criticism: By creating a market for illegal labor, the informal economy increases the supply. If illegal laborers weren't in such demand, they wouldn't risk so much to come here. For better or worse, immigration would not be an issue.

But for Los Angeles County, the informal economy has been better than nothing — and nothing, urban affairs expert and Economic Roundtable President Daniel Flaming says, is what the county would have had otherwise.

"When manufacturing collapsed, there was no effort to salvage the infrastructure for other purposes," he said. "The formal economy here has been stagnant since the beginning of the 1990s. The only growth has been in under-the-table employment, predominantly fueled by desperate workers and in particular undocumented workers."

Without immigrants, Flaming said, Los Angeles would be smaller and weaker and poorer — Detroit or Pittsburgh or Cleveland with better weather.

In that L.A., Waterson would be able to find an affordable house. But because the population might be falling, his house could very well decline in value.

"We should be thankful to immigrants," Flaming said. "Without them, things would be much worse."

First the newcomers stabilized Panorama City. Now they are pushing it forward. The median value of a single-family home has doubled since 2000. And on the edge of the Plant mall, there's a sign that the informal economy might be yielding to a more traditional, bigger-budget state of affairs. Starbucks, that dispenser of $4 venti tangerine frappuccinos to the middle class, has just opened a store.

History of Ambivalence

Five days a week, Lissette Rodriguez starts work at 6 a.m., preparing banquet food for a mid-priced hotel southeast of downtown. After eight hours of chopping and slicing, she goes home and takes a shower. Four days a week, she heads to Beverly Hills, where she works from 5 p.m. to 1 a.m. washing dishes at a luxury hotel.

"Not many people could make it through 16 hours like that," she said proudly.

Rodriguez, 32, arrived from El Salvador in 2004, not to save or damage L.A.'s economy but to help herself.

"In Salvador, there's no money, no jobs," she said in Spanish. "It's more expensive here, but I can make a lot more."

That would be $9 an hour, a fortune to her and a pittance to the hotels. The fact that both sides consider it a good deal binds them together in a "don't ask, don't tell" policy. Rodriguez's employers no more want to catch her than she wants to be exposed.

The history of California is full of ambivalence to immigrants.

"From 1907 to 1940, 'the Mexican problem' was a hardy perennial in Southern California," historian Carey McWilliams wrote in 1946. "Every winter, the business interests of the region worked themselves into a lather of excitement over the cost of Mexican relief, hospitalization and medical care. With the return of the crop cycle in the spring, however, 'the Mexican problem' always somehow vanished or was succeeded by the problem of 'an acute labor shortage.' "

For most employers, any ambivalence appears to be gone. Instead, the business community speaks in dire terms about the consequences of a widespread crackdown on the hiring of illegal workers.

"It would be a horrible negative," said Jeff King, co-founder of King's Seafood Co., which owns Ocean Avenue Seafood in Santa Monica and the Water Grill downtown. "You cannot get Americans to come in at entry-level wages. You'd have to pay a premium."

That might be good for the workers, but King contends it would bring on economic disaster. Prices would go up. Diners would balk. Sales taxes would fall, employment tumble. (King stressed that the 2,000 King's Seafood employees are all legal, as far as the company can tell.)

By working for less than a native citizen would, Lissette Rodriguez is helping her employers' bottom lines.

DOJ_NMG_0072280

To an extent, she's also helping taxpayers, although unintentionally. The hotels deduct the usual taxes from her payroll checks. But she won't see a refund or, later in life, a Social Security check.

"That money is just gone," she said. "Most illegals are scared to do tax returns."

Rodriguez is the admirable and problematic face of immigration in 2006. She crossed the border without permission and obtained a bogus Social Security number. She knows she is breaking the law.

Yet she wants only to do what legal immigrants have done throughout U.S. history: work hard and sacrifice mightily to get ahead. In less than two years, she has become deeply embedded in the local economy and the community.

All of these contradictions in one person. All of them in 12 million people. And more tomorrow.

"I miss my children," Rodriguez said. She wants to bring them — a 6-year-old girl, a 15-year-old boy — to Los Angeles. This is her home.

HPD Revising Its Immigration Policy (HC)

By Matt Stiles

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

Changes taking effect this week will help feds nab criminals here illegally

Under fire in recent months over its policy toward illegal immigrants, the Houston Police Department is unveiling new procedures today to allow more cooperation with federal agents trying to catch criminals living in the country illegally.

Officers still will not inquire about the immigration status of people they haven't arrested, so the changes are unlikely to quiet critics who have labeled Houston a "sanctuary city" for illegal immigrants.

But the department is making several key revisions.

An announcement is expected today, less than two weeks after the shooting death of police officer Rodney Johnson caused simmering opposition to the department policy to flare anew. An illegal immigrant who previously had been deported is charged in the slaying.

Among the changes to take effect this week:

•The department will hold people detained or arrested for traffic violations or other minor crimes — Class C misdemeanors — if warrant checks show they are wanted by federal agents for defying an order to leave the country or for returning after being deported in connection with a criminal case. Under existing policy, police generally did not hold such people for federal authorities, even if officers were aware of the federal warrants.

•The department will allow immigration agents unfettered access to the city's two jails, as they have had in the Harris County jail, and officers will start asking all arrestees whether they are citizens.

•Fingerprints of anyone booked into the jails without proper identification will be checked against a national fingerprint database.

That could help officers identify wanted criminals, including people wanted for serious immigration violations, police say.

"There's a pretty solid process now between HPD and the federal authorities to identify and act on people who've been deported from this country because of their criminal behavior," said Executive Assistant Chief Timothy Oettmeier, among a group of police commanders who briefed the Houston Chronicle on the changes.

"We're now in a position to detect and get them back out of here."

Oettmeier and the others acknowledged they can't project how many immigration violators who previously might have been released will be snared under the new policy. Immigration officials say roughly 200,000 such cases are in their database, but only a few such people encounter authorities each year.

Police commanders, who dispute the "sanctuary" title, have been working on the revisions for months with federal prosecutors and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials.

Under the revised procedures, officers still won't attempt to determine the immigration status of people encountered routinely, and won't arrest anyone solely for being in the country illegally — as advocated by supporters of tougher immigration enforcement.

DOJ_NMG_0072281

Local versus federal

But police and immigration officials say the immigration status of suspects charged with serious misdemeanors or felonies is routinely determined upon transfer to the county jail.

Mayor Bill White and Police Chief Harold Hurtt have said the department doesn't have legal authority in most immigration cases.

They also say the department shouldn't expend its limited manpower on a federal responsibility and that doing so would alienate officers from immigrant communities.

That could make it harder to get immigrants to report crimes or cooperate as witnesses.

"The administration supports giving law enforcement all tools to reduce the risk of crime within their resources," White said.

"Running more checks on the wanted status of people, and more use of the fingerprint database, will tighten up the procedures."

Critic not satisfied

One key department critic, Mary Williams of Protect Our Citizens, a local group trying to change the policy through a voter referendum, charged that the revisions don't go far enough.

She vowed to continue her fight to put a provision in the City Charter permitting police to enforce immigration laws.

"We want officers to have the discretion to ask them the first time," she said, referring to inquiries about citizenship status during routine encounters such as traffic stops.

Williams dismissed the new policies as political posturing.

"When you let the politicians decide, you get baby steps like this thing," she said.

Though the changes likely won't end criticism of the policy, police commanders said the new procedures will make it harder for criminal immigrants to elude detection but also allow the department to maintain its position that officers should have a limited role in immigration matters.

2003 incident resurfaces

The change involving criminal deportees — people forced out of the country because they violated laws here — would prevent incidents like one in October 2003, when officers were forced to release Moises Hernandez Galvan, a 37-year-old illegal immigrant detained after a traffic stop, even though they knew he had returned to the country after deportation.

The incident was not publicized at the time but sparked internal criticism about the department's policy, according to police memos obtained by the Houston Chronicle under the Texas Public Information Act.

"If this suspect had been a deported felon with terrorist ties, then the actions taken in this incident could seriously jeopardize homeland security," Lt. Tom Roman, who is now retired, wrote then-acting Police Chief Joe Breshears.

A reply memo stated that the department would continue its policy of not detaining people arrested on Class C misdemeanors simply because they had immigration warrants.

Under the new policy, police would hold for federal authorities a suspect such as Galvan if it's discovered the suspect is wanted on an immigration warrant.

Bob Rutt, special agent in charge of the Houston office of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said his agents will take those suspects from police custody within 12 hours.

"This is very big," he said. "It shows the commitment by HPD to public safety and homeland security."

Police Enforcement Of Immigration Laws Raises Worry (WP)

Foreigners Without Documents Say They May Leave Out of Fear

At the Bestway Supermarket on Elden Street, where shoppers browse to merengue music and signs touting the specials are in Spanish and English, Latino customers say they don't know much about Herndon's new mayor or Town Council.

But they do say the town's Hispanic community was buzzing last week with the news that those in charge, whoever they are, want police to become la migra, federal immigration agents.

DOJ_NMG_0072282

"Everyone is afraid," said Byron Flores, 26, who has lived in Herndon since immigrating illegally from Honduras three years ago. The number of illegal immigrants reporting crime is likely to plummet, he said, for fear that the police will ask for their papers.

Many people are thinking about moving away, he said, including him.

"Maybe to Seven Corners."

Herndon's council voted last week to apply to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement for enrollment in the agency's "Section 287(g)" program, which trains local police officers to determine whether criminal suspects in custody are illegal immigrants. Officers certified by the program can detain them and even begin deportation proceedings before turning cases over to the federal agency. Seven state and local law enforcement agencies nationwide have joined the program. A dozen more are seeking to enroll officers.

The prospect of Herndon's entry into the program has again placed the town near the epicenter of the national debate on immigration policy. About a quarter of its 23,000 residents are Latino immigrants, according to census data.

It has also rekindled tensions that emerged with the council's decision last year to open a publicly funded day-labor center to help immigrant workers find jobs. Supporters, including former mayor Michael L. O'Reilly, said the federal government's failure to control the borders gave them no choice. Opponents of the center, which does not try to determine the immigration status of workers, said the town was abetting illegal activity. In May, voters unseated O'Reilly and two council members in what was viewed as frustration over the issue.

During O'Reilly's tenure, Herndon Police Chief Toussaint E. Summers Jr. rejected the idea of entering the 287(g) program for precisely the reasons expressed by the Latino patrons at Bestway.

"Herndon Police Department involvement with enforcing immigration laws could create barriers for segments of our community," he wrote to Town Manager Stephen F. Owen in a Jan. 22, 2004, memo. "Such action would tend to be counterproductive to our community policing philosophy, which promotes partnerships and building trust."

But shortly after taking office, Mayor Steve J. DeBenedittis, joined by four new council members (and two holdovers) discussed Summers's status in a closed-door meeting.

"I was not invited," Summers said.

But the message was clear: The new council wanted a tougher stance on crime in general and crime committed by illegal immigrants in particular.

Bestway customer Marvin Alexander, 30, a Salvadoran in the country illegally, said he is concerned about the changes the new council will bring. He said Herndon police recently stopped an acquaintance of his, also an illegal immigrant, who did not have a license. Officers did not cite her.

"Imagine if that happened now," Alexander said.

Until the town works out an agreement with Immigration and Customs Enforcement on the scope of the training and authority that officers who complete the course will have, it is difficult to predict whether 287(g) will actually help Herndon remove criminal illegal immigrants from its streets.

A number of factors could seriously limit the program's effectiveness, such as a lack of jail space and manpower.

Most other law enforcement agencies participating in the program are sheriff's departments that operate large jails. Herndon relies on Fairfax County's Adult Detention Center to house most of its prisoners. But Fairfax Sheriff Stan G. Barry (D) said last week that he didn't foresee his department entering 287(g). It means that Herndon probably would have to transport undocumented suspects elsewhere, possibly more than an hour away to Rappahannock County, tying up officers' time.

There is also the question of just how much of a threat illegal immigrants pose to public safety in Herndon.

Town officials say they want to use 287(g) to target the "worst of the worst" criminal illegal immigrants. But police say serious "Class A" crime -- murder, rape, robbery -- was down 26 percent in Herndon from 2002 to 2005.

"Herndon is not a crime-ridden community," said council member J. Harlon Reece, who is uncertain whether he will vote to approve a final agreement with Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Critics of DeBenedittis and the council say they are misleading voters into believing that the town can roll back illegal immigration. On Tuesday, the council will take up two other proposals targeting undocumented residents. One would require the town manager to ensure that anyone granted a business license has legal immigration status. The other would require the town manager to ensure that companies contracting with the town government provide evidence that all their employees are in the country legally.

"This is a concerted effort to dupe the citizens into thinking that they are actually going to solve the immigration problems in this town," said former council member Carol A. Bruce, a supporter of the day-labor center who was defeated for reelection in May.

"This isn't about immigrants," DeBenedittis said. "It's about crime and criminal behavior. It's about reducing crime and making all of us safe."

Other supporters of 287(g) say the message is as important -- perhaps more important -- as the substance.

"The perception here is that we're in favor of illegal immigration," said Vice Mayor Dennis D. Husch. "We're trying to change that perception, and this council has the gumption to do that."

The view at Bestway suggests that this is already happening. Flores said the thought of leaving town is distressing. He is close to his Herndon neighbors, many of whom are U.S. citizens.

But if Herndon police begin working to deport people, he said, he may have no choice.

"If they sign something, if they make it law, I go," he said. "I do not want to be the first person, you understand?"

De-greening Immigration (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

DENVER

Illegal immigration is an environmental issue for Shela A. McFarlin, who has seen firsthand the tons of trash dumped in the fragile Arizona desert by border-crossers.

Illegal aliens have turned parts of the Southwest desert into environmental disaster areas -- dumping an estimated 25 million pounds of trash in the Arizona desert, carving out hundreds of miles of roads through the wilderness and destroying thousands of acres of habitat with cooking fires that have gone awry.

"The desert environment is fairly sensitive, so we're concerned about the damage to habitat, plants and animals," said Miss McFarlin, who authored the Bureau of Land Management's 2006 report on environmental damage from illegal immigration. "It's not at all inviting to see toilet paper, fecal matter and backpacks by the thousands. Not at all."

Once the immigrants, both legal and illegal, arrive, the scenario isn't much rosier. Immigration is now the primary factor in U.S. population growth, which drives such environmental woes as housing sprawl, pollution and traffic.

But don't expect your local Green Party activist to grab a lawn chair and join the Minutemen border patrols any time soon: The mainstream environmental movement is firmly and uniformly agnostic on the issue.

"We've never taken a position pro or con on immigration," Sierra Club spokesman Eric Antebi said.

"We don't have the expertise to deal with that [illegal immigration]," Wilderness Society spokesman Ben Beach said.

These responses exasperate environmentalists such as Dick Lamm, the former Democratic governor of Colorado and a 30-year member of the Sierra Club. Mr. Lamm broke ranks with the movement years ago by insisting that a responsible environmental policy has to include population and immigration controls.

He is among the most prominent of a small-but-hardy band of environmentalists who have tried for years to push the movement toward an anti-immigration stance. So far, they haven't had much luck.

"The environmental movement refuses to acknowledge that immigration and population are environmental issues," Mr. Lamm said.

Why? Politics, he said.

"The environmental movement has gone politically correct," Mr. Lamm said. "They're committing political malpractice by ignoring population."

DOJ_NMG_0072284

But Jenny Neeley, Southwest representative for Defenders of Life, said her group hasn't taken a stance on immigration reform in Congress because "I don't think we're knowledgeable enough to say, 'This will stop the illegal crossings.'"

Faced with a difficult choice, critics said, the environmental movement has abandoned its primary mission -- protecting the planet -- rather than deviate from the liberal establishment.

"They're still pretty much ignoring it [illegal immigration] because it's politically sensitive or because they perceive it to be politically sensitive," said Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for Immigration Reform. "Nobody denies that environmental degradation is due in part to population growth, and nobody denies that the biggest reason for population growth is immigration.

"But somehow, when they put together A and B, it doesn't lead to C," he said.

Alienating illegals

Some environmentalists counter that population control is an issue that doesn't respect borders. Whether the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens in the United States chose to live in New Mexico or Mexico City, they are still part of a global overpopulation problem.

"Do people who migrate to the United States increase environmental stress? It depends on where they would end up otherwise. Los Angeles, for example, could handle 10,000 Ecuadoreans more easily than the Galapagos Islands could," Sierra Club Executive Director Carl Pope wrote in a 2004 article in the group's magazine.

Alan Kuper, a longtime Sierra Club member and a critic of its immigration stance, said this is an unfair comparison because Americans are greater consumers of resources than people living in other countries.

"That's the cop-out argument that you get," Mr. Kuper said. "An individual in the U.S. is responsible for consumption or use of resources of about 30 times the resources a child in India will use in his lifetime."

Critics also cite the group's longstanding policy that calls first for U.S. population control, then global stabilization.

"Our immigration policy can't make a dent in world poverty, and we take in two times more immigrants as any other country already," Mr. Lamm said. "The question is how can the U.S. best help the environment? By building a sustainable society."

Other environmentalists acknowledge that they tread lightly when it comes to illegal immigration in order to protect their work on other environmental issues.

"Because it's such a charged issue in this country, it's hard to get involved without getting caught in the crossfire," Mr. Antebi said. "We have a history of working with a large number of constituencies, and we want to continue to work with them.

"If we'd gotten involved with the immigration issue, we would have burned a lot of bridges," he said.

The group would have burned those bridges not just with its allies, but with many of its grass-roots members.

"We tend to work with communities that have a lot of immigrants," Mr. Antebi said. "In California, the places with the worst air pollution tend to be the places with the largest number of immigrants.

"If we took sides on immigration pro or con, it would affect our relationships with these communities," he said.

No environmental group has debated the immigration issue more publicly than the Sierra Club. In 2004 and 2005, anti-immigration candidates attempted to reverse the club's direction by running for seats on its 15-member board of directors. All of them lost, including Mr. Lamm, in 2004.

The club came under fire in 2004 after a wealthy donor, Wall Street investor David Gelbaum, told the Los Angeles Times that he had warned Mr. Pope in 1994 or 1995 that he would never give another dollar if the club ever took an anti-immigration stance.

In 1996, the club voted to adopt a neutrality stance on immigration, reversing its longstanding position in favor of limiting immigration. In 2000 and 2001, Mr. Gelbaum donated a total of $100 million to the organization.

Critics accused the Sierra Club of selling out, but Mr. Antebi denied any linkage between the events.

"This organization is too big and too democratic in its grass-roots leadership," he said, pointing out that the club's policies are set by its elected board. "No one person can wield that much influence."

Besides, he said, Sierra Club members hardly need to be bribed to recognize the merits of avoiding the immigration debate.

DOJ_NMG_0072285

"It's not that crazy to figure out why an organization like the Sierra Club would not want to wade into an issue like immigration," Mr. Antebi said. "Protecting ANWR [Arctic National Wildlife Refuge]? That's our bread-and-butter. Reducing air-pollution levels? That's our bread-and-butter. Immigration? That's really not our bread-and-butter."

Remembering ZPG

At one time, however, stabilizing the U.S. population was indeed a central tenet of the environmental movement. In the 1960s and 1970s, when it was just taking root, the call for "zero population growth" was as loud and insistent as the cry for cleaner air and water.

In 1970, the Sierra Club adopted a policy calling for the nation to "bring about the stabilization of the population first of the United States and then of the world." Three years later, Mr. Pope told the New York Times that "we can't hope to absorb all who want to come in. ... Immigration is a sentimental symbol whose day is long past."

By 1998, however, the environmental movement was in full retreat from both the population and immigration issue. Roy Beck and Leon Kolankiewicz of NumbersUSA attribute the phenomenon to a number of factors, including the drop in U.S. fertility rates.

However, the researchers from the immigration-reform group conclude that the primary cause was demographics: The immigrants were Hispanic, and there were millions of them. Environmental leaders soon decided they couldn't afford a political skirmish with a large and increasingly influential minority group.

"One of the main reasons the Sierra Club leadership gave in 1998 for avoiding the immigration issue was that they dared not risk appearing to be racially insensitive," the authors wrote in their paper, "The Environmental Movement's Retreat from Advocating U.S. Population Stabilization (1970-1998)."

The authors quote Mr. Pope in a 1997 online message to members: "While it is theoretically possible to have a non-racial debate about immigration, it is not practically possible for an open organization like the Sierra Club to do so. ... [Recent history] has caused me to change my view of whether it is possible for the Sierra Club to deal with the immigration issue in a way which would not implicate us in ethnic or racial polarization."

While that calculation might be correct, critics say, there's just one problem: It puts environmental protection second. The result has been the birth of a hybrid political movement made up of environmentalists-cum-immigration hawks.

Among the leaders of the movement is Mr. Kuper, a one-time Sierra Club leader and retired physics professor. After the 1996 neutrality vote, Mr. Kuper founded Sierrans for U.S. Population Stabilization, a splinter group of disgruntled members devoted to returning the club to its "traditional population policy."

The group developed a scorecard that grades members of Congress on their votes on the environment, immigration and family-planning issues. Mr. Kuper also regularly lobbies the League of Conservation Voters to include immigration on its list of issues.

Relations between the rebels and the mother ship aren't always cordial. During the 2004 and 2005 board elections, the anti-immigration candidates accused Sierra Club staffers of playing the race card to undermine their campaigns.

After the 2004 election, Mr. Pope wrote an essay titled "The Virus of Hate," which warned members against a possible infiltration of the club by racists. He said that some candidates "on the losing side" had entered into an "ugly alliance with individuals and groups whose motivations are clearly racist."

Mr. Kuper now includes a disclaimer on his Web site denouncing racism under the heading "No to racism, yes to environmentalism."

Battle at the border

One issue that could pull the environmental community back into the immigration debate is the degradation at the border. The Bureau of Land Management estimates that only 1 percent of the 25 million tons of garbage left in the Southern Arizona desert has been hauled off since 2002.

The hardest-hit areas include the Cabeza Prieta National Wildlife Refuge, which now includes about 200 miles of illegal roads carved into the landscape by trucks and off-road vehicles, prompting the Wilderness Society to issue an alert.

"The trash problem is staggering, to say the least," said Defenders of Life's Miss Neeley, whose group has been active in cleanup efforts. "If you've seen it, it's almost surreal."

DOJ_NMG_0072286

The groups' solution, however, isn't likely to warm the hearts of immigration hawks. Instead of calling for a clampdown on illegal immigration, both groups have stern words for the U.S. Border Patrol, calling on the agency to make a stronger commitment to environmental protection.

Miss Neeley said in a 2006 article in an environmental group's publication that the problem lies with the agency's decision to push illegal aliens from urban points of entry such as Nogales, Ariz., to the desert. The idea was to make crossing the border more difficult, but the result has been the degradation of protected lands, she said in the Sky Island Alliance's newsletter.

The Border Patrol also needs to drive on established roads and avoid carving new ones through the wilderness, environmentalists say. The groups also are uniformly opposed to a border wall or fence, which they say would cut off wildlife migration routes.

What about the actual border-crossers, who rarely stick to the main highway?

"Of course, that's being done by crossers, too, but we can't tell crossers, 'Hey, you're breaking these laws,'" Miss Neeley said.

The blame-the-Border Patrol response exasperates agency spokesman Gus Soto, who suggests that the illegal aliens, drug smugglers and human smugglers bear greater responsibility for the damage than its officers.

"Unfortunately, they do choose to point the finger at us, but you have to remember, we're not the ones out there crossing. We're not the ones out there creating roads. We're trying to stop the smuggling industry," Mr. Soto said.

The agency has implemented a training program for its officers in environmental awareness. Officers often patrol sensitive areas via aircraft or on horseback, and they feed their horses only with seeds that are indigenous to the region.

"We don't go off-road," Mr. Soto said. "Before we do anything, we have to do an environmental-impact study to make sure it won't have a negative impact. We don't want to leave an environmental footprint in these sensitive areas."

The smugglers, on the other hand, "will cross anywhere without concern for the environment," he said. "It's the smugglers that are doing this, not the Border Patrol. We're going after the people who are causing the environmental harm."

They have their differences, but one thing both the Border Patrol and Defenders of Wildlife do agree on is that something must be done to reduce the total number of border-crossers. And that's a start.

"If we don't start reducing the total number of crossers, the problem is only going to get worse," Miss Neeley said. "And so far the environmental community really hasn't had an adequate response."

Immigration Activist Defying Ruling (AP)

By Sophia Tareen

AP, October 1, 2006

An immigration activist who took refuge in a church after the government ordered her deported to Mexico said Saturday she will remain holed up there, even though a federal judge dismissed a lawsuit filed on her behalf.

The lawsuit against the government had contended that deporting Arellano would effectively deport her son Saul, who is a U.S. citizen, and would violate his rights. U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve ruled Friday that although the 7-year-old would face hardships, they weren't of constitutional magnitude.

Arellano, 31, and her son have been living at the Adalberto United Methodist Church since mid-August.

"I want to stay here with my son," Arellano said in Spanish to reporters at the church. "I'm not just fighting for my situation. ... You can't separate families."

The Rev. Walter L. Coleman, the Adalberto pastor who sued in August on the woman's behalf, said he and Arellano are in contact with other families in similar situations and are considering filing a class-action lawsuit, he said.

Coleman said he is not concerned that federal officials will enter the church to remove Arellano.

"We fear God more than we fear Homeland Security," he said.

Arellano was to surrender to federal authorities for deportation Aug. 15 but instead sought refuge in the small church, in a heavily Puerto Rican neighborhood.

She first was arrested in 1997 soon after crossing into the United States and was sent back to Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0072287

She returned and was arrested again in 2002 and convicted of working as a cleaning woman at O'Hare International Airport under a false Social Security number.

Vegetation Obscures Markers On U.S.-Canada Border (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

HOULTON, Maine (AP) -- The United States wants to better secure its border with Canada, but it may have trouble finding it in some areas, an official with the agency that maintains the border said.

The United States and Canada have fallen so far behind on basic maintenance of their shared border that law-enforcement officials may have to search through overgrown vegetation for markers in some places, the official said.

"If you can't find it, then you can't secure it," said Dennis Schornack, the U.S. commissioner of the International Boundary Commission (IBC), the intergovernmental agency responsible for maintaining the U.S.-Canada border.

The Boeing Co. has been awarded a three-year contract to implement the first part of what could be a multibillion-dollar plan to reduce illegal entry along the 6,000 miles of border with Canada and Mexico using better technology, including cameras, sensors and even unmanned airplanes.

But commission officials say their budget of just more than $3 million is insufficient and insist that if they are not given more money to buy basic machinery to beat back the weeds, bushes and trees that threaten to overtake parts of the border, all those high-tech gadgets could prove useless.

"I've talked and talked, and we don't seem to be getting anywhere," Mr. Schornack said. "Yes, it's not glamorous. It's not high-tech. ... But if you don't get that basic job done, all I know is cameras won't work."

The 5,525-mile U.S.-Canada border cuts a 20-foot-wide swath through many wooded areas. Down the middle are monuments and markers denoting the actual border.

The agency, consisting of two commissioners (one from each country), seven field engineers and a small support staff, is responsible for surveying and maintaining more than 8,000 monuments and reference points.

The IBC has warned that it has fallen far behind in clearing fast-growing brush and trees, especially in the United States' Northeast and Northwest -- between Washington state and British Columbia, and among New England, Quebec and New Brunswick.

Mr. Schornack will meet in Washington tomorrow and Tuesday with his Canadian counterparts, high-ranking homeland security officials and members of Congress to lobby for more funding.

Canadian officials say the United States needs to contribute more money.

The United States contributed $1.43 million this fiscal year, compared with $2.2 million Canada contributed, the commission said. The U.S. contribution pales in comparison with the $33 million it is giving the International Boundary and Water Commission, which oversees maintenance of the border with Mexico. And a bill to erect a fence along the Mexican border went to President Bush on Friday.

"Some of the catch-up projects that the Americans are supposed to undertake are not being done. We're doing as much as we can with our funding, but the catch-up rate is not what it should be," said Al Arseneault, the deputy commissioner of the commission's Canadian branch.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Foley-Page E-Mails Not News To GOP (LAT)

By Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republicans knew for months that Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) was exchanging what were described as "over-friendly" e-mails with a 16-year-old former House page, they acknowledged Saturday.

Foley resigned Friday after news reports revealed that he had sent another male teenage former House page messages that were explicitly sexual. House leaders said they had not been aware of those messages.

DOJ_NMG_0072288

With midterm elections weeks away — and Democrats trying to capture the House from Republican control — GOP leaders went out of their way to condemn Foley's behavior.

"The improper communications between Rep. Mark Foley and former House congressional pages is unacceptable and abhorrent," House Republican leaders said in a statement issued late Saturday. "It is an obscene breach of trust. His immediate resignation must now be followed by the full weight of the criminal justice system."

Top House officials conceded that they had been alerted as early as last fall to concerns about Foley and his contacts with a 16-year-old former House page, but said they had discussed it with the congressman and were told that his relationship with the page was that of a mentor. They told him to cease his contacts with the page.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) reported that he was unaware that Foley had been sending sexually explicit messages until some messages to pages were leaked to the media last week. "No one was ever made aware of any sexually explicit e-mail or text messages at any time," Hastert's office said Saturday in releasing what it described as a preliminary report on his contacts in the matter.

ABC News reported Friday that it had obtained copies of instant messages to current and former male pages in which Foley made numerous explicit sexual references.

In one exchange Foley asked: "You in your boxers, too? …. Well strip down and get relaxed."

Foley resigned his seat within hours of being asked about the messages. The six-term representative, chairman of a congressional caucus on crimes against children, was the author of legislation to strengthen penalties against pedophiles and child pornographers. He was considered a lock for reelection. Now Republicans are scrambling to find a replacement candidate.

Democrats were quick to criticize the GOP leadership, with Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) demanding an Ethics Committee investigation, which the leadership agreed to.

House GOP leaders said in their statement Saturday that they were asking for a full review of the incident by the House Page Board and were creating a toll-free tip line for confidential reports of concern. They also said they had asked the Ethics Committee not only to investigate the Foley case but to promulgate rules on contacts between members of Congress and the pages.

In its preliminary report, Hastert's office said it had been told twice of concerns about Foley's e-mail contact with a former page.

The first time was last fall, when aides to Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) told Hastert's staff that Foley had been in e-mail contact with a former page whom Alexander had sponsored.

Hastert's office said it had not been told the text of the e-mails and referred Alexander to the House clerk, whose office runs the page program. Alexander's office declined to show the e-mails to the clerk, saying they wanted to protect the family's privacy, according to the Hastert statement. Alexander's staff told the clerk that the e-mails were not sexual but characterized them as "over-friendly," Hastert's office said. In the e-mails, the 52-year-old Foley asked the page how he fared in Hurricane Katrina and asked for a photograph, among other topics.

Jeff Trandahl, the clerk at the time, and Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the House Page Board, met with Foley and told him that the parents wanted Foley to "immediately cease any communication with the young man," the report said. Foley told them he was just mentoring the page.

The clerk later told Hastert's office that they had spoken with Foley and taken corrective action, according to the report.

According to Hastert's press secretary, Ron Bonjean, office staffers did not inform Hastert. But another congressman said Saturday that he had personally told Hastert months later about what had been described as "over-friendly" e-mails. (Hastert does not recall the conversation, his office's report said.)

"Rodney Alexander brought to my attention the existence of e-mails between Mark Foley and a former page of Mr. Alexander's," said Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee. "Despite the fact that I had not seen the e-mails in question, and Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, I told the [House] speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me," Reynolds said.

Hastert's report said: "While the speaker does not explicitly recall this conversation, he has no reason to dispute Congressman Reynolds' recollection that he reported to him on the problem and its resolution."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said Saturday that he had heard of the e-mails five months ago but was told the matter had been taken care of.

Boehner spokesman Kevin Madden said Alexander had approached the majority leader five months ago and told him that Foley had had an e-mail exchange with a page. The conversation "did not raise an alarm," said Madden, "because Alexander had assured him that he had talked to the parents and they did not wish to pursue it and they did not believe there was need to pursue it further."

G.O.P. Aides Knew In Late '05 Of E-Mail (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Top House Republicans knew for months about e-mail traffic between Representative Mark Foley and a former teenage page, but kept the matter secret and allowed Mr. Foley to remain head of a Congressional caucus on children's issues, Republican lawmakers said Saturday.

The exchanges began with what Republicans now describe as an "overfriendly" e-mail message from Mr. Foley to the unidentified teenager.

But news reports about the exchanges led to the disclosure of e-mail correspondence with other former pages in which the discussions became more and more sexually explicit. Shortly after he was confronted by ABC News on Friday about the subject, Mr. Foley, who represented a south Florida district, resigned from the House.

The revelations set off a political upheaval, with Democrats and some Republicans calling for a full investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct and whether House leaders did enough to look into it. Members of the Republican leadership sought Saturday to detail how they had handled the case in an effort to defuse the situation, even as it was emerging as an issue in Congressional races.

Among those who became aware earlier this year of the fall 2005 communications between Mr. Foley and the 16-year-old page, who worked for Representative Rodney Alexander, Republican of Louisiana, were Representative John A. Boehner, the majority leader, and Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee. Mr. Reynolds said in a statement Saturday that he had also personally raised the issue with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert.

"Despite the fact that I had not seen the e-mails in question, and Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, I told the speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me," Mr. Reynolds said.

In a chronology of the episode released later on Saturday, the speaker's office said Mr. Hastert did not recall any such discussion and had no previous knowledge of the matter. "While the speaker does not explicitly recall this conversation, he has no reason to dispute Congressman Reynolds' recollection that he reported to him on the problem and its resolution," the statement said.

The statement, issued after senior aides, the House clerk and legal advisers huddled for much of Saturday in the Capitol, said senior staff members in the speaker's office first learned of the e-mail messages from Mr. Alexander's office in the fall of 2005 and took steps to investigate.

Aides to the speaker and other Congressional Republican leaders said the messages, which an Alexander aide described to them as "overfriendly," were much less explicit than the others that came to light after ABC News first disclosed the e-mail correspondence with Mr. Alexander's page. The aides said Mr. Alexander's office, at the request of the page's family, did not show them copies of the messages. In those messages, sent after Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Foley asked about the well-being of the boy, a Monroe, La., resident. He wrote: "How are you weathering the hurricane. . .are you safe. . .send me a pic of you as well." The page sent the note to a former colleague, describing it as "sick."

In another message, Mr. Foley wrote, "What do you want for your birthday coming up. . .what stuff do you like to do."

The e-mail exchanges that came to light after the first news reports were far more graphic. When he was confronted about them on Friday, Mr. Foley resigned. Republican leaders said they had not known about the other e-mail correspondence.

"No one in the speaker's office was made aware of the sexually explicit text messages which press reports suggest had been directed to another individual until they were revealed in the press and on the Internet this week," the statement from Mr. Hastert's office said.

Both Republican and Democratic lawmakers said Saturday that Congress and the public deserved a full report on Mr. Foley's dealings with the pages, who are high school students who serve as runners and perform other duties. The lawmakers said there should also be an inquiry into the leadership's knowledge of his activities and its response.

"Anyone who was involved in the chain of information should come forward and tell when they were told, what they were told and what they did with the information when they got it," said Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York. Mr. King called it a "dark day" for Congress and said, "We need a full investigation."

Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, said any leader who had been aware of Mr. Foley's behavior and failed to take action should step down. "If they knew or should have known the extent of this problem, they should not serve in leadership," Mr. Shays said.

On Saturday night, the House Republican leadership issued a statement that characterized the communications between Mr. Foley and the former House pages as "unacceptable and abhorrent."

"It is an obscene breach of trust," the statement said. "His immediate resignation must now be followed by the full weight of the criminal justice system."

The statement, from Mr. Hastert, Mr. Boehner and the majority whip, Roy Blunt, asked the board that oversees pages "to undertake a full review of the incident and propose additional safeguard measures."

The leaders also said they had asked for specific rules governing the communications and contacts between pages and lawmakers and called for creation of a toll-free number for pages and their parents to report concerns.

Besides the leaders, other lawmakers and Congressional officers who served on the board that oversaw the page program were aware of the e-mail messages, though the Democratic lawmaker who serves on the board, Representative Dale E. Kildee of Michigan, said Saturday that he had never been informed.

According to lawmakers and the speaker's office, the page who received the e-mail forwarded the one in which Mr. Foley, 52, asked for his picture, to a colleague in Mr. Alexander's office, repeatedly calling it "sick" and saying it "freaked me out."

Mr. Alexander called the boy's parents, who, Republican leaders said Saturday, told him they did not want to pursue the matter but wanted Mr. Foley to stop.

Mr. Alexander's office also contacted staff members in Mr. Hastert's office for guidance on what to do and, according to the speaker's account, his aides put Mr. Alexander's staff in contact with the clerk of the House, who oversees the page program. The clerk, who at the time was Jeff Trandahl, referred the matter to Representative John Shimkus, the Illinois Republican who is the chairman of the House Page Board, in late 2005, a spokesman for Mr. Shimkus said.

Mr. Trandahl and Mr. Shimkus confronted Mr. Foley, who insisted he was simply acting as a mentor to the former page, officials said. He assured them nothing inappropriate had occurred.

"They asked Foley about the e-mail," the speaker's statement said. "Congressman Shimkus and the clerk made it clear that to avoid even the appearance of impropriety and at the request of the parents, Congressman Foley was to immediately cease any communication with the young man."

The leadership had other possible avenues for investigating the e-mail messages beyond questioning Mr. Foley, including an inquiry by the ethics committee or even the Capitol police. But aides said that while the contents of the messages are disturbing in hindsight, they did not set off alarms initially.

On Saturday, Mr. Shimkus' spokesman, Steve Tomaszewski, said, "Obviously Foley lied about the other e-mails."

Mr. Tomaszewski said Mr. Shimkus would not comment on any other conversations he had with House leaders about the matter because it was referred to the ethics committee by a vote of the House on Friday. A spokesman for Mr. Alexander did not respond to telephone and e-mail messages.

DOJ_NMG_0072291

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Mr. Boehner, said Saturday that Mr. Boehner had had a "brief, nonspecific" conversation about the subject with Mr. Alexander in the spring but that he could not recall with certainty whether he had discussed it with other leaders.

Democrats moved quickly to criticize Mr. Reynolds, who while overseeing House campaigns nationally is facing the potential of a serious challenge from Jack Davis, a wealthy businessman who has vowed to spend at least $2 million of his own money in the contest. "Tom Reynolds had a moral obligation to protect our children," said Curtis Ellis, a spokesman for Mr. Davis.

Carl Forti, a spokesman for Mr. Reynolds, said the congressman became aware of contact between Mr. Foley and the young page this past spring, when Mr. Alexander brought it to his attention. Mr. Forti said that Mr. Alexander had told Mr. Reynolds of an e-mail exchange between Mr. Foley and the page, but that he did not show Mr. Reynolds the e-mail messages and their contents.

Strategists for both parties said it was too early to tell what impact the episode might have on Congressional elections now five weeks away but said at a minimum it could lower the already dismal public view of incumbents and discourage conservative voters.

It directly affected the race for the seat of Mr. Foley — the third Republican to resign this year under a cloud. Tim Mahoney, the Democrat who had been running an uphill and barely watched race against Mr. Foley, used the new attention to his campaign on Saturday to accuse the Republican leadership of covering up for him.

"It's now clear from all the reports coming in from across the country that the Republican leadership team has been well aware of this problem with the pages for well over a year," Mr. Mahoney said at a campaign stop at Palm Beach International Airport. "It looks to me that it was more important to hold onto a seat and to hold onto power than to take care of our children."

At the Justice Department, an official said that no investigation was under way but that the agency had "real interest" in examining the circumstances to see if any crimes were committed.

Several of Mr. Foley's former colleagues demanded a criminal inquiry.

Representative Robert E. Cramer, an Alabama Democrat who was co-chairman with Mr. Foley of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, condemned Mr. Foley's actions as "shocking and disturbing."

"Anyone, including Foley, involved in this type of behavior should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law," Mr. Cramer said.

GOP Leader Rebuts Hastert On Foley (WP)

Reynolds: Speaker Knew of E-Mails in Spring

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) was notified early this year of inappropriate e-mails from former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to a 16-year-old page, a top GOP House member said yesterday -- contradicting the speaker's assertions that he learned of concerns about Foley only last week.

Hastert did not dispute the claims of Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), and his office confirmed that some of Hastert's top aides knew last year that Foley had been ordered to cease contact with the boy and to treat all pages respectfully.

Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, became the second senior House Republican to say that Hastert has known of Foley's contacts for months, prompting Democratic attacks about the GOP leadership's inaction. Foley abruptly resigned his seat Friday.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) told The Washington Post on Friday that he had learned in late spring of inappropriate e-mails Foley sent to the page, a boy from Louisiana, and that he promptly told Hastert, who appeared to know already of the concerns. Hours later, Boehner contacted The Post to say he could not be sure he had spoken with Hastert.

Yesterday's developments revealed a rift at the highest echelons of House Republican ranks a month before the Nov. 7 elections, and they threatened to expand the scandal to a full-blown party dilemma.

Only after Reynolds's definitive statement did Hastert concede yesterday that he may have been notified of some of the questionable activities of Foley, 52, who had co-chaired the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus. Hastert said, however, that he knew nothing of the sexually explicit instant messages that became public Friday when ABC News and other news outlets reported them. The messages apparently were exchanged with youths other than the 16-year-old.

Hastert's aides learned in the fall of 2005 only of e-mail exchanges that House officials eventually deemed "over-friendly" with the Louisiana teenager, the speaker's office said yesterday in a lengthy statement. "While the Speaker does not explicitly recall this conversation" with Reynolds, the statement said, "he has no reason to dispute Congressman Reynolds's recollection that he reported to him on the problem and its resolution."

Boehner and Reynolds said their offices learned of the Foley e-mails months ago from Rep. Rodney Alexander (R), who sponsored the page from his northeastern-Louisiana district.

"Rodney Alexander brought to my attention the existence of the e-mails between Mark Foley and a former page of Mr. Alexander's," Reynolds said yesterday. "Despite the fact that I had not seen the e-mails in question, and Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, I told the speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me."

GOP leaders have said they referred the matter promptly to Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), who heads a three-lawmaker panel that oversees the House page program.

Shimkus questioned Foley, but at that time, he had seen only suspiciously friendly e-mails, not the explicit instant messages revealed recently. In one e-mail to the former page, for example, Foley asked for a picture of him. The boy reportedly told an associate that he considered the request to be "sick," but Foley convinced Shimkus that the exchanges were innocent, Shimkus and Republican leaders said.

Republicans appeared to have kept the matter under wraps. Rep. Dale E. Kildee (Mich.), the only Democrat on the House Page Board, said yesterday: "I was never informed of the allegations about Mr. Foley's inappropriate communications with a House page, and I was never involved in any inquiry into this matter."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, questioned yesterday why Alexander had gone to the House Republicans' chief political operative, rather than to other party leaders. "That's to protect a member, not to protect a child," Emanuel said.

With his statement, Reynolds, who is locked in a difficult reelection campaign, signaled he was unwilling to take the fall alone amid partisan attacks that were becoming increasingly vituperative. The Democratic National Committee yesterday issued a statement asking "Why Did Tom Reynolds Cover Up Congressman's Sex Crimes?" It continued: "While the shocking [online] exchanges produced an immediate uproar that cost Congressman Foley his job, at least one member of the House Republican leadership had known about the situation for months and did nothing about it: . . . Reynolds."

Republican insiders said Reynolds spoke out because he was angry that Hastert appeared willing to let him take the blame for the party leadership's silence.

A House GOP leadership aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of losing his job, said that Reynolds realizes he has taken a shot at his leader but that it is understandable.

"This is what happens when one member tries to throw another member under a bus," the aide said.

Last night, Hastert, Boehner and Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said in a statement that Foley's communications with former pages are "unacceptable and abhorrent," and that his resignation "must now be followed by the full weight of the criminal justice system." The statement did not suggest how that might happen, but added that the three have "asked for the creation of a toll-free telephone number for House pages, parents, grandparents and staff to confidentially report incidents of concern."

The House clerk's office "has taken possession of Congressman Foley's office, and Capitol police officers have been posted in front of his office around-the-clock" to preserve Foley's records and correspondence, said Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean.

Foley's actions have jeopardized a House seat that Republicans had considered safe this fall. Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) headlined a fundraiser yesterday for the district's Democratic nominee, Tim Mahoney, whose race has rocketed to national prominence with Foley's resignation. Charlie Cook, editor of a nonpartisan newsletter that tracks congressional races, said that if Foley's name stays on the ballot, "it's going to be hard for Republicans to hold on to the seat." But a GOP loss might last only two years, he said, since the district typically votes Republican in presidential races.

The chronology released by Hastert's office begins in late 2005, after Alexander had alerted colleagues of Foley's e-mail exchanges with the former page, who had returned to Louisiana. Hastert aide Tim Kennedy "immediately discussed the matter with his supervisor, Mike Stokke, Speaker Hastert's Deputy Chief of Staff," the statement says. Also brought into the talks were Hastert's staff attorney, Ted Van Der Meid, and the House clerk.

The clerk and Shimkus "immediately met with Foley to discuss the matter," the chronology says, and they told Foley "to immediately cease any communication with the young man. . . . Mindful of the sensitivity to the parents' wishes to protect their child's privacy and believing that they had promptly reported what they knew to the proper authorities," it says, "Kennedy, Van Der Meid and Stokke did not discuss the matter with others in the Speaker's Office."

Republicans fear the scandal, coming in the wake of indictments of three GOP congressmen this year, might add to the public's unrest at the party's image and conduct, and some House members yesterday joined in the chorus of dismay and scorn.

"I don't think it will be just conservative voters that will shake their heads when they hear about this," said Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.).

"As the author of laws designed to protect children on the Internet, I was appalled at the recent revelations that a member of Congress engaged in reprehensible behavior toward young people connected to the congressional page program," said Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.). "Congress should thoroughly investigate this matter and, in cooperation with law enforcement authorities, support all proper legal action."

Rich Galen, a Republican political strategist, worried that voters might lump Foley's name with former representatives Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), all of whom were forced to resign or were indicted amid various scandals this year.

"This sense of entitlement that members of Congress can do anything to anyone or for anyone has got to end," Galen said.

GOP Leaders Knew Of Foley E-mail In '05 (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, October 1, 2006

Rep. Thomas Reynolds, head of the House Republican election effort, said Saturday he told Speaker Dennis Hastert months ago about concerns that a fellow GOP lawmaker had sent inappropriate messages to a teenage boy. Hastert's office said aides referred the matter to the proper authorities last fall but they were only told the messages were "over-friendly."

Reynolds, R-N.Y., was told about e-mails sent by Rep. Mark Foley and is now defending himself from Democratic accusations that he did too little. Foley, R-Fla., resigned Friday after ABC News questioned him about the e-mails to a former congressional page and about sexually suggestive instant messages to other pages.

"The improper communications between Congressman Mark Foley and former House Congressional pages is unacceptable and abhorrent. It is an obscene breach of trust," Hastert, R-Ill., Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., said in a written statement Saturday evening. "His immediate resignation must now be followed by the full weight of the criminal justice system."

The House leaders said it is their duty to ensure House pages are safe. They said they are creating a toll-free hot line for pages and their families to call to confidentially report any incidents, and will consider adopting new rules on communications between lawmakers and pages.

The boy who received the e-mails was 16 in the summer of 2005 when he worked in Congress as a page. After the boy returned to his Louisiana home, the congressman e-mailed him. The teenager thought the messages were inappropriate, particularly one in which Foley asked the teen to send a picture of himself.

The teen's family contacted their congressman, Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., who then discussed the problem with Reynolds sometime this spring.

"Rodney Alexander brought to my attention the existence of e-mails between Mark Foley and a former page of Mr. Alexander's," Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said in a written statement Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0072294

"Despite the fact that I had not seen the e-mails in question, and Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, I told the speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me," Reynolds said.

Hastert said he does not remember talking to Reynolds about the Foley e-mails, but did not dispute Reynolds' account.

"While the speaker does not explicitly recall this conversation, he has no reason to dispute Congressman Reynolds' recollection that he reported to him on the problem and its resolution," Hastert's aides said in a preliminary report on the matter issued Saturday.

On Friday night, Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said the top House Republican had not known about the allegations.

Saturday's report includes a lengthy timeline detailing when they first learned of the worrisome e-mail in the fall of 2005, after a staffer for Alexander told Hastert's office the family wanted Foley to stop contacting their son. Alexander's staffer did not share the contents of the e-mail, saying it was not sexual but "over-friendly," the report says.

Hastert's aides referred the matter to the Clerk of the House, and "mindful of the sensitivity of the parent's wishes to protect their child's privacy and believing that they had promptly reported what they knew to the proper authorities," they did not discuss it with others in Hastert's office — including, apparently, their boss.

After the issue was referred to the clerk, it was passed along to the congressman who oversees the page program, Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill.

Shimkus has said he learned about the e-mail exchange in late 2005 and took immediate action to investigate.

He said Foley told him it was an innocent exchange. Shimkus said he warned Foley not to have any more contact with the teenager and to respect other pages.

Democrats charged Reynolds did far too little and said more digging should be done.

"Congressman Reynolds' inaction in the face of such a serious situation is very troubling, and raises important questions about whether there was an attempt to cover up criminal activity involving a minor to keep it from coming to light before Election Day," said Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Karen Finney.

New York Democrats hoping to unseat Reynolds blasted the congressman, saying they call into question the Republican's values.

"Mr. Reynolds knew about these allegedly inappropriate e-mails from a fellow congressman to a minor for months and didn't lift a finger," said Blake Zeff, a spokesman for the state Democrats.

Shimkus Approached Foley About Early E-mails (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON Last year, the House clerk grabbed Rep. John Shimkus off the floor during a vote and said they needed to talk.

It wasn't unusual for the clerk at that time, Jeff Trandahl, to catch Shimkus, in the hallway or on the House floor, since together they oversaw the House page program and often had items to discuss.

This time, though, Trandahl had in his hand an email exchange between one of the House pages, a 16-year-old boy, and Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla.

Shimkus, who serves as board chairman for the House page program, read the emails, in which Foley asked about the boy's well-being in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, what he wanted for his birthday, and for a photograph. (The boy was from Louisiana and had returned to his home state.)

Although there was nothing sexually suggestive in the emails, Shimkus and Trandal agreed: "That was enough for us to approach Mark," Shimkus recalled an interview Saturday.

Soon after, they met with Foley and his chief of staff in the Florida congressman's office. "We basically said, 'We got these emails. And we don't think this is appropriate. ... You have to stop (contacting this boy)'," Shimkus said.

DOJ_NMG_0072295

Shimkus said Foley told them, "'When I was a young person, an adult became my mentor inspired me to be a congressman and that's all I'm doing'." Foley said if he was guilty of anything, Shimkus recalled, it was of being "overly friendly."

As Shimkus and the rest of his House colleagues now know, "He lied to me. He lied to the former clerk."

Foley announced his resignation Friday after ABC News reported that he had indeed sent sexually explicit emails to other male pages.

Shimkus said he believes he handled the situation as best he could, given the information he had at the time. He said he didn't tell any other lawmakers about the incident, even other page board members, because he thought it had been addressed sufficiently.

He said he never learned, until Friday, about the other more explicit messages Foley sent, Shimkus said.

"My evaluation was there's no smoking gun here," he said. "At the time, that email had no significance ... other than 'Mark stay away from this kid, this doesn't look good'."

Shimkus added: "I think based on the information I had, what I did was fine. If I regret something maybe I should have had Dale (Kildee, a Democratic board member and congressmen from Michigan) with me because now it's going to be a political football.

In the midst of the continuing swirl of the scandal last night, Shimkus and another board member visited the pages and apologized to them. Just a few days earlier, Shimkus had "read them the riot act" about behaving properly while in the program. On Friday, he told them, "I'm embarrassed I'm ashamed. This lecture I gave you I should give to my colleagues."

He urged them to contact him or another adult supervisor if they ever felt uncomfortable or were concerned about the behavior of House members, staff, or others. Shimkkus said he's not sure what steps, if any, the board could take to prevent this kind of incident again.

"Our responsibility is to make sure the kids are as safe in D.C. as they are at home. And you know what? They are," he said. "These kids are incredibly watched after and monitored, as well as any kids can be monitored."

As for his former colleague Foley, he said: "I imagine Mark really is a sick man who has really harmed himself and harmed the institution. Because of that I'm sure I'll be dealing with this for a while."

Democrats See Chance In Foley's District (AP)

By Brendan Farrington

AP, October 1, 2006

Democratic candidate Tim Mahoney seized the opportunity created by scandal and criticized GOP leaders Saturday for not fully investigating Rep. Mark Foley when his raunchy communications with a teenage boy came to light about a year ago.

Foley resigned Friday after revelations that he exchanged explicit electronic messages with the 16-year-old boy, a former congressional page, sending the Florida GOP scrambling for a replacement candidate less than six weeks before the election.

Mahoney, who until two days ago was the underdog in the race for Foley's seat, said Republican leaders should have fully investigated at the time. Pages are high school students who attend classes under congressional supervision and work as messengers.

"It looks to me that it was more important to hold onto a seat and to hold onto power than to take care of our children," Mahoney said. "I think that's wrong. I think that's what's wrong with Washington."

The House Page Board investigated the allegations late last year, but Foley was not honest when he denied improper conduct with the teenager, the committee's leader, Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois, has said.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York, head of the House Republican election effort, said Saturday that he told Speaker Dennis Hastert months ago about the e-mail concerns. Hastert's office said aides referred the matter to proper authorities last fall but were told the messages were only "over-friendly."

House leaders, including Hastert, said their duty is to ensure that pages are safe. They said they are creating a toll-free hot line for pages and their families to call to confidentially report any incidents and will consider adopting new rules on communications between lawmakers and pages.

DOJ_NMG_0072296

Mahoney, a millionaire financial services executive who switched parties last year before entering the race, campaigned Saturday with Sen. John Kerry.

The Massachusetts senator was in the state to raise money for Democratic congressional candidates and party gubernatorial nominee Jim Davis. About Foley, he said, "It speaks for itself. Every parent in America is disgusted and disturbed by it."

Foley, R-Fla., who is single, apologized Friday for letting down his family and constituents. Hours after his resignation, Foley's former colleagues engineered a vote to let the House ethics committee decide whether an investigation is needed.

In Florida, Democrats found themselves suddenly competitive in a district where Foley, 52, had been considered a shoo-in.

His resignation further complicates the political landscape for Republicans, who are fighting to retain control of Congress. Democrats need to win a net of 15 Republican seats to regain the power they lost in 1994.

Florida Republican officials on Saturday were still discussing the procedure to replace Foley as a candidate in the South Florida district, which President Bush won with 55 percent of the vote in 2004 and is now in play for November.

Though Florida ballots have already been printed with Foley's name and cannot be changed, any votes for Foley will count toward the party's choice.

State Rep. Joe Negron has been mentioned as a possible candidate. He would enter the race with several hundred thousand dollars left over from an attorney general campaign that he ended to avoid a primary with former U.S. Rep. Bill McCollum.

"Tim Mahoney is spending his afternoon hanging out with John Kerry in Palm Beach County, and I think most voters in District 16 don't want a John Kerry Democrat representing them in Congress," Negron said. He said he has received the backing of many state Republican executive board members.

Foley, who represented an area around Palm Beach County and was chairman of the Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus, had introduced legislation in July to protect children from exploitation by adults over the Internet. He also sponsored other legislation designed to protect minors from abuse and neglect.

Foley e-mailed the page in August 2005. The boy was 16 at the time. Foley asked him how he was doing after Hurricane Katrina and what he wanted for his birthday. The congressman also asked the boy to send a photo of himself, according to excerpts of the e-mails that were originally released by ABC News.

ABC News reported Friday that Foley also engaged in a series of sexually explicit instant messages with current and former pages, all male.

House Republican Leaders Admit They Knew About Foley E-mails For Months (FLSUNSEN)

By William E. Gibson And Josh Hafenbrack

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 1, 2006

U.S. Rep. Mark Foley's sudden resignation from Congress sparked a political firestorm on Saturday when Democrats accused House Republicans of failing to respond to initial reports of his sexually suggestive e-mails to a congressional page.

The House voted late Friday to turn the matter over to the Ethics Committee before Congress adjourned for the fall election campaign season, hours after House leaders acknowledged they had known about the e-mails for months.

In Washington and Palm Beach County, Democrats tried to broaden the sex scandal by condemning an alleged cover-up by the House majority.

"It's made more outrageous by the fact that Republican leaders knew about it a year ago and kept it a secret to protect their political lives instead of protecting the lives of pages," U.S. Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, D-Weston, said during a news conference at Palm Beach International Airport.

Wasserman Schultz and former presidential candidate John Kerry seized on Foley's resignation and apology while campaigning for Tim Mahoney, the Democrat running for Foley's former seat. "I think every parent in America was disgusted and disturbed by it," said Sen. Kerry, D-Mass., who had planned the fundraising trip before Foley's resignation on Friday.

Foley's apology and resignation six weeks before the Nov. 7 elections has turned the campaign for his seat into one of the most contentious and closely watched congressional races in the nation.

Before the resignation, election forecasters had considered Florida's 16th District relatively safe for Republicans despite Mahoney's spirited campaign. Foley, a popular and well-funded incumbent, seemed almost invincible.

Suddenly Democrats have the advantage in that race, putting the 16th District in the middle of a titanic nationwide struggle for majority control of the House.

South Florida Republicans scrambled to contain the damage but acknowledged that the once-safe seat is vulnerable.

"It's going to be very much of an uphill battle," said Palm Beach County Commissioner Mary McCarty. "I think a big question is going to be, who in Washington knew this was going on, and what did they do about it? I'm certainly hoping anybody that knew about this turned this over to the proper authorities at the right time. If it was common knowledge, why was it allowed to go on?"

House Republican leaders have acknowledged hearing complaints last November about suspicious e-mails from Foley to a 16-year-old former page but took no action at the request of the boy's parents.

When news about the e-mails was reported last week, Foley abruptly resigned. Around midnight Friday, just before taking a break for the election campaigns, House leaders pushed through a vote to turn the matter over to the House ethics committee.

Republican leaders in District 16, which includes parts of eight counties, plan to meet this week to pick a new candidate. State Rep. Joe Negron, R-Stuart, appears to be the leading candidate.

Negron says he has $1 million of cash on hand from his abandoned run for attorney general. That money can't be transferred into a federal account, but Negron said he would lean on many of the same supporters and had already received numerous calls from would-be donors.

Palm Beach County Republican Party Chairman Sid Dinerstein said Foley's name on the ballot makes for an awkward campaign, and he's not sure if the new Republican candidate can overcome it.

"If there's a piece of luck in this thing on our side, it's Joe Negron," Dinerstein said. "He has the ability to raise money. He has name recognition. He's a wonderful person; the guy has no negatives. If the voters are just not able to punch the Foley name, we would understand."

Florida Republican Party spokesman Jeff Sadosky wouldn't say when the party will pick a new candidate, or if the GOP will mount a challenge to get Foleys' name off the ballot yet. "Right now, we're talking with our legal team to figure out the best course of action," he said.

Political analysts who track elections across the country say Democrats this year are poised to gain just enough seats to seize majority control, making each close race potentially pivotal.

"It's a likely Democratic pickup now," said Alan Abramowitz, a political scientist at Emory University. "That's a seat very likely to flip. Every seat is crucial now, so that's a big one."

Democrats need to gain 15 House seats to hold the majority, which would allow them to control the agenda, lead every committee and bring legislation to the floor for votes.

The opposition party would then be in position to promote its own causes, stymie President Bush's policies and investigate administration practices. The balance of power in Washington would shift closer to the middle of the political spectrum after two decades of conservative Republican dominance.

Foley's former seat becomes one of about three dozen in contention, including a close race in Florida's 22nd District, where Republican Rep. Clay Shaw of Fort Lauderdale is struggling to fend off Democrat Ron Klein, a state senator from Boca Raton.

Democrats now appear likely to gain between 13 and 20 House seats, said Richard Semiatin, a political scientist at American University in Washington who tracks House races.

In the post World War II era, Democrats controlled the House for four decades before losing it in the momentous 1994 election, which brought Foley into office along with 53 other Republican freshmen.

Once an embodiment of the "Republican Revolution," Foley in this year's elections has added to his party's woes.

Foley Built Career As Protector Of Children (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

He Gained Attention by Fighting Sex Crimes

The Republican congressman who resigned Friday following the discovery of sexually explicit Internet messages he sent to teenage boys was a gregarious and charismatic lawmaker who built his political career in large measure on legislative proposals meant to halt the sexual predation of children and others.

Beginning with his 1993 sponsorship of a measure in the Florida state legislature to seize the cars of men who solicited prostitutes, former restaurant owner and real estate agent Mark Foley repeatedly attracted a flattering political spotlight by inveighing against those involved in sexual crimes and presenting himself as a protector of exploited children.

A well-liked member of the class of conservatives elected to Congress in 1994, Foley was until two days ago a deputy whip for the House Republicans and a co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus. A Web site for the bipartisan group states that it was formed to "create a voice within Congress" on that issue and to operate a hotline for tips about "online child sexual exploitation" that could be passed to law enforcement agencies.

At a White House Rose Garden ceremony on July 27, President Bush hailed Foley and some other House and Senate lawmakers as members of a "SWAT team for kids." Bush spoke while signing into law a broad child protection measure that included a Foley-sponsored provision requiring sex offenders to register in every state where they live, work or attend school.

Foley's abrupt exit from Capitol Hill on Friday, shortly after ABC News journalists confronted him with excerpts of his Internet messages to male youths, stunned his congressional staff. They had dismissed an ABC report earlier last week about e-mails Foley, 52, sent to an underage, male House page as an exaggerated report stemming from an innocent attempt to be friendly.

Foley was not the target of any official investigation before his resignation, and he said in a three-sentence letter on Friday that "I am deeply sorry and I apologize for letting down my family and the people of Florida."

"No one saw the extent of this," said a former aide who said he has been in contact with Foley's congressional staff members since the resignation and who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter. "You do that kind of stuff in the shadows."

Born in Boston into a devout Catholic family, Foley moved to south-central Florida and dropped out of a community college at age 20 to open with his mother a restaurant called Lettuce Patch, according to the Almanac of American Politics and CQ's Politics in America. He entered politics three years later as a commissioner for Lake Worth, a coastal town south of wealthy Palm Beach, starting as Democrat but switching parties in the 1980s.

The political cause of exploited children has long been a Republican favorite, and several of his staff members had strong feelings about its importance, according to several sources familiar with Foley's work. They said he saw the topic as a platform for attracting national attention and winning frequent appearances on cable talk shows, where he described sex offenders as "animals" who will persist "unless stopped."

"He loved the attention," a former aide said.

Foley recalled earlier this month that "I was in my mid-twenties" when Adam Walsh, 10, was kidnapped from his home in a nearby Florida community, assaulted, and killed in 1981, a crime that attracted national attention. "I remember that the case startled me. . . . It described the end of innocence for South Florida."

In 1998, he sponsored legislation allowing the Boy Scouts and other volunteer groups to get access to an FBI criminal database so they could weed out child predators. In 2003, he pressed Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) to investigate a nudist camp for teenagers, noting that "I have been fighting for years to eliminate both child pornography and so-called exploitive child modeling Web sites."

During the congressional debate in 1998 over President Bill Clinton's affair with a White House intern, Foley called Clinton's actions vile and told the St. Petersburg Times that "it's more sad than anything else, to see someone with such potential throw it all down the drain because of a sexual addiction."

While campaigning for a Senate nomination in 2003, Foley, who is single, was asked whether he was gay, and deflected the question as a matter of personal privacy before dropping out of the race.

DOJ_NMG_0072299

Legislating, he told National Public Radio on June 29, "is not necessarily just trying to brand people or create a scarlet letter or subject them to unnecessary ridicule, but it's really to set a bar and a standard by which they then decide, 'I better get help professionally,' 'I better go and see how I can deal with this problem,' or, 'I should absolutely avoid contact with young people in order to ensure I don't fall into this very serious problem.' Hitting A Self-Destruct Button (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON

POLITICS incubates all manner of gaffe, scandal and humiliation, and then there are those rarified doozies that become classics at I.M. speed.

Hello, Representative Mark Foley, here's your special membership pin and thanks for joining Washington's "What On Earth Was He Thinking?" Caucus.

The illustrious club includes a special "Sex Scandal" subcaucus that features, among others, Wilbur Mills (D-Tidal Basin), Gary Hart (D-Monkey Business), Bob Packwood (R-Senate Elevators) and, of course, Bill Clinton (D-Oval Office).

Mr. Foley, the six-term Republican from Florida, gained slam-dunk admission Friday when he resigned from Congress and apologized to his family and the people of his state over reports that he sent sexually explicit messages to underage male pages.

Note the inclusion of the terms "sexually explicit," "underage," "male" and "page," in addition to the tidbits tidily extracted from the instant messages that ABC News reported were exchanged between Mr. Foley and his 16-year old, er, friend:

"Do I make you a little horny?" Mr. Foley reportedly asked under the log-in name "Maf54."

Teen: "A little."

Maf54: "Cool."

Mr. Foley gets double bonus points for his helpful if imprudent use of electronic mail, which made it so easy to spread around the mirth and amusement and — oops, scratch that, we mean genuine sadness and compassion. This is Washington, after all.

The exchange was quoted verbatim in the lead story of ABC's "World News Tonight" Friday and linked in its entirety on ABC's Web site under the heading of "READER DISCRETION STRONGLY ADVISED: Foley's Exchange With Underage Page."

Career-ender, in other words. At least until Mr. Foley does his confessional interview on Oprah, gets his very own talk-show ("Mark!") and secures the requisite seven-figure book advance. The book would divulge all the sordid details, except that it's hard to imagine things getting any more sordid than what's already on the Internet. The snippet quoted above is just the PG-13 teaser.

The "Sex Scandal" club is only one subcaucus in the big tent of Washington infamy and shame. There is also the "Blatant Financial Improprieties" subcaucus (with the guest star Duke Cunningham), the "Ill-Advised Nazi Comparison" subcaucus (Howdy, Senator Dick Durbin) and the "Racially Insensitive Remark Directly Into a Video Camera" ("You're an animal, George Allen").

But the sex subcaucus is easily the biggest.

"You always seem to have politicians doing bizarrely self-destructive things, especially involving sex," says Lawrence Kestenbaum, creator of "Political Graveyard," a history Web site that includes an exhaustive cataloging of transgressions by politicians.

Under the heading "Politicians Who Were Ever in Trouble or Disgrace," the section contains 420 entries, in chronological order, many of them involving present and former members of Congress. Among the escapades:

• Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, was reprimanded when it was revealed that a male lover had been running a prostitution business out of his Capitol Hill apartment.

• Donald (Buz) Lukens, Republican of Ohio, who was convicted of a misdemeanor for having sex with a 16-year-old girl.

• Dan Crane, Republican of Illinois, and Gerry Studds, Democrat of Massachusetts, both of whom were censured by the House for having sexual relations with teenage pages — Mr. Crane with a female in 1980, Mr. Studds with a male in 1973.

DOJ_NMG_0072300

The "Politicians Who Were Ever in Trouble or Disgrace" section comes with the devastatingly simple disclaimer "Very Incomplete!"

Mr. Kestenbaum says improprieties in the political realm tend to resonate more than in others. First, they tend to become public, necessitating apologies and, in many cases, resignations. He points out that if Mr. Foley were a purchasing manager at some store, he might actually keep his job.

"The political world tends to be very judgmental," Mr. Kestenbaum says. This creates towering spectacles of dishonesty, famous last words that are often caught on tape. Mr. Clinton created the gold standard for this when he looked into a camera and indignantly declared, "I did not have sexual relations with that woman, Miss Lewinsky."

Mr. Foley gets triple bonus points for hypocrisy. As co-chairman of the House caucus on missing and exploited children, he has been a fierce advocate for tough sanctions against people who sexually exploit children over the Internet. Not that Democrats have been pointing this out relentlessly since the news broke or anything.

Or reminding people that Mr. Foley was a big supporter of President Clinton's impeachment.

"Part of his thing was, 'What do we tell the children?'" recalls the longtime Clinton aide Paul Begala. "Apparently, we'll tell them in a sexually explicit e-mail."

Gleeful, anyone? It's unclear exactly where this fits in, but any story about politicians and sex scandals feels incomplete without the iconic quote from Edwin Edwards, the rascally former governor of Louisiana: "The only way I can lose this election," Mr. Edwards once boasted to reporters, "is if I'm caught in bed with either a dead girl or a live boy."

He said nothing about instant messaging, however.

House's Program For Teenagers Is No Stranger To Scandal (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — The last time a scandal involving Congressional pages unfolded in the House of Representatives, a commission reviewing the matter reached a conclusion: those serving in the blue-coated gofer positions must be at least 16.

It was 1982, when Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., Democrat of Massachusetts and the House speaker, appointed a panel to review accusations that two congressmen had sexual relationships with teenage pages. Before the case was closed, the Justice Department had begun its own investigation and a yearlong House ethics probe concluded with the censure of a Republican and a Democratic representative.

The page program, a storied part of official Washington since 1829 and whose alumni include sitting members of Congress, is again at the center of a political controversy, as the fallout continued on Saturday from the resignation of Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois, has ordered a fresh review of the program allowing high school students to work as messengers on Capitol Hill.

Congressional pages arrive in Washington from across the country, sponsored by their local representative or senator, in a highly competitive program that attracts thousands of applicants. In navy blazers and pressed white shirts, about 100 young men and women not only answer telephones, deliver documents and run errands for members of Congress, but they also have a ringside seat to internal workings of the House and Senate.

Now, their education includes a possible scandal revolving around sexually explicit Internet and cellphone messages between Mr. Foley, 52, and a 16-year-old former page from Louisiana.

Two decades ago, the page program was nearly discontinued after accusations of sexual misconduct and drug use. But a Congressional panel concluded: "We feel the pages received a bum rap from the highly publicized scandal."

Representatives Daniel B. Crane, Republican of Illinois, and Gerry E. Studds, Democrat of Massachusetts, were formally censured by the House in the sex scandal. On July 20, 1983, the two were required to stand in the well of the House chamber and listen to the charges against them, which they did not dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0072301

Mr. Crane, who lost his bid for re-election, was censured for having had sexual relations with a 17-year-old female House page. Mr. Studds, who went on to serve in the House until January 1997, was censured for having had sexual relations with a 17-year-old male page on a trip to Europe during a summer Congressional recess.

In the aftermath of the scandal, the minimum age for pages was raised to 16 from 14. Tighter supervision measures were put in place, including a dormitory just blocks from the Capitol, where pages are required to live and attend classes.

Lawmakers moved to create the Page Board, a bipartisan panel that oversees the program.

Representative John Shimkus, a Republican from Illinois who heads the five-member board, had been looking into the case against Mr. Foley. But he kept the matter closely held.

The Democrat on the board, Representative Dale E. Kildee of Michigan, said he had not learned of the episode until Friday, the day Mr. Foley resigned.

"I was never informed of the allegations about Mr. Foley's inappropriate communications with a House page," Mr. Kildee said in a statement released Saturday evening. "And I was never involved in any inquiry into this matter."

The Foley Scandal (WP)

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

It's not just about Rep. Foley.

THE SUDDEN resignation of Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) involves more than an obviously troubled man who sent sexually suggestive e-mails to underage congressional pages. Numerous fellow lawmakers, including Republican leaders, apparently had at least partial knowledge about Mr. Foley's disturbing conduct. A thorough and prompt accounting is needed of what colleagues knew about his behavior, when they knew it and what they did about it.

The system of congressional pages offers valuable experience for teenage boys and girls but also puts a burden on Congress to ensure that the young people in its care are not subject to sexual harassment or abuse. In 1983 the House censured Reps. Daniel B. Crane (R-Ill) and Gerry E. Studds (D-Mass.) for sexual misconduct with pages. Given that history, initial reports about the institutional response to questions about Mr. Foley's behavior are extremely troubling -- suggestive of a self-protective desire to sweep the problem under the rug rather than to put the well-being of pages paramount.

Mr. Foley's interests were so well-known that pages reportedly warned each other to watch out for him. Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), who chairs the House Page Board, said he was told by the clerk of the House about troubling e-mails from Mr. Foley to a page "in late 2005." Mr. Shimkus said he warned Mr. Foley to cut off contact and "be especially mindful of his conduct" with pages. That hardly seems an adequate response.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said he learned of the matter last spring, and Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), after first saying he heard about it only last week, confirmed yesterday that he also was informed early this year. What did the House leaders do with this information, and did they take steps to protect other pages?

Mr. Boehner has punted the controversy to the House ethics committee. But that panel has too often been a black hole of inaction riven by partisan divisions. This isn't a matter of judging whether an individual member complied with ethics rules so much as of assessing the House's institutional response to a problem in its midst. The better course would be to appoint an outside investigator to do the fact-finding. Meanwhile, lawmakers, from the speaker on down, should divulge, fully and quickly, their conduct in this affair.

Medicare Insurers To Offer More Options In '07 (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Medicare beneficiaries will have access to more options for prescription drug coverage in 2007, with many insurers offering better value and a larger number of medications, the Bush administration said Friday. But the potential for confusion may also increase.

The administration said beneficiaries who were satisfied with their current drug coverage would not have to do anything when the six-week open enrollment period begins Nov. 15. Consumer advocates, however, said beneficiaries should carefully review the options because prices have changed, often by significant amounts.

DOJ_NMG_0072302

Insurers can begin marketing their 2007 options on Sunday.

The drug program got off to a chaotic start in January. But the Bush administration, realizing that health care could be a potent issue for Democrats in midterm elections this fall, appears to have solved many of the biggest problems.

Many experts had predicted a shakeout in the market for drug coverage, which is offered through dozens of private insurers subsidized by the government. But it did not occur.

In most states, Medicare beneficiaries had a choice of slightly more than 40 free-standing drug plans this year. In 2007, every state but Alaska and Hawaii will have more than 50 drug plans, and 23 states will have 55 or more.

The number of national drug plans offering coverage in every state will rise to 17 next year, from 9 this year. In New York, 61 drug plans will be available, up from 46 this year.

John K. Gorman, a former Medicare official who is now a health care consultant, said, "Over all, Medicare beneficiaries can expect to see low drug premiums and higher levels of benefits."

To support the assertion that drug plans will offer better value, Medicare officials said the average premium for drug coverage next year would be $24 a month. That is the same as this year and 40 percent less than first estimated for 2007. But, the officials said, the average number of drugs covered by insurers will increase by 13 percent, to 4,390 next year.

Monthly premiums in 2007 will range from a low of $9.50, under a drug plan offered by the HIP Insurance Company of New York, to a high of more than $110 under plans offered by Sierra Health Services in New Jersey and some other states.

Francis B. Olsen, senior vice president of HIP Insurance in New York, said his company was now charging $40.70 a month for "virtually the same coverage" that would cost $9.50 a month next year. Clearly, he said, "it will be a better bargain for beneficiaries." Humana has the lowest premium this year: $1.87 a month in a seven-state region that includes Iowa, Minnesota and North and South Dakota.

The number of drug plans available in 2006 and 2007 far exceeds what members of Congress expected when they created the program three years ago. The existence of so many plans provides some evidence to support the theory that the federal government can stimulate fierce competition among private insurers — regulated and subsidized by the government — to help control health costs for beneficiaries and taxpayers.

"As a result of robust competition and smart choices by seniors, plans are adding drugs, removing options that were not popular, and providing more options with enhanced coverage," said Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

But Deane R. Beebe of the Medicare Rights Center, a counseling and advocacy group, said beneficiaries should not be lulled into complacency.

"Your drug plan might have worked for you this year, but you can't assume that it will be affordable or cover the drugs you need next year," Ms. Beebe said. "You should go back to the drawing board to determine whether your current plan or another one would best meet your needs."

Congress defined a standard benefit, which includes a significant gap in coverage, also known as a doughnut hole. Medicare officials encouraged insurers to help close the gap in 2007, and many companies responded. For premiums ranging typically from $40 to $50 a month, beneficiaries can enroll in plans that provide extra benefits, including coverage in the gap for generic and sometimes for brand-name drugs.

While many companies are in the market, enrollment is concentrated in drug plans offered by just a handful of companies. Two companies, UnitedHealth and Humana, attracted almost half of the people in prescription drug plans this year, but that could change.

Humana, which offered the lowest premiums in many states this year, is raising some of its charges in 2007, and other companies have cut their premiums to compete more effectively.

To illustrate the need for caution in the marketplace, Ms. Beebe pointed to changes in the most comprehensive plan offered by Humana. In New York, the premium for this plan, known as Humana Complete, will be $82.10 a month in 2007, up from $47.93 this year. But the plan, which covers both generic and brand-name drugs in the gap this year, will cover only generic products in the gap next year, according to data provided by the government and the company.

DOJ_NMG_0072303

Thomas T. Noland Jr., a spokesman for Humana, said other companies were lowering their premiums "in response to our leadership."

Even though UnitedHealth often charged higher premiums than other insurers this year, it won many subscribers because it had a product endorsed by AARP, the lobby for older Americans. UnitedHealth offered one drug plan under the AARP name this year, but in 2007, it will offer three, including a so-called saver plan priced below the cheapest Humana plan in several states.

Hope, At $4,200 A Dose (NYT)

By Alex Berenson

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

CHARGING $4,200 a dose for a new version of an old cancer drug has helped make Dr. Patrick Soon-Shiong a billionaire.

The drug, Abraxane, does not help patients live longer than the older treatment, though it does shrink tumors in more patients, according to clinical trials. And the old and new medicines have similar side effects. An independent review of Abraxane published in December in a cancer research journal concluded that the drug was "old wine in a new bottle."

Still, Dr. Soon-Shiong's company, Abraxis BioScience, has promoted Abraxane as a major advance in treating late-stage breast cancer — that is, for patients who have not responded to other treatments and are now close to death — and is seeking approval for patients to use it earlier in their treatment. And, in at least one way, Abraxane is a breakthrough: it costs about 25 times as much as a generic version of the older medicine, which is best known by its brand name, Taxol.

Because of the odd economics of the cancer drug market, though, Abraxane's price does not seem to be hurting its popularity.

About 20,000 people have now been treated with the drug, and Dr. Soon-Shiong expects its sales to approach $200 million this year. By 2010, Abraxane's annual sales could reach $1 billion, analysts say.

Those rosy forecasts illustrate the pricing power that makers of cancer drugs wield. With patients often facing grim prognoses and desperate for new therapies, and insurers relatively powerless to negotiate prices or deny coverage, the cost of treatments seems to have little impact on demand.

The rise in cancer-drug prices is a microcosm of broader trends pushing up health care costs nationally. Despite decades of efforts by governments and insurers to restrain costs, patients continue to want the newest — and most expensive — drugs and medical devices. And doctors and the health care industry have little reason to keep costs in check, because insurers rarely deny coverage for new treatments on the basis of price.

As a result, health care costs continue to skyrocket. On Tuesday, the Kaiser Family Foundation reported that the cost of employee health insurance coverage rose 8 percent, according to a survey conducted from January to May this year. Businesses now spend about $8,500 a year for health insurance for the average family, the foundation said, with employees adding $3,000, not counting the cost of deductibles and other out-of-pocket payments.

Abraxane, and cancer drugs generally, are still a tiny part of total medical spending. But their costs are rising even faster than overall health care inflation. Worldwide, spending on cancer drugs is expected to more than double from 2004 to 2009, to $55 billion, with most of that in the United States.

LARGELY as a result of investor enthusiasm for Abraxane, the stock market value of Abraxis is $4.6 billion.The company, which also makes several generic drugs used in hospitals, had a profit of $86 million last year on sales of $519 million. Dr. Soon-Shiong, the company's chairman, owns 84 percent of the stock, worth about $3.8 billion.

Dr. Soon-Shiong, a Los Angeles surgeon with a controversial history in the drug industry, says Abraxane's price is justified because it causes fewer allergic reactions than Taxol, whose chemical name is paclitaxel. And his company is spending large sums on clinical trials to test Abraxane in new categories of cancer patients, he said.

"We have a breakthrough," he said. "Look at the data."

Dr. Soon-Shiong also noted that although Abraxane has not been proved to prolong survival, it does appear to cause tumors to shrink more often than does Taxol. In the clinical trial that led to Abraxane's approval, about 24 percent of patients showed some response to Abraxane, compared with 11 percent for Taxol.

DOJ_NMG_0072304

Independent oncologists agree that reducing the risk of allergic reactions is an advantage — and perhaps reason enough for doctors to choose Abraxane, costs aside. Still, in clinical trials, Abraxane's overall side-effect profile was similar to that of paclitaxel, which was approved as a chemotherapy treatment in 1992 and is still widely used. Both Abraxane and Taxol can kill white blood cells, leaving patients open to infection, as well as damage nerves in the hands and feet. Taxol causes more damage to white blood cells, while Abraxane causes more nerve damage.

Drug industry experts say Abraxane's price reflects the fact that makers of cancer drugs can charge high prices for new medicines even if they are only marginally better than their older counterparts. That pricing dynamic is enabled by insurance, which shields patients from the full price of drugs. Without pressure from their insurers, patients have little reason to choose older treatments over expensive new therapies.

Doctors, who ultimately decide what drugs to prescribe, also do not have to worry about paying for the treatments they choose.

"When I'm with a patient, my job is to be a patient advocate, not to try to save society money on chemotherapy," said Dr. Barbara L. McAneny, the chief executive of New Mexico Oncology/Hematology Consultants, in Albuquerque.

The Food and Drug Administration, meanwhile, does not regulate drug prices but considers only whether new medicines are safe and effective. Medicare, which pays for Abraxane, is also forbidden by law from considering cost in deciding what treatments to cover.

While insurers have tried to save money in other drug categories by encouraging patients to use cheaper generic drugs, they face public pressure not to restrict access to new cancer treatments. At least since 1971, when President Richard M. Nixon declared a "war on cancer" and vowed to eliminate it, cancer has been viewed as a uniquely frightening disease that deserves the highest priority for research and treatment.

At the same time, most cancer drugs cannot be easily substituted for one another, preventing insurers from playing one drug maker against a rival to achieve lower prices. Abraxis, despite having a close generic competitor for its drug, appears to be benefiting from the insurance industry's acquired habit of paying for whatever the cancer doctor prescribes.

"Everyone is well aware that prices keep going up," said Dr. Steven B. Miller, the chief medical officer at CuraScript, a division of Express Scripts, which helps companies manage their drug insurance plans. But employers are reluctant to tell Express Scripts to refuse to pay for costly new cancer drugs, Dr. Miller said.

"Do you want your employees calling and saying, 'You're denying my family the latest cancer care?' " Dr. Miller said. "Until the payor community" — that is, companies that provide health insurance — "develops the appetite to be more aggressive, it would be irresponsible for us to press them on it," he added.

But Dr. John C. Hornberger, a senior research associate at the Sphere Institute, a nonprofit health and public policy group in Burlingame, Calif., says employers are wary of interfering in medical decision-making by their employees. "They want to control costs," he said, "but they don't want to be involved."

Carol Austin-Fink, who learned last year that she had cancer in her right breast, insisted on taking Abraxane after she received the diagnosis because the chemotherapy she received in 1996 for a different cancer in her left breast had caused severe side effects. The earlier treatment did not include Taxol, so she had no idea whether Taxol would cause problems for her, but she did not want to take the chance.

Ms. Austin-Fink, a 59-year-old writer who lives in Las Vegas, said she received six doses of Abraxane over four months, a standard course of treatment. The cost of the drug did not concern her because she has excellent insurance coverage, she said.

"My insurance company just paid it, because my doctors said they needed it, and the insurance company doesn't argue with stuff like that," Ms. Austin-Fink said.

The Abraxane had few side effects and caused her tumor to shrink almost immediately. Her cancer has remained under control since her final treatment a year ago, she said. She said she believes that Abraxane worked better for her than Taxol would have, though she acknowledged that she could not be sure.

Drug companies have sharply increased prices for new cancer drugs in the last decade. Since 1998, for example, Celgene, a biotechnology company based in Summit, N.J., has raised the price of Thalomid, a drug for a cancer called multiple myeloma, to more than $35,000 a year from $4,000.

Celgene is not alone. New treatments now routinely cost several thousand dollars a month. Worldwide spending on cancer medicines, which was $24 billion in 2004, is expected to rise to $55 billion in 2009, making oncology treatments the biggest drug category, according to IMS Health, which provides data on drug sales.

The higher prices are beginning to strain the system, said Carolina Hinestrosa, executive vice president at the National Breast Cancer Coalition, an advocacy group.

Even if they have insurance, many patients face co-payments of 20 percent for their cancer drugs, an expense that can become ruinous for patients receiving combination therapy with several new drugs. For example, Abraxane is being tested along with Avastin, a treatment from Genentech that costs $8,000 a month for some patients.

Drug costs are rising so fast that some patients cannot afford the newest treatments, and access to some therapies "is beginning to be eroded," Ms. Hinestrosa said.

ORIGINALLY, Taxol itself was considered expensive. When the F.D.A. approved it in December 1992, its price of $986 a dose led to Congressional hearings. Since 2000, when Bristol-Myers Squibb's patent on Taxol expired, the drug has been available both as nonbranded generic paclitaxel and as branded Taxol, at a cost of about $150 a dose for the generic and $1,000 for the branded version, which is now sold mostly outside the United States.

These days, though, high prices rarely draw public protests, in part because most patients are still receiving their medicines. That is accomplished through a mix of insurance coverage and programs sponsored by charities and drug makers, including Abraxis, that provide free supplies to the indigent.

"There isn't an effort in terms of public policy to keep prices under control," Ms. Hinestrosa said.

Megan Murphy, an analyst at Lazard Capital Markets who follows Abraxis, agrees. While doctors and patients have begun to complain, drug makers still have substantial pricing power, she said. "At some point, something will change here," she said. "But there doesn't seem to be any real resistance right now."

Dr. Soon-Shiong said in an interview that he, too, worried about the cost of cancer treatment. But Abraxane is fairly priced, he said, because it is based on a scientific breakthrough that the company refers to as "nanoparticle technology."

This is not the first time that Dr. Soon-Shiong has aggressively promoted a new disease treatment. In the mid-1990's, he won attention for transplanting pancreatic cells into two diabetic patients. Eventually, the transplants failed.

At about the same time that Dr. Soon-Shiong was researching both diabetes treatments and Abraxane, he created a company called American Pharmaceutical Partners to market generic drugs to hospitals. American Pharmaceutical generated controversy by giving stock options to executives at a company responsible for buying drugs on behalf of hospitals nationwide. Some doctors said the stock options created a serious conflict of interest by giving the executives — who were supposed to represent the hospitals — a financial interest in American Pharmaceutical's success. American Pharmaceutical denied any wrongdoing and said all the arrangements were properly disclosed.

Dr. Soon-Shiong created Abraxis BioScience earlier this year by merging American Pharmaceutical Partners with another company he controlled, American BioScience. Shareholders in American Pharmaceutical Partners have sued him over the merger, contending that it benefited him at their expense. Dr. Soon-Shiong says that he has done nothing wrong and that the lawsuits are irrelevant to Abraxane's promise.

ABRAXANE is a reformulated version of paclitaxel, a chemical found in the Pacific yew tree that destroys cancer cells. But paclitaxel, which is given intravenously, is difficult to use. Because it does not dissolve in water, the drug must be mixed in Cremophor, a combination of castor oil and alcohol that can cause severe allergic reactions. To reduce that risk, patients who receive Cremophor first receive a steroid and an antihistamine.

Working with University of Illinois researchers in the 1990's, Dr. Soon-Shiong found a way to give Taxol without Cremophor by coating paclitaxel in fragments of albumin, a protein found in human blood. He named the new treatment Abraxane.

Abraxane patients do not need antihistamines or steroids. The drug can also be given at slightly higher doses and injected more quickly than traditional paclitaxel, which requires a three hour-infusion.

A third drug, called Taxotere, works similarly to paclitaxel but is a different chemical compound; it competes with both Abraxane and Taxol. Made by Sanofi-Aventis, Taxotere costs $2,500 a dose. It increases survival slightly in breast cancer patients, compared with Taxol. But because Taxotere has even more severe side effects, many patients and doctors prefer Taxol. Both drugs are widely used. There is no published data comparing Abraxane and Taxotere.

In the largest clinical trial comparing Abraxane and Taxol, covering 454 patients, the two drugs produced similar side effects — although Taxol caused more patients to have low white blood cell counts.

The trial also showed that Abraxane delayed the growth of tumors for 23 weeks in the average patient, compared with 17 weeks for Taxol. That difference was statistically significant, meaning that it probably did not occur by chance. But the trial did not show that Abraxane extended patients' lives longer than Taxol did, and that is the most important measure of effectiveness. After two years, roughly 75 percent of patients in the study had died, whether they received Abraxane or Taxol.

Over all, Abraxane may be slightly more effective than Taxol, and the lack of Cremophor is an advantage, said Dr. Andrew D. Seidman, a breast cancer specialist at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in Manhattan who has studied Taxol and Taxotere since the early 1990's. But the two drugs are similar, he said. "Is this a breakthrough in terms of the notion that this is a new class of drug with a new mechanism of action?" he asked rhetorically. "No."

Dr. Ramaswamy Govindan, a Washington University professor who was co-author of a December article in the Annals of Oncology about Abraxane and other, as-yet- unapproved Cremophor-free versions of Taxol, said that none of the new drugs had shown significant advantages over the older medicine.

"In general, the novel formulations so far have not stood out as distinctly superior," Dr. Govindan said.

The F.D.A. approved Abraxane as a last-ditch treatment for late-stage breast cancer in January 2005. Now Abraxis is asking the F.D.A. to allow the use of Abraxane as a treatment for early-stage breast cancer, a larger market than that for late-stage treatments. In an unusual move, the company asked the agency earlier this year to waive its typical requirement that the drug be tested in those patients before allowing the expanded use.

On Sept. 7, the F.D.A. convened a panel of experts in Silver Spring, Md., to discuss Abraxis's request.

Committee members voted against the company's proposal 13 to 1, saying that Abraxis needed more data. The company expects to begin discussions soon with the F.D.A. about designing a clinical trial to test Abraxane in early-stage patients.

At the Sept. 7 hearing, though, Dr. Michael Hawkins, Abraxis's top medical officer, made a remarkable observation about how the company's $4,200-a-dose drug compared with $150 generic paclitaxel.

Dr. Hawkins said the F.D.A. should approve Abraxane in early-stage patients without a clinical trial because such testing would probably not prove that his company's drug was different than the conventional treatment. "These are just two forms of paclitaxel," he said.

Senate confirms Bush nominee Mary Peters, 57

WASHINGTON — The Senate early Saturday confirmed President Bush's nomination of Mary Peters, Arizona's former Department of Transportation director, as the new secretary of transportation.

Peters, a former federal highway administrator, succeeds Norman Mineta, a Democrat who resigned in July after six years in office.

In a statement issued by the White House, Bush said Peters is "an innovative thinker who will work with state and local leaders to confront challenges and solve problems."

Peters, 57, who spent most of her career in government highway jobs, is a strong advocate of privatizing roads. But highways are only a part of the Transportation Department's portfolio. The 60,000-person department also regulates aviation, railroads, pipelines, transit and motor carriers.

Her biggest challenges will be reducing highway, airport and seaport congestion. The administration in May announced a strategy to reduce highway congestion. It calls for selecting up to five interstate corridors for long-term investment.

Peters spent three years as head of the Arizona Department of Transportation and 3 1/2 years as head of the Federal Highway Administration.

DOJ_NMG_0072307

Since November, she has been national director for transportation policy and consulting in the Phoenix office of HDR, an architectural and engineering firm.

A fourth-generation Arizonan, she holds a bachelor's degree from the University of Phoenix and attended Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government program for state and local government executives.

Last November, Peters dropped her bid to challenge Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano after questions were raised about Peters' eligibility.

The Arizona Constitution requires candidates to have been Arizona citizens five years before the election, but Peters lived in Virginia and registered to vote there during Bush's first term.

Peters said she believed she was eligible to run, but was stepping aside because the issue would have been a distraction in the race.

Justices To Hear Abortion, Integration Cases (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

'Partial-Birth' Procedure and Schools' Race Policies to Dominate Court's Agenda

Abortion and race dominate the Supreme Court's agenda for the term that begins tomorrow, with the Bush administration and its conservative allies urging the justices to put limits on abortion rights and affirmative action.

Conservatives want the court to uphold a 2003 federal law banning the procedure opponents call "partial-birth" abortion, and to strike down local integration policies that distribute students by race. They are asking the court not only to rule in their favor, but to limit -- or, possibly, overrule -- recent constitutional decisions that have drawn heavy fire from the right.

The conservative push on social issues is just what Democrats and liberals, concerned about the future of Roe v. Wade , the 1973 case that recognized a right to abortion, warned against during confirmation hearings for the two Bush appointees now on the court -- Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

In response, Roberts and Alito pledged to take due account of stare decisis , the rule that says the court should avoid overruling past decisions.

So this term will be closely watched not only for the results the court reaches, but for how it reaches them.

"They don't want to make it look as if the only reason for change is that there are different people here," said Michael J. Gerhardt, a professor of law at the University of North Carolina. "They'll want to make it clear that principles and not politics dictated the outcome."

When the court takes up the federal abortion law, it will be considering a statute that was passed by a large majority in Congress and signed by Bush in 2003 -- and then struck down by every lower federal court that has considered it.

The lower courts ruled that the law is incompatible with a 5 to 4 ruling by the Supreme Court in 2000 that held that a similar state law, from Nebraska, was unconstitutional.

In that case, known as Stenberg v. Carhart , the court said the statute could be read to prohibit other procedures and lacked an exception to protect a mother's health, creating an "undue burden" on the right to abortion first recognized in Roe.

The Republican-controlled Congress included an exception to save a mother's life. It did not permit any other exception, however, based on its finding that none could be medically justified.

If the court wants to uphold the federal law without overruling a precedent that is only six years old, it could say that it is bound by Congress's factual findings, which distinguish the federal law from the Nebraska one.

That is the course urged by the Bush administration in its brief, which speaks of "the long-standing principle that Congress is better equipped than courts to make factual findings that inform the constitutionality of federal statutes."

But, the administration brief continues, to "the extent that the Court concludes that Stenberg compels the conclusion that the Act is facially invalid . . . Stenberg should be overruled."

In a brief on behalf of several doctors challenging the ban, the Center for Reproductive Rights told the court that it owes Congress no deference on issues of medical practice, and that the administration's suggestion that Stenberg may be overruled "demonstrates an inadequate regard for the societal values held safe by the principles of stare decisis ."

DOJ_NMG_0072308

The decision to rule on "partial birth" abortion despite the absence of disagreement among lower courts was expected: The court usually reviews lower-court decisions holding federal laws unconstitutional.

Taking up race-conscious public school assignments was a surprise, however. The justices had turned down a similar case a few months earlier, when Sandra Day O'Connor was still on the court.

O'Connor wrote the court's opinion in a 5 to 4 case upholding race-conscious admissions in higher education.

But after Alito replaced her, the court spent almost two months discussing the public school issue before deciding in June to hear it.

At issue are voluntary school integration plans in Seattle and in Louisville, Ky.

In Seattle, where authorities seek to overcome what they say are segregated housing patterns, students can choose to attend any high school in the city, but some are oversubscribed.

To determine who gets in, officials deny admission to new students whose race would tip an oversubscribed school's population more than 15 percentage points outside a 60-40 nonwhite-white balance.

In Louisville, which was under court order to desegregate until 2000, the policy applies from first grade through high school and aims to prevent any school from falling below 15 percent black or exceeding 50 percent black.

In both cities, white parents whose children were not allowed into the schools of their choice sued, alleging that the policies were unconstitutional.

Lower courts ruled in favor of the schools, citing O'Connor's 2003 opinion, which said that diversity could be a strong enough government interest to warrant the use of race as a factor in allocating places in the University of Michigan's law school.

Several conservative legal organizations are urging the court in friend-of-the-court briefs to use the Seattle and Louisville cases to overrule the three-year-old Michigan decision.

But in their briefs, the white parents and the Bush administration, which supports them, do not urge overruling the Michigan case -- which caused deep internal divisions over affirmative action within the administration.

Instead, they tell the court that the public school plans are different because they are not true efforts at diversity but, as the administration brief puts it, "outright racial balancing," which the court has disapproved in other cases.

Where The Rubber Meets Roe (WP)

By William Saletan

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

The issue that never changes is finally changing.

If you're among the millions of Americans who don't like the idea of abortion but also don't like the idea of banning it, good news is on the way. In the past several weeks, two bills have been filed in the House. Without banning a single procedure, they aim to significantly lower the rate of abortions performed in this country. Voluntary reduction, not criminalization or moral silence, is the new approach.

How do you stop abortions without restricting them? One way is to persuade women to complete their pregnancies instead of terminating them. The other is to prevent unintended pregnancies in the first place. And there's the rub -- or, in this case, the rubber. The two House bills used to be one proposal, backed by an alliance of antiabortion lawmakers and organizations. The alliance split because one faction wanted to fund contraception and the other didn't.

In short, the good news is that we no longer have to fight about abortion. The bad news is that we're now fighting about contraception. The old question was abortion as birth control. The new question is abortion or birth control. To lower the abortion rate, we need more contraception. And that means confronting politicians who stand in the way.

In the past two years, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton , NARAL Pro-Choice America and many House Democrats who support abortion rights have conceded that abortion is tragic and that its frequency must be reduced. Third Way , a progressive think tank, has pushed hard in this direction.

Meanwhile, Democrats for Life of America , which has eight members of Congress on its advisory board and works with 30 others, has devised a plan to reduce the abortion rate by 95 percent " by helping and supporting pregnant women ." Rep. Timothy J. Ryan (D-Ohio) was set to lead the charge.

Then Ryan looked at the data and realized that to get anywhere near that target, he and his colleagues would have to provide more birth control. That's when the squirming began.

Some of Ryan's antiabortion allies worried that "morning-after" pills might prevent embryos from implanting, so he omitted such pills from his bill. They opposed requiring private insurers to cover contraception, so he took that out, too. They complained that other pregnancy-prevention bills hadn't emphasized abortion reduction, so he put abortion reduction in the title. They wanted sex education programs to emphasize abstinence; they got it. The only troublesome thing left in the bill was birth control.

It broke the deal. Democrats for Life abandoned Ryan and began a contraceptive-free alternative. With them went Americans United for Life, the National Association of Evangelicals and 13 House Democrats, led by Rep. James L. Oberstar (Minn.), the Democratic co-chairman of the congressional Pro-Life Caucus. Ryan added his name to their bill, but they refused to add their names to his. Focus on the Family, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Rush Limbaugh and Rep. Christopher H. Smith (N.J.), the Republican co-chairman of the Pro-Life Caucus, excoriated Ryan's bill. The Catholic Diocese of Youngstown, based in Ryan's district, asked him to withdraw it.

The objectors make several arguments. They point out that birth control pills, like morning-after pills, can block implantation of an embryo. But there's no evidence that this has ever happened. The chance is theoretical, and breastfeeding poses the same chance, so you'd have to stamp that out, too. Critics also note that many birth control methods can fail. That's true, but it's an argument for using two methods, not zero.

Third, they protest that federal family planning money supports Planned Parenthood, which performs abortions. But only 14 percent of this money goes to the organization, and fewer than 9 percent of Planned Parenthood clients go there to have an abortion.

Above all, the critics insist that contraception will backfire. As the Youngstown diocese puts it, "Promotion of contraception leads to more extra-marital sexual intercourse, which leads to more unwanted pregnancies, which leads to more abortions."

The belief that you're protected does make it easier to say yes. But denying that contraceptives reduce your risk of pregnancy is as crazy as denying that an umbrella reduces your risk of getting wet.

Does the increased risk from more sex outweigh the decreased risk from more protection? Do the math. On average, contraception lowers the odds of pregnancy by a factor of seven. If you're capable of having seven times as much sex, congratulations. The rest of us will get pregnant less often, not more.

And that's what the data show. Ryan's bill targets women with family incomes below 200 percent of the poverty line, since they have higher rates of unintended pregnancy and more difficulty finding or affording contraception. Among these women, the percentage using contraception declined from 1995 to 2002. As predicted by contraception opponents, the rate of sexual activity also declined, though only slightly. Even better, from an antiabortion standpoint, when these women got pregnant unintentionally, the percentage who chose abortion fell.

Less contraception, less sex, more women choosing life. So, the abortion rate among these women went down, right? Wrong. The decline in contraception overwhelmed the decline in sexual activity, resulting in a higher rate of unintended pregnancy. And the increase in unintended pregnancy overwhelmed the increase in women choosing to have the baby, resulting in more abortions. From an antiabortion standpoint, trading contraception for "choosing life" was a net loss.

That's why Ryan insists on birth control. He's tired of pious slogans and symbolic bills crafted to save more congressional seats than babies. He has had enough of the debate between life and choice. He wants a new abortion debate. "You're either for reducing the number, or you're not," he says. He has made his decision. Now make yours.

Along With Victories, G.O.P. Takes A Few Blows (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Kate Zernike

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072310

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Just hours before Congress closed down for the midterm elections on Saturday, Republican leaders threw together a ceremony to celebrate the passage of what they hoped to promote as their singular legislative accomplishment — a bill to bring terrorism suspects to trial.

But after House and Senate leaders formally signed the measure for the cameras, the only questions they faced from assembled reporters pertained to Representative Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who had just resigned after accusations that he sent sexually explicit Internet messages to teenage pages.

"None of us are very happy about it," Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said before abruptly calling a halt to the questions, and the ceremony.

No doubt.

Republicans scored significant legislative victories in the closing hours. They pushed through the bill for detainee trials after weeks of internal squabbling, won approval for 700 miles of border fencing to show they are serious about cracking down on illegal immigration, passed spending bills for defense and domestic security, and enacted new port security initiatives.

But the finale hardly went according to script for Republicans as they headed out to try to hold off Democrats determined to win a majority.

The highly publicized case of Mr. Foley, who served in the House leadership as a deputy whip, threatened to build into an institutional scandal as House leaders acknowledged that they had known about the messages for nearly a year, but had relied on Mr. Foley's word that nothing inappropriate had occurred.

But that was not all. Republicans were unable to win final approval of a bill to regulate domestic wiretapping, which Democrats feared would become a political weapon more potent than the bill governing terrorism suspects. The disclosure of a National Intelligence Estimate saying the war in Iraq was fueling terrorism called attention to the issue Democrats most want to campaign on — discontent with the administration's handling of the war. A new book by Bob Woodward did the same, claiming that the administration had ignored high-level warnings that it would need more troops.

And Republicans wrapped up the way they started the year, with new revelations about Jack Abramoff, the disgraced lobbyist whose guilty plea on Jan. 3 roiled the party and set off the events that led to the resignation of Representative Tom DeLay, a powerful party force.

"It was not a graceful exit," said Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, as events swirled on Friday.

Republicans were clearly rocked by the Foley episode. It gave Democrats, who need 15 seats to gain a majority, a new opening to pick up a seat in a Republican-leaning district. Florida Republicans were to meet to choose a replacement for Mr. Foley, but his name will remain on the ballot against a well-financed opponent.

Setting aside the late drama, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, was satisfied.

"Legislatively speaking, I feel pretty good," Mr. Boehner said in an interview on Friday night. He said Republicans had delivered most of what they hoped to with a series of security-related bills.

But what Republicans had at the outset dubbed Security September, Democrats declared a fizzle.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, ticked off a day-by-day list of damaging news about Iraq in the last week. "America must succeed in Iraq, and we need to win the war on terror," Mr. Reid said. "But this president and this Republican Congress are the wrong people for the job, obviously, based on their record."

Told that Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the Republican leader, had outlined "quite a long list" of his party's successes, Mr. Reid interrupted: "A long list?" he asked, incredulous, then stood back and said, "Hmmm."

"I mean, can you imagine these fiscal conservatives are burying this country in red ink?" he said, finally. "This fiscally conservative Congress — we don't even have a budget."

To some veteran Democrats, the events of recent weeks seemed familiar, reminding them of how things spiraled out of control for their own party in 1994, when they lost the majority they had held for 40 years.

"It's not exactly like 1994, but it reminds me of 1994," said Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, who remembered a series of political mistakes that seemed to cascade. "Every day you would wake up and say, 'What is going on here?' "

DOJ_NMG_0072311

Republicans had hoped Mr. Abramoff would fade into the background and deny Democrats their "culture of corruption" sound bite in the final weeks of the campaign. But the Government Reform Committee issued a report detailing his apparent contacts with top White House officials, allowing Democrats to remind voters that the Republican-led Congress had failed to enact lobbying reform despite the scandal, leaving a pledge unfulfilled.

Representative Tom Davis, the Virginia Republican who leads the committee, said the White House was irked over the report but made no apologies. "This White House doesn't want any oversight at all," Mr. Davis said. "It's my job."

Mr. Foley, a six-term congressman who was a high-profile Capitol figure for years, had the potential to become a major liability. Late Friday, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, called for an investigation into what the leadership knew, and when.

Republicans denounced her from the floor, grumbling when she introduced herself as a mother and a grandmother. But they were careful with her potentially explosive request and quickly referred it to the ethics committee.

Despite their troubles, many Republican leaders believe tumbling gas prices could be their salvation. But even that benefit has drawbacks. Many Americans tell pollsters they believe that the drop was politically orchestrated to help Republicans in the election.

Still, Republicans denounced Democratic efforts to paint them as do-nothings and enumerated accomplishments: the approval of two Supreme Court justices, tax cuts, a pension bill, a highway bill, an energy bill, an overhaul of bankruptcy and class action laws, and the last-minute flurry of security legislation.

"We've gotten things done," said Mr. Frist, who will leave the Senate at the end of the year.

But some legislative promises were left incomplete, including tax extensions sought by business, an offshore oil drilling bill, the broad immigration bill sought by the president and many lower profile issues.

And in their most basic function, lawmakers fell far short. They were forced to pass a stopgap measure to keep most of the government operating at current spending levels until Nov. 17 because they did not enact individual spending bills for nearly every federal agency.

Congress Adjourns, Leaving Much Work Undone (BOS/AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

Incumbents are preoccupied with getting reelected

WASHINGTON -- Lawmakers were off to the campaign trail after the Republicans, in danger of losing their control of Congress, sought to play to their strength by pushing through a series of security-related bills.

In a flurry of activity before their departure early yesterday morning, the Senate gave final approval to $448 billion for the Pentagon, including $70 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The Senate also joined the House in approving construction of a 700-mile fence along the US-Mexican border.

Congress also sent to the president legislation to ease the threat of terrorist attack using the 11 million shipping containers entering the nation's 361 ports every year.

And legislation to convene military trials to prosecute suspected terrorists cleared its final hurdle in the House.

Much work was left undone when Congress adjourned, after a legislative year that has been marked by sharp partisanship and the failure of Congress to agree on major lobbying reform and immigration legislation.

The action on the security bills gives Republicans at least one major selling point as they try to persuade voters to keep them in power.

Senate majority leader Bill Frist, Republican of Tennessee, said that in the weeks before the election Republicans must emphasize that they are the better party to fight the war on terrorism.

``We're going to have to get the message out and we have to get it out aggressively over the next 41 days to do well, but I believe we can," Frist said

Members of Congress will return after the Nov. 7 election for a lame - duck session during which they will have to pass bills dealing with domestic spending for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0072312

So far, the only spending bills completed are the defense bill and a $35 billion bill for homeland security that contains $1.2 billion to begin construction of fences and other barriers along the US-Mexican border, plus money for jails to detain illegal immigrants and hire 1,500 more border agents.

Legislation validating President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program will have to wait for a postelection session colored by the November results. So will a bill to open the Outer Continental Shelf to oil and gas rigs.

Included in the defense budget: stopgap spending to keep agencies open through Nov. 17 if their funding bills haven't passed. Those include measures funding veterans' health care, education, health research, anticrime programs, among many others.

The final act of the Senate was approval of a companion defense bill including a 2.2 percent military pay raise, and setting policy on weapons spending and research programs considered vital to national security. The House passed the bill Friday by a bipartisan 398-to-23 vote.

The defense authorization bill was held up by Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, because House-Senate negotiators dropped a Coburn-sponsored provision to analyze the costs effects of lawmakers' pet projects, called ``earmarks," on Pentagon operations. Coburn agreed to let the legislation go to a voice vote after he received a promise that his provision will be taken up when Congress returns in November. ``The American people ought to be seeing where we are spending their money," he said.

The 700-mile border fence is considered the single significant accomplishment of what had been an ambitious GOP agenda on immigration. No compromise could be found between Senate Republicans favoring a comprehensive bill including a plan to give illegal immigrants already in the United States an eventual chance at citizenship and House conservatives favoring an enforcement-only bill.

Many of the biggest legislative failures were Republican priorities that toppled when Republicans split into factions. One involved whether to divert some Social Security taxes into private retirement accounts. Bush proposed several major government overhauls in his 2005 State of the Union address -- Social Security, medical malpractice, and tax laws -- but none succeeded.

The Senate voted against taking up a House-passed bill that would criminalize the transporting of minors across state lines to obtain an abortion and avoid parental notification laws in the girl's home state.

Senators from New York and New Jersey blocked Senate action on a bill authorizing $2.1 billion for victims of HIV/AIDS because they said it would shift aid from urban to rural areas.

House and Senate negotiators could not reach agreement on a measure to expand offshore oil drilling. The Senate version would have opened more than 8 million acres in Gulf of Mexico to lease, but House leaders said that didn't go far enough. They favored opening up areas off the coasts of Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, and Alaska as well.

Also left undone was approval of new ethics measures intended to respond to a string of scandals in Congress.

Congress' Accomplishments Fell Short Of GOP's Ambitions (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

With no gay-marriage ban or Social Security overhaul, the party's achievement gap could dog campaigns.

WASHINGTON — As Congress recessed early Saturday for the homestretch of a bruising midterm campaign, Republicans left town with a record of accomplishment that paled in comparison to the grand ambitions they laid out following their 2004 election triumphs.

It remains uncertain whether the gap between what the GOP set out to do and what it achieved will haunt its bid to retain control of the House and Senate — elections are decided by many factors beyond legislative scorecards. Still, the tally for the 109th Congress looms as a potential burden for Republican candidates.

During the two-year session, President Bush and his party abandoned or scaled back the groundbreaking initiatives they once promised voters: a remake of Social Security, a federal ban on gay marriage, strict new limits on special-interest political influence, and a broad overhaul of immigration law that would find a place for many illegal immigrants already in the country.

And, instead of returning home on the high note they expected after passing a key national security measure last week, spirits among GOP lawmakers clearly were soured by a new scandal: the sudden resignation of Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) amid revelations of sexually explicit communications he had with teenage male former House pages.

Questions about whether House Republican leaders knew of Foley's improper advances months ago and failed to act seem a likely distraction for the party and its message in the short term. And as November's vote nears, Democrats can be counted on to eagerly portray Congress as dysfunctional in general.

"This is the do-less-than-the-do-nothing Congress," House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said recently, drawing from President Truman's famed attack on Republicans in 1948.

Nonpartisan analysts also have been critical of Congress. Thomas Mann and Norman Ornstein — two think-tank scholars who have written a book about the workings of Capitol Hill titled "The Broken Branch" — calculate that lawmakers have set a modern record for brevity by sitting in session fewer than 100 days this year.

Given lawmakers' penchant for three-day workweeks, Ornstein and Mann like to quote comedian Mark Russell's line about what members of Congress tell their colleagues every Wednesday: "Have a nice weekend."

Republicans fiercely dispute the do-nothing label, pointing to several key accomplishments. Last week, these included enactment of a new system for prosecuting suspected foreign terrorists and authorization of a 700-mile fence along the Mexico border.

Last year, Congress approved a tightening of bankruptcy law, new limits on class-action lawsuits and a major energy bill — all long sought by the business community.

"Anyone who has worked in this town for a while would have to acknowledge that [those bills] represent an incredible year of legislative accomplishments," said Bruce Josten, a veteran lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Earlier this year, Congress also completed a major overhaul of the nation's ailing pension system.

Republicans blame Democratic obstructionism for the party's failure to complete more of its agenda, including new cuts in the estate tax (the death levy, as the GOP terms it).

But many measures — most prominently Bush's initiatives on Social Security and immigration — have foundered on divisions among Republicans.

The GOP's vaunted party discipline broke down in part because of Bush's dwindling clout as a president prosecuting an unpopular war. Also, unity has been strained by pervasive anxiety that the party will lose control of the House or Senate in the midterm election.

"This is a big-deal election," said David Winston, a Republican pollster. "The overall tension is really high."

Most Republicans are heartened by what they see as a campaign trail that appears less perilous than it did a month ago.

With political winds blowing strongly against them in the summer, Republicans returned to Washington in early September determined to press their main political advantage — the greater trust that polls show voters have in them to deal with terrorism, compared with Democrats.

A priority was to clear the measure establishing new rules for trying terrorism suspects before military tribunals. Another was to give the White House explicit authority to conduct a warrantless wiretapping program that Bush secretly instituted after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Congress was unable to finish work on the surveillance bill. But final approval Friday of the tribunal bill set the stage for a signing ceremony at the White House that could keep the spotlight on the broader war on terrorism rather than the unpopular war in Iraq.

Many GOP strategists also anticipate that the party's fortunes will be boosted if the price of gasoline continues to drop.

But Republicans remain spooked by low approval ratings that polls find for Congress and their party. A recent Pew survey, for instance, found that 38% said this Congress accomplished less than its predecessor. And by 50% to 39%, poll respondents said they were likely to support a Democrat rather than a Republican in congressional elections.

GOP lawmakers have sought to put the best possible face on their record. "Given the unprecedented — and increasing — frequency of obstruction and political gamesmanship … we've accomplished more than might be expected," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said last week.

DOJ_NMG_0072314

Gone from their rhetoric, however, is the list of ambitious goals Bush and other Republicans unveiled after the 2004 elections gave the president a second term and the GOP a wider margin of control in the House and Senate.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) set the tone when he said in his first speech of 2005, "In this Congress, big plans will stir men's blood."

His associates saw a historic opportunity to advance their agendas. "My fellow conservatives, we have waited our entire lives for the chance the American people have given us," then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said shortly after the 2004 results. Now DeLay is in private life, driven from office by corruption charges.

As the Republicans focused on national security matters in September, Congress left unfinished several policy initiatives, including some that had seemed close to passage.

A bill to expand offshore oil drilling in the Gulf of Mexico stalled. Action to stave off a scheduled cut in Medicare doctor fees languished, despite heavy lobbying by the influential American Medical Assn. Grand promises to crack down on lobbying excesses, in the wake of the influence-peddling scandal centered on disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, produced only modest changes in House rules.

The tech industry, meanwhile, is baffled that lawmakers could not manage to extend a popular tax credit for research and development.

"We have clearly had far fewer accomplishments than we have had in previous Congresses," said Ralph Hellmann, a former GOP aide on Capitol Hill who is a lobbyist for the Information Technology Industry Council.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) defended his party against such assessments, saying, "It's always easy for people to look up and say the glass is half-empty. I'm going to say the glass is half-full."

A key question, however, is whether the glass is full enough to satisfy core GOP supporters who had high hopes when Congress convened in early 2005.

The disappointed include some conservative activists who lament the demise of the same-sex marriage ban and the collapse of an 11th-hour effort to place new restrictions on a minor's ability to get an abortion without a parent's consent.

"There's a sense of ennui" among anti-abortion groups, said Mike McMonagle, director of the Pro-Life Political Action Committee of Southeastern Pennsylvania. "The source of the ennui is our lack of realization of certain goals. Elected officials that we supported let us down."

House's Work Stalls Without Its 'Hammer' (HC)

By Bennett Roth And Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

DeLay's power to get things done is missed, but the controversy isn't

WASHINGTON — Without Tom DeLay around to keep Republicans in line, the House has been unable to resolve tough issues, from immigration to lobbying reform. It has been criticized by independent experts and Democrats as a "do-nothing" chamber.

But as they prepared to leave town last week to hit the campaign trail, several Republican lawmakers said they had little nostalgia for the iron-fisted former majority leader from Sugar Land who resigned from Congress under an ethics cloud.

Though praising the Texan's accomplishments, such as his ability to push through legislation, they said that his legal woes and sharp partisanship caused political headaches for fellow GOP members.

The legislators appreciate the more collegial style of Rep. John Boehner, the tanned and telegenic Ohio Republican tapped to replace DeLay as majority leader.

"I feel like the team is more of a team now. It's not Central Command," said Rep. Zach Wamp, R-Tenn., who echoed other Republicans in saying Boehner has been more willing to consult the rank-and-file about legislation and strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0072315

Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, part of the House Republican leadership, said that Boehner "reaches across the aisle" to consult with Democrats, an approach the combative DeLay often avoided.

'A lightning rod'While he was in office, DeLay's legal troubles hurt others in his party, said Pryce, a moderate facing a tough re-election battle.

"Tom had become a lightning rod for many of us," she said.

Democrats declared DeLay a poster child for what they said was a culture of corruption in the Republican Party — a theme they hoped would resonate with voters in the November congressional elections. But the issue has not turned out to be major in most campaigns, which Republicans attribute, in part, to DeLay's departure.

DeLay did not return a call seeking comment. DeLay, who left Congress in June after 22 years, announced recently that he signed a book deal to write about his career and how it furthered the conservative cause.

When he permanently relinquished his majority leader's post in January, he warned that the Houston area would suffer because of his diminished clout.

"The majority leader controls what comes to the floor, and the Houston-Galveston area has benefited from that. That changes now," he said. Critics who "never gave me an even shake ought to think about that," he said.

He is awaiting trial in Texas on criminal charges related to campaign finances. Two of his former government staffers, Tony Rudy and Michael Scanlon, have pleaded guilty to corruption charges related to their work with former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who often traveled overseas with DeLay. Abramoff also pleaded guilty this year to corruption charges related to his lobbying activities.

Going beyond leadersBoehner said his goals are to be more inclusive, involving members outside the leadership in making decisions, and to reduce the acrimonious atmosphere in the House between the two parties and factions among Republicans.

"We've had our disagreements, but the temperature on the floor has been a lot lower than it was. I think that helps breed more cooperation among members," he said.

Though some Democrats say they harbor less animosity toward Boehner than DeLay, they also deny that he has been more successful at bridge-building between parties.

"I'm totally unaware that he's in communication with Democrats," said House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

Rep. Barney Frank, a Massachusetts Democrat who had little fondness for DeLay, said Boehner is less powerful — as is to be expected.

"It's not that Boehner is weak, it's just that (unlike DeLay) he's more like every other leader," Frank said.

DeLay, he said, wielded unparalleled control over House Republicans because he could tap lobbying and social conservative allies outside Congress to mobilize conservative grass-roots and campaign cash that could be used as leverage against GOP members wavering on legislation he favored.

But with DeLay's downfall and Abramoff's conviction, DeLay's model has been discredited, he said.

Dick Armey, the former House GOP majority leader from Texas who often feuded with DeLay, offered a crisp comment on how Republicans are faring without DeLay.

"There is no doubt in my mind we are better off" with Boehner, Armey said.

Boehner has spent less time catering to social conservatives, which, according to Armey, has enabled the majority leader to better reach out to moderates in the party, who are more interested in fiscal issues.

Boehner has appealed more to fiscal hawks, Armey said, with his criticism of earmarks, the pet projects often tacked to spending bills at the behest of lobbyists or lawmakers. The House approved a measure forcing lawmakers to disclose their earmarks but did not take up proposals to curb the proliferation of the practice.

Under scrutinySocial conservatives lamenting DeLay's departure still are assessing Boehner.

"The jury is still out" on Boehner's commitment to causes important to religious conservatives, said Tom McClusky, vice president of the socially conservative Family Research Council. As an example of how DeLay courted the social conservatives more than Boehner, McClusky noted that when the House voted on a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriages several years ago, DeLay delivered the closing remarks. But earlier this year when the House again took up the amendment, Boehner delegated that role to someone else.

Some GOP activists bemoan the loss of DeLay, saying his legendary arm-twisting skills are sorely missed. Lawmakers devoted much of September to crafting legislation setting ground rules for putting terror suspects on trial. They eventually reached a compromise between President Bush's demands and those of lawmakers who wanted the guidelines to hew to international agreements. But the debate over tribunals crowded out consideration of other issues before Congress. Lawmakers did not find time to complete action on most of the spending bills for the fiscal year that begins today.

"This is their core responsibility, getting the spending bills done," Norman Ornstein, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, said.

As a result of rifts within the GOP, they also have been unable to reach consensus on a comprehensive immigration overhaul sought by Bush.

Eager to leave Washington to campaign for the upcoming elections, Congress also has failed to enact most of a tough lobbying-reform package promised in the wake of the Abramoff scandal or take on offshore oil drilling and many other promised priorities.

Grover Norquist, a conservative activist, said it is unlikely that DeLay could have been more successful in the current political environment.

In Bush's first term, Norquist said, DeLay could rely on votes by some conservative Democrats to pad a thin Republican majority. But Pelosi, the Democratic leader, has been increasingly successful since DeLay's departure in holding Democrats together to oppose GOP initiatives, forcing Republican leaders to scramble to find support among their sometimes recalcitrant moderates.

Furthermore, many moderate Republicans and conservatives have been refusing to follow the GOP leadership on issues such as spending as Bush's popularity has waned.

"It is hard to maintain discipline when people are running for the doors," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union.

Effects on TexasTexas Republican lawmakers clearly miss DeLay, whom they often see when their former colleague drops in on their weekly luncheons on Capitol Hill.

Now that DeLay is gone from leadership, the Texans say they have to work much harder to secure federal help for the state.

"We've had to adjust quickly because the delegation had relied on Tom and his leadership role for so many issues, from NASA to highway funding," said Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands.

DeLay's effectiveness on the political front could reduce the state's clout in Congress if Democrats regain control of the House in the Nov. 7 elections.

Under the DeLay-spearheaded congressional redistricting in Texas, three of the state's longest-serving Democrats in the House, Martin Frost, Charles Stenholm and Jim Turner, were squeezed out of office. They were in line to become committee chairmen.

As many Republicans appear eager to move beyond the DeLay era, Keene said it may be impossible to duplicate his political skills: "What Tom DeLay brought to the job was a strategic view and an ability to get things done."

"It is a little bit like we replaced Mickey Mantle with somebody else," Keene said. "The other guy might get a few hits, but he is no Mantle."

Unfinished Budget Business (NYT)

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

Control of the nation's purse strings is one of Congress's greatest powers and, as such, a core responsibility of lawmakers. But how can a serious obligation compete with political expediency?

The new budget year, 2007, starts today. But Congress left town last week without having passed the spending bills needed to pay for about 20 percent of the federal government, basically everything except the military and homeland security, and automatic payments like Social Security and interest on the national debt.

Republican legislators could not agree among themselves, let alone with the Democratic minority, on spending levels for matters as vital as education, diplomacy, environmental protection, public transportation and scientific research. Rather than make choices — and leave a record for voters to assess — they fled, promising to act after the election.

For now, departments and programs that Congress has not gotten around to funding will operate at last year's level, or somewhat below. But fallback funding will not necessarily prevent hardship. Take the State Children's Health Insurance Program, paid for by the states and the federal government to insure four million low-income children. At least 17 states are entering the new budget year without enough money, jeopardizing coverage for 600,000 children. It's appalling that Congress did not act to avert this, especially since the Census Bureau recently reported that the percentage of uninsured children rose last year for the first time since 1998.

Appalling, but not surprising. Congressional Republicans rammed through spending cuts in domestic programs last February, most of them in programs for low-income Americans. The ostensible purpose of the cuts was deficit reduction. But three months later, in May, they worsened the deficit by slashing taxes, which will mostly benefit wealthy households. On top of that, they tried repeatedly this year to gut the estate tax, which would only have benefited America's richest families.

It's impossible to say what will happen in the lame duck session, or beyond. But if the future Congress bears a strong resemblance to this one, it will not bode well for budget responsibility or basic fairness.

Education's Moving Target (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Common sense and conservatism, which are usually similar, said that the No Child Left Behind law, which vastly expanded the federal government's supervision of education from kindergarten through 12th grade, was problematic for two reasons: A few of the 50 state governors are apt to be wise innovators, so let policymaking remain at state and local levels. And when Washington makes a mistake, as it has been known to do, it is a continental mistake.

The federal government has recently made one that subverts a promising development in education at the state level. That development is the 65 percent requirement: 65 percent of every school district's education operational budget should be spent on classroom instruction.

Nationally, 61.3 percent is so spent. The 3.7 percentage point difference amounts to nearly $15 billion, which could pay for 370,000 teachers at $40,000 apiece, or a computer for every K-12 student in the country. Only three states today hit the 65 percent target. Seventeen states and the District of Columbia spend less than 60 percent.

Although Georgia already was at 63.6 percent, Gov. Sonny Perdue won passage of a 65 percent requirement. Gov. Kathleen Sebelius signed legislation making 65 percent "the public policy goal of the state of Kansas." Texas Gov. Rick Perry did it by executive order.

Louisiana's legislature unanimously asked the state Board of Elementary and Secondary Education to enact the 65 percent goal. (It has not yet done so.) In Colorado, an initiative to mandate 65 percent is on the November ballot. Signatures are being gathered to put such an initiative on Oregon's 2008 ballot. When Minnesota's Democratic-controlled Senate blocked passage of a 65 percent requirement, Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty called for a 70 percent requirement. Republican gubernatorial candidates in Florida, Colorado, Ohio, Michigan and Wisconsin endorse the idea.

But in July the National Center for Education Statistics, part of the U.S. Education Department, undermined this national effort. A report on expenditures for public elementary and secondary education for the 2003-04 school year contained this finding: "The percentage of current expenditures spent on instruction and instruction-related activities was 66.1 percent in 2003-04 for the nation as a whole" (emphasis added). Seasoned students of government verbiage noted the suspiciously vague phrase "instruction-related activities."

Opacity is a sign of insincerity: Government language becomes opaque as the government's conscience becomes uneasy. When no Iraqi weapons of mass destruction were found, the U.S. government began speaking foggily of finding "weapons of mass destruction-related program activities."

Now that Americans' concern is shifting from how much money is spent on education to how much education the money is buying, government has blurred the measurement in a way that says 66.1 percent of education dollars already reach the classroom. If the "instruction-related" criterion is not added, the percentage of dollars devoted to instruction has declined for five consecutive years, to 61.3.

The 65 percent standard requires transparency from state education establishments, which may explain resistance to it. In Oregon, the House majority leader and chairman of the education committee have asked school districts for documentation of spending patterns, but no district has responded. A state senator says a lobbyist for the Oregon School Boards Association told him that he had asked them not to respond.

Perhaps Oregon's school bureaucrats are similar to Oklahoma's. The Oklahoma Council of Public Affairs, a think tank, asked all 539 school districts for spending details such as the number of employees making more than $75,000 a year; payments for lobbying and public relations; information as to whether competitive bidding was required for maintenance, food and transportation services; and the number of automobiles owned or reimbursed by the districts. (Many districts purchase vehicle insurance through the Oklahoma State School Boards Association, which can spend the profits it makes from this on lobbying the legislature and whose members have gone to court to keep a 65 percent requirement off this November's ballot.) Two-thirds of Oklahoma's districts have not responded.

Warren Buffett has written that "yardsticks seldom are discarded while yielding favorable readings," but when readings are unfavorable, "a more flexible measurement system often suggests itself: Just shoot the arrow of business performance into a blank canvas and then carefully draw the bull's-eye around the implanted arrow."

No Child Left Behind supposedly promotes education accountability by mandating reliable data to measure progress. But Washington looks like an untrustworthy manipulator of data when it uses the phrase "instruction-related activity" to draw a bull's-eye around the status quo.

THE EDUCATION ISSUE (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act was premised on three revolutionary goals. The first was to focus on low-performing schools and students; hence, No Child Left Behind. The second was to beef up the federal role in education, enforcing national standards through testing. The third was to bring facts and evidence to the notoriously squishy world of education policy, promoting teaching methods backed by "scientifically based research" instead of instinct and fad. This was the least-publicized goal, but arguably the most vital; the phrase "scientifically based research" appeared more than 100 times in the landmark 2001 law.

The centerpiece of the new research-based approach was Reading First, a $1 billion-a-year effort to help low-income schools adopt strategies "that have been proven to prevent or remediate reading failure" through rigorous peer-reviewed studies. "Quite simply, Reading First focuses on what works, and will support proven methods of early reading instruction," the Education Department promised.

Five years later, an accumulating mound of evidence from reports, interviews and program documents suggests that Reading First has had little to do with science or rigor. Instead, the billions have gone to what is effectively a pilot project for untested programs with friends in high places.

Department officials and a small group of influential contractors have strong-armed states and local districts into adopting a small group of unproved textbooks and reading programs with almost no peer-reviewed research behind them. The commercial interests behind those textbooks and programs have paid royalties and consulting fees to the key Reading First contractors, who also served as consultants for states seeking grants and chaired the panels approving the grants. Both the architect of Reading First and former education secretary Roderick R. Paige have gone to work for the owner of one of those programs, who is also a top Bush fundraiser.

On Sept. 22, the department's inspector general released a report exposing some of Reading First's favoritism and mismanagement. The highlights were internal e-mails from then-program director Chris Doherty, vowing to deny funding to programs that weren't part of the department's in-crowd: "They are trying to crash our party and we need to beat the [expletive] out of them in front of all the other would-be party crashers who are standing on the front lawn waiting to see how we welcome these dirtbags."

Doherty has since resigned, and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has pledged to review Reading First, emphasizing that the "individual mistakes" detailed in the report occurred before she became secretary. Still, Spellings expressed full confidence in the overall program: "Thanks to Reading First, struggling students are far more likely to get the help they need from teachers using scientifically based classroom reading instruction."

But the report barely scratched the surface of the incestuous process that dominated the formation of Reading First. The initiative didn't promote scientifically based reading instruction, the third goal of No Child Left Behind. And it's providing ammunition to critics of the second goal, strong national standards. The billion-dollar question is whether it may imperil the first goal: Will some children get left behind?

Bush administration officials frequently say that Reading First does not play favorites or intrude on local control, that states and districts are free to choose their own textbooks and programs -- as long as they're backed by sound science. But aggressive muckraking by the newsletter Title 1 Monitor and reading advocates at the Success for All Foundation have eviscerated those claims, and the inspector general's report officially contradicted them, accusing the department of breaking the law by promoting its pet programs and squelching others. In his internal e-mails, Doherty frequently admitted using "extralegal" tactics to force states and local districts to do the department's bidding. A report by Success for All documented how state applications for Reading First grants that promoted the preferred programs were the only ones approved.

In fact, the vast majority of the 4,800 Reading First schools have now adopted one of the five or six top-selling commercial textbooks, even though none of them has been evaluated in a peer-reviewed study against a control group. Most of the schools also use the same assessment program, the same instructional model, and one of three training programs developed by Reading First insiders -- with little research backing.

"They kept denying it, but everybody knew the department had a list," said Jady Johnson, director of the Reading Recovery Council of North America. "They're forcing schools to spend millions on ineffective programs."

To some extent, the controversy over Reading First reflects an older controversy over reading, pitting "phonics" advocates such as Doherty against "whole language" practitioners such as Johnson.

The administration believes in phonics, which emphasizes repetitive drills that teach children to sound out words. Johnson and other phonics skeptics try to teach the meaning and context of words as well. Reading First money has been steered toward states and local districts that go the phonics route, largely because the Reading First panels that oversaw state applications were stacked with department officials and other phonics fans. "Stack the panel?" Doherty joked in one e-mail. "I have never heard of such a thing . . . <harrumph, harrumph>." When Reid Lyon, who designed Reading First, complained that a whole-language proponent had received an invitation to participate on an evaluation panel, a top department official replied: "We can't un-invite her. Just make sure she is on a panel with one of our barracuda types."

Doherty bragged to Lyon about pressuring Maine, Mississippi and New Jersey to reverse decisions to allow whole-language programs in their schools: "This is for your FYI, as I think this program-bashing is best done off or under the major radar screens." Massachusetts and North Dakota were also told to drop whole-language programs such as Rigby Literacy, and districts that didn't do so lost funding. "Ha, ha--Rigby as a CORE program?" Doherty wrote in one internal e-mail. "When pigs fly!"

Said Bruce Hunter, a lobbyist for the American Association of School Administrators: "It's been obvious all along that the administration knew exactly what it wanted."

But it wasn't just about phonics.

Success for All is the phonics program with the strongest record of scientifically proved results, backed by 31 studies rated "conclusive" by the American Institutes for Research. And it has been shut out of Reading First. The nonprofit Success for All Foundation has shed 60 percent of its staff since Reading First began; the program had been growing rapidly, but now 300 schools have dropped it. Betsy Ammons, a principal in North Carolina, watched Success for All improve reading scores at her school, but state officials made her switch to traditional textbooks to qualify for the new grants.

"You can't afford to turn down the federal money," Ammons said. "But why should we have to give up on something that works?"

The answer lies in the Reading First grant process, which was almost comically skewed. Michigan was the first state approved, after it simply proposed to adopt the five best-selling textbooks. But when Rhode Island officials proposed to require "high-quality reading programs that meet the test of having a scientific research base," they were rejected. Doherty told them to check out Michigan's list, so they cut and pasted it into their application, while suggesting that districts could still adopt other programs justified by research. They were rejected again. So they limited their program to the textbooks. Only then were they approved. Similarly, Oklahoma unsuccessfully proposed to require reading programs backed by three years of longitudinal data before it got the hint and proposed the Michigan list.

So instead of advocating scientifically based reading programs, Reading First has promoted programs with "key elements" endorsed by a national reading panel, which could describe almost any program. It may not be a coincidence that the initiative was essentially outsourced to a few experts with a dizzying array of apparent conflicts of interest.

For example, when the department needed reviewers to evaluate reading assessment programs, it contracted with a University of Oregon team led by Edward Kame'enui, Roland Good and Deborah Simmons. Good had developed an assessment called Dynamic Indicators of Basic Early Literacy Skills (DIBELS), and Kame'enui, Good and Simmons had all served on the design team for Voyager Passport, a remedial program built around DIBELS. Ultimately, DIBELS was the only assessment used in Reading First, and Voyager was the most popular supplemental program.

Similarly, the department steered states to just three providers of professional development services: Kame'enui and Simmons at Oregon, Louisa C. Moats at the for-profit Sopris West, and Sharon Vaughn at the University of Texas at Austin. Vaughn was the other member of the Voyager Passport design team, and one of the four chairmen of the secretary's Reading Leadership Academy, which exerted enormous influence over Reading First; the others were Moats, Kame'enui and his Oregon colleague Douglas Carnine. States such as Alabama, North Carolina and Washington specified in their Reading First grants that every one of their reviewers for local proposals would have to be approved by one of those chairmen.

Kame'enui and Simmons also wrote the "Consumer's Guide" that most states agreed to use to evaluate Reading First programs, and ran one of Reading First's three "technical assistance centers" at Oregon. They co-wrote one Reading First textbook, and Kame'enui earned more than $100,000 last year from royalties on another, according to his financial disclosure when he moved to an Education Department job. In her 2004 book "In Defense of Our Children: When Politics, Profit, and Education Collide," Elaine Garan recalled color-coding the various financial connections running through Reading First; when it came to Kame'enui, she wrote, "I ran out of colors."

The department declined a request to interview Kame'enui, but Undersecretary Henry Johnson said the department takes conflicts of interest seriously, and will adopt all the inspector general's recommendations. "We're going to dig into this," he said.

But Johnson said states are ultimately responsible for making sure their programs are scientifically based, which is small comfort for applicants pressured into adopting programs they didn't want. "It's been very frustrating for those of us who really believe in evidence-based programs," said Richard Long, a lobbyist for the International Reading Association, which represents 90,000 reading teachers and specialists nationwide.

Then again, Long thinks spending $1 billion a year on reading is a great idea. And he thinks it's helping kids to read: "Have there been mistakes in implementation? Oh yeah. But teachers in Reading First schools believe progress is being made."

The bottom line, Johnson said, is that Reading First works. A department report found that teachers in Reading First schools spent 19 minutes more per day on reading than teachers in other schools, and were more likely to place struggling students in reading intervention programs. A new report by the nonpartisan Center on Education Policy suggested that Reading First is having a positive effect on state reading scores, although Johnson said much more needs to be done.

"Despite all the problems with Reading First, there's evidence that it's helping states," said Jack Jennings, the center's president.

DOJ_NMG_0072321

Of course, $5 billion over five years ought to help states; the question is whether it's helping as much as it should. Without the kind of rigorous studies the law promised but the implementers failed to deliver, it's not clear.

But it is clear that Reading First has been a terrific boon for the textbook publishing industry, and for the department's favored programs. For example, the company that developed Voyager Passport was valued at about $5 million in a newspaper article before Reading First; founder Randy Best, whose Republican fundraising made him a Bush Pioneer, eventually sold it for $380 million. He then put Lyon and Paige on his payroll.

Local domination of education is an American tradition, and Bush took up a storied cause in challenging it; reformers since Horace Mann have promoted national education policy as a way to encourage common culture and equal opportunity. But local-control advocates have always warned that empowering heavy-handed federal bureaucrats would breed self-serving, one-size-fits-all solutions. Now, Reading First is making them look like prophets.

THE EDUCATION ISSUE (WP)

By Paul A. Hanle

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

I recently addressed a group of French engineering graduate students who were visiting Washington from the prestigious School of Mines in Paris. After encouraging them to teach biotechnology in French high schools, I expected the standard queries on teaching methods or training. Instead, a bright young student asked bluntly: "How can you teach biotechnology in this country when you don't even accept evolution?"

I wanted to disagree, but the kid had a point. Proponents of "intelligent design" in the United States are waging a war against teaching science as scientists understand it. Over the past year alone, efforts to incorporate creationist language or undermine evolution in science classrooms at public schools have emerged in at least 15 states, according to the National Center for Science Education. And an independent education foundation has concluded that science-teaching standards in 10 states fail to address evolution in a scientifically sound way. Through changes in standards and curriculum, these efforts urge students to doubt evolution -- the cornerstone principle of biology, one on which there is no serious scientific debate.

This war could decimate the development of U.S. scientific talent and erode whatever competitive advantage the United States enjoys in the technology-based global economy. Already, U.S. high school students lag near the bottom in math skills compared with students in other developed nations, and high school seniors are performing worse in science than they were 10 years ago.

These trends can only worsen if students come to regard evolution as questionable or controversial. Thirty-seven percent of the high school Advanced Placement biology examination tests knowledge of evolution, evolutionary biology and heredity, according to the College Board. Students who do not thoroughly understand evolution cannot hope to succeed on this exam; they will be handicapped in competitive science courses in college and the careers that may follow.

By teaching intelligent design or other variants of creationism in science classes at public schools -- or by undercutting the credibility of evolution -- we are greatly diminishing our chances for future scientific breakthroughs and technological innovations, and are endangering our health, safety and economic well-being as individuals and as a nation.

This is not a war of religion against science. The two have thrived together for centuries. Nor is it a struggle of believers against godless materialists; many believers practice science and find inspiration for it from their faith. It is a battle between religious dogma cloaked as science and open inquiry that leads to new knowledge and understanding of the natural world.

The notion of intelligent design is clever; it has a certain philosophical appeal. The evolution of a human eye from a series of random mutations, for example, is indeed difficult to understand; the notion of an intelligent creator solves such problems, and feeds our spiritual needs. But it distracts us from learning what is scientifically testable and reduces students' will to probe the natural world.

The opposition to evolution discourages the development of entire high-school classes of future scientific talent. "It seems like a raw deal for the 14-year-old girl in Topeka who might have gone on to find a cure for resistant infections if only she had been taught evolution in high school," H. Holden Thorp, chairman of the chemistry department at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, wrote in the New York Times last spring.

Multiply that girl's plight thousands of times -- in school districts in Georgia, Kansas, Ohio and other states that are discouraging the teaching of evolution.

Last year, a report from the National Academies' Committee on Prospering in the Global Economy of the 21st Century showed us a glimpse of the future. Of all the patent applications reaching the U.S. Patent Office, the report noted, the most by far still come from the United States. However, from 1989 to 2001, the rate of increase of patent applications from the world's fastest-growing economies, such as China and India, was nearly three times that of the United States. By that measure, innovation in those economies will blow past ours in little more than a decade -- just about the time the current classes of high school biology students will be starting their research careers.

Non-scientific viewpoints deserve respect. But to combat the spread of HIV/AIDS, bio-warfare and pandemic diseases, to discover lifesaving cures and life-improving breakthroughs, tomorrow's biologists must be equipped with scientifically based knowledge today.

Nations that value open inquiry and use scientific criteria in education, research and industry will outperform those that do not. If we are to continue to be leaders in the global economy, we must teach science, not religion, in the science classroom .

Early Admissions Aren't The Problem (WP)

By Amy Gutmann

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

To end or not to end early admissions: That is the question that colleges and universities are debating once again. The passion is great, but the stakes are small and the debate is a distraction from a far more important matter: the urgent need of all but a handful of colleges and universities to improve financial aid for students from low-income and middle-income families.

At the University of Pennsylvania and many other colleges and universities, early admissions have not been an impediment to improving access, and abolishing the practice will do no significant social good. Because of our outreach activities and improved financial aid policies, many more minorities and low-income students are applying to Penn for both early and regular decisions. Once again this year we enrolled a record number (and proportion) of minority students.

But we will accomplish nothing significant in improving access for students from low- and middle-income families unless we focus our attention on strengthening our need-based financial aid program and our outreach to students who attend schools where they have not been informed about the availability of need-based financial aid.

Financial aid based on need is the great equalizer of opportunity in higher education. Nothing promotes equity and socioeconomic diversity more effectively. Even if tuition rates were frozen, a college education would simply be out of reach for low-income and most middle-income families were it not for need-based financial aid.

Over the past two decades, most colleges and universities have moved in precisely the wrong direction: They have increasingly relied on merit-based aid (scholarships based on scholastic ability) and athletic scholarships, both of which disproportionately favor students from higher-income families, rather than need-based aid. Consequently, they have widened the enrollment gap between high-income and both middle- and low-income students.

Recently a relatively tiny number of colleges and universities (Penn included) have dramatically improved financial aid -- based on need -- for low-income students. Last year we substituted grants for loans for students from families earning less than $50,000 a year.

The road to greater access must be paved with more than good intentions. Making college truly accessible to middle-income as well as low-income students is a daunting financial challenge. The total increase in grant aid at Penn over the past five years has been twice the rate of our tuition increases. For colleges and universities to do our part in making high-quality higher education affordable -- and therefore accessible -- to talented, hardworking students from all backgrounds, fundraising for need-based financial aid must take priority.

The stakes are even higher than is conveyed by the ideal of equal educational opportunity. American democracy can flourish and our economy remain competitive on a global stage only if we offer the highest-quality education to the most talented children from all socioeconomic backgrounds. For the sake of our nation's future, federal and state governments need to do their part in improving elementary and secondary education and in joining with us -- for example, by significantly increasing the level of Pell grants and extending financial aid to more middle-income students -- to make college a realistic aspiration for all.

Both the ideal of equal educational opportunity and the reality of our country's future standing in the world demand that academia not be distracted by internecine debates in which relatively little will be gained or lost, regardless of who is right, and instead focus our efforts on providing a quality education and increasing financial aid based on need for all students.

THE EDUCATION ISSUE (WP)

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

There should be efforts to very actively recruit middle-class people into neighborhood schools and make sure these really are schools that prepare kids for college. This recruitment has to be done with artistry and couldn't be started without straight talk about education and race.

In the District, you've got all this cherry-picking and vouchers that increases segregation across the system. If you're going to have millions of little charter schools, it's very hard to have a coherent educational plan for the city. The premise of that approach is that it's hopeless and you can just pick on the bones.

Gary Orfield, professor of education and social policy at the Harvard Graduate School of Education

Putting responsibility and authority together in the same place is essential. I think that means having very strong principals in schools. That means giving them authority but it also means rewarding good work. It means paying them very well and making it a very attractive job.

If you have a growing professional class, anything you can do to persuade those parents to keep their kids in the public schools is going to help everybody. Because those parents can be great advocates. And there's a growing body of evidence that diversity is in fact a very powerful educator of people. So part of the pitch to the middle class is to say: At least your kid's going to get a better education.

Colin Diver, president of Reed College, featured in
J. Anthony Lukas's "Common Ground" as a parent of children in the Boston public schools

A hundred efforts to reform the D.C. school system have foundered on the shoals of bureaucratic lethargy, union contracts and messed-up governance. A dozen "reformist" superintendents have come and gone. What's worked best to date -- albeit not perfectly -- is creating alternatives to the system's schools and letting children freely attend them. The District's burgeoning charter-school sector and its scholarship/voucher program attest both to the demand for such alternatives and to the feasibility of providing them. Adrian Fenty should do all within his power to accelerate and intensify this promising strategy.

Chester E. Finn, Jr. senior fellow, Hoover Institution at Stanford University, and president,
Thomas B. Fordham Foundation

Two key things happened in Boston: The city moved from an elected school committee to an appointed one. And Tom Menino as mayor became a real champion of the schools. His two kids graduated from Boston public schools and he's now got five grandchildren in the public schools. You have to show others that you really believe what you're talking about.

Thomas Payzant, superintendent of Boston

public schools from 1995 to 2006

The best way to reform the D.C. public schools is to focus on the fundamentals of education: excellent teachers, experienced principals, manageable class sizes, a solid curriculum and modern facilities. If these fundamentals are missing, then no rearrangement of the structure or control of the school system will make a difference. There are no shortcuts in education, no silver bullets, no magical solutions.

The objective should be small schools of parental choice, each autonomously designed and managed by its teachers and providing a program that is legitimately "college preparatory." In order to do that, the city must push authority down, with district-wide authority vested in a board made up of faculty members of each school. Visitors from D.C. institutions of higher education would formally inspect each school every year, making their findings available to the media. Admission would be by "blind" lottery, except for siblings of students already enrolled, who would be automatically admitted, if their parents desired it.

Students' work must be central and public, and related to the school's broad mission. Only schools whose faculty is as excited as the kids hopefully will be, and whose families and communities presume they are respected partners, can engage the natural curiosity and energies of the young. A good education cannot happen until the young take on the task as their own.

I have never been to a meeting on school reform in the District where students were invited to be part of the conversation. And yet students know what is not working in schools. They will tell me that most adults in their schools do not know them well, and that they are not held accountable for much. They tell me that many teachers talk at them, rather than exploring learning with them. Students want to be involved in improving their schools and they want to be held accountable. D.C. students are very sophisticated about their own education. Most adults do not give them credit for this.

Even If Rates Don't Move, The Interest Bill Will Rise (NYT)

By Daniel Gross

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

MONEY has gotten more expensive. The Federal Reserve's benchmark short-term interest rate has risen to 5.25 percent, from just 1 percent in June 2004. Long-term interest rates have risen less sharply.

When considering the broad impact of higher rates, economists have focused mostly on how they have affected businesses and the vast real estate complex. The truism that higher interest rates function as a tax on people who hold variable debt has been particularly apparent to homeowners holding adjustable-rate mortgages.

Mark Zandi, the chief economist at Moody's Economy.com, notes that about $2 trillion in A.R.M.'s are scheduled to reset at higher rates from the beginning of 2006 to the end of 2008. If the mortgages adjust upward by an average of 2.5 percentage points, the interest payments by holders of such mortgages would be $50 billion higher in 2009 than they are today. "That's not much in the grand scheme of a $13 trillion economy, but it is a problem for those homeowners," Mr. Zandi said.

But a much larger group of Americans is already paying a steeper price: taxpayers. After all, the United States government is the largest adjustable-rate borrower in the world. Each year, the national debt grows. Congress spends more than it is willing to raise in taxes, so it finances operations by selling debt to the public. In the last five years, the gross national debt, which includes bonds pledged to fund Social Security and other entitlements, has risen 46 percent, to about $8.5 trillion, from $5.8 trillion at the end of September 2001.

For much of the last decade, the rising national debt didn't weigh on taxpayers much. Interest rates were generally tame in the late 1990's, and Alan Greenspan, then the Federal Reserve chairman, cut short-term rates repeatedly in 2001 and 2002 and left them at historically low levels through 2004.

"Net interest spending, as a percentage of the overall budget, actually was cut in half between 1995 and 2004 because interest rates were dropping," said Brian M. Riedl, senior budget analyst at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

In the early years of this decade, even as President Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress sharply increased spending, net interest payments fell — to $184 billion in 2005 from $206 billion in 2001.

Now the dynamic is reversing. The government relies on short-term financing to finance its operations, and with interest rates rising, its cost has gone up. According to the Bureau of the Public Debt, the average interest rate paid by the government on public debt rose to 4.853 percent in August from 4.176 percent in the same month last year — a 16 percent increase. As a result, the government's interest bill is expected to rise to $220 billion this year from $184 billion in 2005.

This extra $36 billion makes interest the fastest-growing component of federal spending, noted Adam Hughes, director for federal fiscal policy at OMB Watch in Washington. And it has aggravated the budget strife on Capitol Hill, where bitter debate has raged over spending on everything from legislators' pet projects to the war in Iraq. In fiscal 2005, the government spent more on interest than it did on Medicaid ($182 billion). Citizens Against Government Waste, an advocacy group based in Washington, identified "earmarks" for lawmakers' pet projects that totaled $29 billion in fiscal 2006. "Even if Congress were to get rid of all those, it wouldn't come close to making up for the higher interest payments," Mr. Hughes said.

When it comes to debt, borrowers' pain generally translates into lenders' gains. "The people who are holders of U.S. government bonds benefit because their disposable income rises," said Michael Mussa, senior fellow at the Institute for International Economics.

But a growing proportion of today's higher interest payments are not recycled into the domestic economy. "Since 2000, a large share of the government debt has been financed by foreign purchasers," noted Robert E. Scott, director of international programs at the Economic Policy Institute, based in Washington.

As of June, foreign agencies and institutions owned $2 trillion in United States government securities, or more than 40 percent of the government's debt that is sold in the bond market. And so the rising interest rates are contributing to rising income in China, the Persian Gulf region and Japan. In 2005, the United States government paid about $77 billion in interest to foreign creditors, according to the Commerce Department.

MANY analysts believe that the Federal Reserve has stopped raising short-term rates. And in recent weeks, long-term interest rates have fallen as investors have fretted about slowing growth. But because the government continues to replace lower-yielding securities issued in the last 10 years with higher-yielding debt, the government's interest cost is also expected to continue to grow rapidly. The Congressional Budget Office projects that the interest bill, after climbing nearly 20 percent this year, will rise 13.2 percent in 2007, to $240 billion, and more than 8 percent in 2008, to $270 billion. With each passing year, interest payments are likely to eat up a bigger chunk of total spending and crowd out other priorities.

In February 2004, Mr. Greenspan advised home buyers that they would be better off with adjustable-rate mortgages than they would be with the old-fashioned, fixed-rate variety. Taxpayers now find themselves in the same boat as those who followed Mr. Greenspan's advice, said Maya MacGuineas, president of the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget, based in Washington.

"The government pursued a strategy of borrowing short-term debt while rates were low, so the interest costs would be lower in the short run," she said. "But doing so leaves the borrower in a much more vulnerable situation when rates began to rise."

Happy Birthday, Bull Market. (Now, Make A Wish.) (NYT)

By Paul J. Lim

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072326

NEXT week, the bull market will celebrate its fourth birthday. This means that this bull is on the verge of accomplishing what four of the past seven could not — surviving to at least the start of Year 5.

If history is any guide, that fifth year may be surprisingly robust. Since 1942, bull markets that made it that far still had enough gas in the tank to generate average fifth-year gains of 10 percent, according to Standard & Poor's.

If that's the case, why isn't Wall Street in a more celebratory mood?

It may have to do with how long this bull market is taking to bring stock prices back to their previous highs. It's been more than six years since equity prices peaked, in early 2000. Although the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index has rallied for four consecutive years, that benchmark is still 13 percent below its highest close in the previous bull market. As for the Nasdaq composite index, it is still down a stunning 55 percent from its record high.

To be sure, the Dow Jones industrial average last week flirted with its all-time high close of 11,722.98, set in January 2000. But one reason that the Dow may have recovered faster is that it had a shorter path to travel. From peak to trough, the Dow fell 38 percent in the most recent bear market. Compare that with the 49 percent loss suffered by the S.& P. and the 78 percent plunge in the Nasdaq.

Historically, the S.& P. has needed 3.3 years, on average, to return to new highs after suffering through a bear market, according to an analysis by InvesTech Research. But this time, don't be surprised if it takes significantly longer.

For starters, the bear market that preceded this bull was no ordinary sell-off. "It was the bursting of the largest bubble in U.S. capital markets history," said Robert D. Arnott, chairman of Research Affiliates, an asset management firm based in Pasadena, Calif.

Investors must realize that "great bear markets have a lasting effect," said Jeremy Grantham, chairman of Grantham, Mayo, Van Otterloo, the asset management firm in Boston. This hangover continues to influence the market today, he said.

What's more, not all bull markets are created equal. Many, in fact, have simply not been strong enough to return stocks to their previous highs.

Since September 1900, there have been 33 bull markets, according to Ned Davis Research. Of those 33, only 15 were able to establish new all-time highs. In other words, more than half of all bull markets fail to return stock prices to their prior peaks.

Much of this depends on what kind of bull market you're dealing with. Mr. Arnott says that there are two types of bull and bear markets. First, there are cyclical bulls and bears, which run their course in the span of a few years. Then, there are longer-term, secular bull and bear markets; those can last for decades.

Mr. Arnott noted that short-term cyclical bull markets could occur within longer-term secular bear markets. From 1966 to 1982, for instance, the broad stock market went virtually nowhere. But within that period, there were several cyclical bull and bear markets that sent stocks prices up and down.

Many market strategists say that the current bull market is a cyclical rally stuck within a secular bear. One telltale sign is that the S.& P. has yet to revisit its record high.

Consider, too, the modest range of the recent four-year rally. "While this has been one of the longest bull markets we've seen historically," Mr. Arnott said, "it's also been among the weakest."

From the market trough in Oct. 9, 2002, the S.& P. 500 has climbed 72 percent. By comparison, the average bull market has returned almost twice as much from trough to peak, based on data back to 1932, according to InvesTech.

The solid but unspectacular returns are a classic symptom of a cyclical bull within a secular bear market, said Jeffrey A. Hirsch, editor in chief of the Stock Trader's Almanac.

Mr. Hirsch recently studied past cyclical bulls trapped in secular bears. In those instances, the Dow rose by only around 35 percent, on average, going back to 1929. By comparison, cyclical rallies within secular bull markets have typically pushed stocks higher by 110 percent. For the record, the Dow is up by about 60 percent in the current bull market.

The last cyclical bull market to occur within a secular bear started in October 1974, according to S.& P. I It's hard to miss the similarities between today's market and that one.

Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist at S.& P., noted that the bull that started in 1974 produced gains of 38 percent in the first 12 months, 21 percent in the next 12 months, a loss of 8 percent in the third year and 7 percent gains in the fourth and fifth.

DOJ_NMG_0072327

In the current bull run, the S.& P. 500 gained 34 percent in the first year, 8 percent in the second and 7 percent in the third. And it is up by about 12 percent so far in the fourth.

Mr. Stovall added that the two periods have other things in common, like “high oil prices, concerns over inflation, fallout from an expensive and unpopular war and a not-so-popular Republican president in his second term.”

If this is a secular bear market, how long until it goes back into hibernation? That’s hard to say.

Given the enormity of the late-90’s bubble and the duration of past secular bear markets, Mr. Arnott said, it could be that, taking inflation into account, “15 years from now, stock prices won’t be materially higher than they are today.”

If he’s right, investors will have to rely less on capital appreciation and more on personal savings to help them reach their investment goals. “They’re going to have to save more aggressively to get ahead,” he said.

Investors must also reset their overall expectations. Just because we’re in a bull market right now, the stock market won’t necessarily produce the 20-percent-plus annual gains to which investors grew accustomed in the late 1990’s.

“Forget it,” Mr. Arnott said. “Wake up — this is a different market.”

After Midterm Elections, The Party Begins (WSJ)

By KAREN TALLEY And MOHAMMED HADI

The Wall Street Journal, October 1, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average didn't manage to set a new record last week. But hang on. History suggests there's a good chance it will after the Nov. 7 election.

Stocks tend to do very well following midterm elections, which occur two years into each presidential term. Indeed, since 1950, the average return for the Dow Jones Industrial Average from the November of a midterm-election year through the following October has been 18.6%. That's far better than the average annual gain of 8.4% from November 1950 through October 2003, a year after the last midterm election, in 2002.

That's a historical record that professional investors and other market watchers have a hard time ignoring, even as they speculate about why it's been the case.

Most commonly, the market advances are thought to be driven by expectations that elected officials will strive mightily to boost the U.S. economy -- such as by tax cuts or increased government spending -- before the coming presidential elections.

"Once you get past the midterm election, the focus of the entire government becomes the economy," explains Marc Pado, U.S. market strategist at Cantor Fitzgerald.

A Boost from the Fed

And there's another trend that tends to coincide with the year after a midterm election. The Federal Reserve is often moving from raising interest rates to lowering them.

From a stock-market standpoint, that signals more corporate expansion and the prospect of higher profits, says Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Wealth Management in Philadelphia.

A move by the Fed to cut rates "is good news because it encourages investors to put more money in the [stock] market and drive it higher," Mr. Kleintop explains. That indeed may be the direction the Fed is currently headed, after holding its target short-term interest rate steady at two meetings after a long series of rate boosts since 2004.

On average, historically, it hasn't made a big difference for stock performance which political party does better in the midterm elections.

In a recent research note, Alec Phillips, Goldman Sachs vice president of Washington research, tracked returns following midterm elections since 1950.

When Republicans controlled both the Senate and the House of Representatives, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose nearly 26% in the almost 14 months from Election Day to the end of the following year. When Democrats controlled Congress, the S&P 500 advanced by nearly 23% on average.

Why Gridlock Is Good

The best performance, though, a rise of 28%, occurred in periods of "gridlock," when the parties split control of Congress, making it tough for either party to advance its agenda. That congressional gridlock is the best possible situation for stocks makes sense to Barry James, president of fund manager James Investment Research in Alpha, Ohio. "A do-nothing Congress is better than a do-something Congress, because it takes away uncertainty," he says.

Barry Ritholtz, chief market strategist at Ritholtz Research & Analytics in New York, concurs: "The diversity forces everybody into the middle, because no one has absolute control. That means more compromises and less extreme legislation, like very big tax hikes or increased deficits," he says.

While Republicans currently are in the majority in both houses, it appears that Democrats have a good chance to retake the House and lower odds in the Senate.

To be sure, most money managers say investors shouldn't put too much stock in historical patterns such as these rallies after midterm elections. This year, for instance, Mr. James says concerns about the slowing economy should temper any enthusiasm based on past trends.

That doesn't mean he's running away from stocks. Rather, Mr. James says he is seeking out those companies that "have a history of good earnings and are trading at multiples below the market."

Liz Ann Sonders, chief investment strategist at Charles Schwab, adds that while the post-election trend is pretty powerful, "I don't tend to ever look at one thing as gospel for what the market is going to do. It just has to go into the mix of indicators that you look at."

Housing Drag

Like Mr. James, she thinks much will depend on whether the economy can avoid slipping into recession, and on whether the housing slowdown drags consumer spending with it. Right now, Ms. Sonders thinks there's a 50/50 chance of a recession -- worse odds than many others give the economy.

With the economic uncertainty, "we're not looking to swing for the fences," she says. Moreover, she notes that investors can currently earn as much as 5.25% annual interest in low-risk savings accounts.

Mr. Kleintop of PNC Wealth Management is fairly optimistic these days, predicting "an extension of the rally we've seen in recent months, as we benefit from a number of catalysts, including the midterm election and the Fed moving into easing mode."

Winners by Party

With five weeks to Election Day, meanwhile, some investors are speculating about stock-market sectors that could benefit or suffer if the Democrats gain additional power in Congress.

For example, Mr. Pado of Cantor Fitzgerald says a Republican victory could lead to tax breaks that benefit the wealthy, and thus might drive spending on high-end consumer goods. Democrats instead might push tax cuts for middle-income Americans, which could benefit "Sears and J.C. Penney more than Nordstrom," he says.

Under Democratic majorities, efforts to raise the minimum wage could heat up. A higher minimum wage could be a negative for retailers and fast-food chains.

Outlook for Health Stocks?

Healthcare companies could see an effect in terms of legislation that encourages greater use of generic drugs, which could hurt major drug companies. The big pharmaceutical firms could also be affected by Democrats pushing for the Medicare drug program to be able to negotiate volume price discounts with the drug manufacturers.

Democrats might also reverse or ease up on favorable tax treatment for big oil companies. And conversely, the alternative-energy sector -- focused on areas such as solar, wind and thermal power -- could get a boost.

"I wouldn't be surprised to see Democrats move towards subsidies or tax cuts" that favor alternative energy, Mr. Ritholtz of Ritholtz Research says.

Bush Still Serves As GOP's Fundraiser In Chief (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

A sitting president is always a big draw. This one reaches beyond the party's top politicians to campaign on behalf of its House candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0072329

WASHINGTON — President Bush has raised more than $180 million for the Republican Party and its candidates since he was reelected — an average of more than $261,000 per day. And now, the pace is picking up.

This week, he begins a Western fundraising trip: Monday in Reno; Tuesday in Stockton, El Dorado County and Bel-Air; and Wednesday in Scottsdale, Ariz., and Englewood, Colo.

Among the beneficiaries in California will be Reps. Richard W. Pombo (R-Tracy) and John T. Doolittle (R-Roseville). Each has had ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and each was considered vulnerable earlier in the campaign. But both represent Republican-leaning districts, and their standings are believed to have improved.

Bush's trip is part of what aides say will be an active travel schedule as the November elections approach. Although the president himself is not on any ballot, the results Nov. 7 could go a long way toward determining the outcome of his final two years in office.

If Democrats wind up with a net gain of six Senate seats, they win control of the Senate; in the House, a pickup of 15 seats would turn the chamber over to the Democrats.

"If the Democrats take over, it will make life much worse" for Bush, said Gary Jacobson, a political science professor at UC San Diego. "Democrats will start talking about accountability, investigating management of the war in Iraq, and there will be endless headaches for him."

Bush will spend more time campaigning for GOP candidates in these weeks before election day, aides said. The White House continues to receive more requests for Bush's time as a campaigner than he can meet, said Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino. "Supply is not keeping up with demand," she said.

Bush has never been reluctant to stick his hand out and ask for money for the GOP. Over nearly six years in office, he has done so more than 200 times.

The result in just the current 2005-2006 campaign cycle has been a gross of $182 million as of Thursday, said Republican National Committee spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt.

Vice President Dick Cheney has brought in an additional $38 million, and Laura Bush $13 million.

To put the money chase into perspective, as of midSeptember, the major Republican fundraising operations — the National Committee and the committees overseeing party campaigns for the Senate and House — reported that they had brought in $369 million in the two-year cycle. By comparison, the Democrats' groups reported $264 million.

Bush's fundraising helped build the GOP groups' total, but some of the money he raised went to other outlets, such as state Republican organizations, gubernatorial candidates and individual candidates for Congress.

Presidents have long been top-draw political fundraisers. What is different now is the mix of candidates for whom Bush is working.

Until recently, presidents generally restricted their fundraising to gala affairs for their national parties and the occasional gubernatorial or Senate candidate — the top dogs in the political world.

But Bush is making the pitch further down the ticket, for Republican House members. This year, he campaigned for five non-incumbents — candidates who in the past would have been lucky to have drawn a vice president or a leader in the Senate or House.

It used to be that "every once in a while a president went out and did a House race," said Anthony Corrado, a professor of government at Colby College in Maine. But throughout Bush's presidency, he said, House races have been on the agenda — even more than under President Clinton, an inveterate campaigner.

This reflects the possibility that Democrats will seize the majority in November's election, and the threat that could pose to Bush's final two years in office.

Given that Bush's approval ratings are in the low 40s in many polls, there is debate about whether the presidential visits help Republican candidates in tightly contested districts.

But Rep. Bob Beauprez, a Republican running for governor of Colorado, said Bush remained a campaign asset.

"He is the president, after all, and there's only one of them. And I think the mood of the general public is very much starting to think, 'You know, we still do have this safety, this security issue that is out there, and we haven't been attacked in five years.' "

DOJ_NMG_0072330

Besides, he said, Bush stirs the most loyal voters to get to the polls — the eventual theme of any campaign as it shifts from fundraising to voter turnout.

"Part of the issue in this election is making sure our base comes home, and there isn't anybody that can rally the base better than the president of the United States when he's your president," Beauprez said.

Cheney Shelves Enmity To Celebrate A Milestone (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Reporters traveling with Vice President Dick Cheney were treated to an odd celebration last week aboard Air Force Two after he headlined his 100th campaign fundraiser of the 2005-06 election cycle.

It was a milestone like no other, in part because of Cheney's famous animosity toward the media. But no matter — en route from Grand Rapids, Mich., to Andrews Air Force Base here, Cheney briefly emerged from his private cabin for some cake and banter.

It was a sharp contrast to previous outings.

Cheney rarely takes reporters with him and when he does, generally avoids unscripted contact or gratuitous hospitality.

On a memorable trip overseas, Cheney commandeered one of just two working electrical outlets on board so he could recharge his iPod, thwarting journalists efforts' to file their stories on deadline.

So there was a certain amount of puzzlement last week when reporters were beckoned to the front of the cabin by Cheney's staffers, who had procured bakery goods marking Cheney's milestone.

"You're the only one who's been to all one hundred," Cheney's political director, Mel Raines, told the vice president.

"And I'm the only one who always has to give a speech," Cheney replied.

The cake was white with raspberry filling, with white frosting and red, white and blue frosted bunting. The message on the top read, "100 On to Victory."

"Does my wife know about this?" Cheney asked.

After handing out cake, Cheney was asked which of the 100 events was most memorable. He thought for a moment before giving up.

"Stuff from 30 years ago is easier to remember," Cheney said. "The rest is a blur."

Bush's road show heads to the WestPresident Bush so far has done 55 fundraisers in the same time frame, with just over half closed to the media.

Who knows what goes on behind closed doors? White House officials said Bush's events are generally closed when they are in a private home.

This week, the president is heading west for three days of political fundraising in Nevada, California, Arizona and Colorado. Most of the events are open to correspondents, with limited access for cameras.

In rare move, Snow to hit the money trail

Apparently in response to popular demand, White House spokesman Tony Snow as well will be hitting the hustings to raise money for the party and its candidates this fall.

It's an unprecedented move for any White House spokesman. It's also a revealing byproduct of the television age, which has made minor celebrities of a succession of presidential mouthpieces.

"These are not going to be speeches where I go out and start railing against Democrats," Snow said. "What I'm going to do is talk about the president's record and what he's done."

The few events he's done so far have been closed to the media; Snow said he expects upcoming events to be open. On whether he saw any conflict in the White House spokesman operating in political secrecy, Snow said, "That's a good question."

DOJ_NMG_0072331

"I was approached by the political office saying that we've got a lot of inquiries and a lot of people would like (me) to do this," Snow said. "What followed were a long series of conversations, because I think this is pretty unplowed ground."

The Republican National Committee will be paying Snow's expenses. The spokesman said it's being left up to him to set the ground rules for what he can say to political groups.

"If I overstep, you can whack me," Snow said.

Short take

"We're both beneficiaries of continuing low expectations," Bush said last week to embattled Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa.

In Taking On Fox, Democrats See Reward In The Risk (NYT)

By Lorne Manly

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

THE Fox News Channel doesn't officially turn 10 until this week, but the Democrats have already begun doing their best to spoil the celebrations.

The party crashing began last Sunday, when former President Bill Clinton transformed an interview with Chris Wallace on "Fox News Sunday" into a finger-pointing tirade against what he called a "conservative hit job." Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, quickly released a statement applauding Mr. Clinton for standing up to what he described as a right-wing, bullying propaganda machine.

In separate appearances on Fox News over the next two days, Lanny J. Davis, a former special counsel to Mr. Clinton, and Barbara Boxer, the Democratic senator from California, mocked the news channel's trademarked motto of being "fair and balanced."

And on Wednesday Paul Begala and James Carville, Democratic commentators for CNN, engaged in more than five minutes of high-decibel debate on Fox with Bill O'Reilly about Mr. Clinton's appearance, daring Mr. O'Reilly to "come out of the closet" and admit Fox News is a "right-leaning, anti-Clinton network."

The attacks represent a new twist on the Democrats' complicated dance with the cable news channel. Though Fox News maintains that its reporting is down the middle, Democrats have long complained that the news channel operates like a public relations outpost of the Bush White House. But never before has that anger built into a mad-as-hell-and-not-going-to-take-it-any-more moment, and spilled over in such naked and sustained fashion onto Fox News itself.

"The Republicans are using Fox News to gin up their base, and now — for the first time — the Democrats are doing it, too," said Steve McMahon, a Democratic strategist with McMahon, Squier & Associates who handled Mr. Dean's presidential campaign.

Engaging Fox News in such an aggressive manner, however, may not be the smartest strategy. If there's a base that needs energizing for these midterm elections, it belongs to the Republicans, and a Clinton-led attack may only revivify them. And so far, there is just one clear beneficiary: Fox News. The news channel has highlighted the contretemps on many of its programs, boosting the ratings in the process.

Democrats do not view Chris Wallace as a partisan gunslinger, as they do some other Fox News personalities. But his questions about whether Mr. Clinton did enough to destroy Al Qaeda ignited simmering Democratic and Clintonian anger.

Democrats had been furious with White House attempts over the last few months to to portray Democrats as weaker on national security than Republicans. And defenders of the Clinton administration were furious about "The Path to 9/11," the ABC docudrama that they claimed depicted the administration in an unfair light. All this fed into last week's reaction, Democratic officials and strategists say. "I think it's important for us to call it what it is," said Karen Finney, communications director for the Democratic National Committee, speaking about the recent incidents. "We can't let conservatives and Republicans get away with painting us in a corner and mischaracterizing who we are and what we stand for."

The incendiary interview appeared on the same day the pessimistic National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq was leaked. And the two events provided an opportune moment to strike, Ms. Finney said.

DOJ_NMG_0072332

Soon after the "Fox News Sunday" telecast, Mr. Dean mentioned both items in a combative statement. And the Democratic National Committee followed up Mr. Dean's statement with an e-mail fundraising appeal, complete with a YouTube link to the interview.

"I think you're seeing the beginning of an alternative Democratic approach," a desire to strike back hard, said Mr. Begala, a former Clinton adviser.

"Clinton tapped into something in the Democratic zeitgeist," Mr. Begala said. "We're really tired of being bullied, particularly by Fox."

Democrats have believed, nearly from the moment Fox News began in October of 1996, that the news channel was institutionally biased against them. Fox News officials have disputed such charges, saying the network is merely a corrective to what they contend is a pervasive liberal bias in the news media.

Nonetheless, most Democrats have believed the network could not be ignored. If no one appeared on their shows, who would make the Democratic case? The cable news channel, despite a fall-off in ratings over the past year, still towers over its competitors. And although the viewers who regularly watch Fox News are more likely to be Republican, Democrats and independents still turn up in significant numbers — 20 percent and 17 percent, respectively, compared with 34 percent who are Republicans — according to a recent survey from the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.

Swing voters are important in some states, particularly the Northeast. How they react to the Democrats' more confrontational approach could help determine how far the Democrats get in their efforts to gain control of the House and Senate.

Some Democrats said they believe that a more muscular approach in taking on the Republicans could help them grab onto an issue that has been an Achilles' heel for the Democrats in recent elections: national security.

And that couldn't make some Republicans happier. "I think it puts national security front and center and reminds people that this administration is taking the fight to the terrorists and recognizes the threat America faces," something the Democrats do not, said Danny Diaz, Republican National Committee spokesman.

The Republican National Committee is doing its bit to spread that point of view. After the Clinton interview, it sent talking points to its grassroots membership and to the news media, and ramped up efforts to book people on TV and radio programs to comment on the debate.

And Fox News executives have not seemed to mind furnishing screen time to Democrats so they can bash the network. (Roger Ailes, the chairman and chief executive of Fox News and Fox Television Stations, was unavailable to comment for this article.)

After all, the ratings don't lie.

The first three days of the week saw primetime and daily increases of 20 percent and 13 percent, respectively, compared with the average over the previous four weeks. And "Fox News Sunday" got its best ratings in three years.

Pastors Guiding Voters To GOP (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

The Christian right seeks out members who might not go to the polls. The focus is issues, but some leaders don't oppose endorsement.

With a pivotal election five weeks away, leaders on the religious right have launched an all-out drive to get Christians from pew to voting booth. Their target: the nearly 30 million Americans who attend church at least once a week but did not vote in 2004.

Their efforts at times push legal limits on church involvement in partisan campaigns. That is by design. With control of Congress at stake Nov. 7, those guiding the movement say they owe it to God and to their own moral principles to do everything they can to keep social conservatives in power.

Preachers "ought to put their toe right on the line," said Mathew D. Staver, founder of Liberty Counsel, a nonprofit law firm that supports conservative Christian causes.

DOJ_NMG_0072333

The Rev. Rick Scarborough, a leading evangelical in Texas, has recruited 5,000 "patriot pastors" nationwide to promote an agenda that aligns neatly with Republican platforms. "We urge them to avoid legal entanglement, but there are times in a pastor's life when he needs to take a biblical stand," Scarborough said. "Our higher calling is to Christ."

The campaign encourages individual pastors to use sermons, Bible studies and rallies to drive Christians to the polls — and, by implication or outright endorsement, to Republican candidates. One online guide to discussing the election in church, produced by the Focus on the Family ministry, offers this tip: If a congregant says her top concerns are healthcare and national security, suggest that Jesus would make abortion and gay marriage priorities.

At a recent rally in Pennsylvania, Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson told a crowd of 3,000 that it would be "downright frightening" if Republicans lost control of Congress. If there's a good Christian on the ballot, he said, failing to vote "would be a sin."

The law restricting political activity of churches and charities dates to 1954, when then-Sen. Lyndon B. Johnson pushed it through in a pique of anger over a nonprofit's effort to derail his reelection. Tax-exempt organizations, including churches, may not participate or intervene in political campaigns on behalf of any candidate. Intervention is broadly defined as "any and all activities that favor or oppose one or more candidate for public office," according to the Internal Revenue Service.

That sounds straightforward. In practice, though, there are many ways around the restriction, as the faithful recognize.

"If the pastor is doing the right job, the people will automatically vote for the right person," said Gale Wollenberg, who belongs to a conservative evangelical church in Topeka, Kan.

Perhaps the biggest loophole is that churches can campaign on policy issues — even if that effort benefits a particular candidate. Scarborough, for instance, has spent a great deal of time far from his Texas parish, rallying Christian voters against an initiative promoting embryonic stem-cell research in Missouri. At his events, Scarborough makes a point not to mention Missouri's Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who is in a tight fight for reelection.

But in private, he says candidly that he expects — and hopes — his efforts will give Talent a boost. "If a pro-life candidate benefits from Christians being involved, to God be the glory," Scarborough said.

Pastors can further help their favored candidates by distributing "issue-oriented" voter guides in church, a tactic used for years among secular (often left-leaning) groups such as the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People and adapted to faith communities by the Christian Coalition in the 1990s.

The voter pamphlets are supposed to be neutral, but often present issues through a distinctly partisan lens. A guide distributed by a conservative group in Minnesota in 2004 laid out the candidates' views on aborting "unborn babies." One produced this year by the liberal evangelical group Sojourners describes immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops as the only way to bring peace to Iraq.

Pastors have a right to work directly for candidates on their own time, as long as they don't use church resources. In a recent article aimed at evangelical preachers, Staver wrote that they "should feel free" to go even further and endorse a candidate from the pulpit because he thought the IRS law was unconstitutional. He repeatedly noted that the IRS had rarely sanctioned churches. The Church at Pierce Creek in Binghamton, N.Y., is the only one ever to lose its tax-exempt certification, for sponsoring newspaper ads that opposed presidential candidate Bill Clinton.

Far more often, IRS agents resolve complaints by training church leaders to avoid future missteps, said Lois G. Lerner, who directs the IRS unit for tax-exempt groups. In 2004, the IRS resolved dozens of complaints this way, including such blatant violations as churches donating to a candidate's campaign or placing political signs on their property.

Given the slim chance of serious sanction, "I encourage pastors to exchange their muzzles for megaphones," Staver wrote in the Rev. Jerry Falwell's monthly newspaper, the National Liberty Journal.

Political preaching has been particularly fervent this season in Ohio, where two conservative mega-churches have promoted the Republican candidate for governor, J. Kenneth Blackwell. They've featured him in at least six rallies that blended patriotic appeals with Christian revival.

Yet the latest poll shows Blackwell trailing by 19 points. In part, that's because Ohio voters seem to be in an anti-Republican mood, after scandals involving state GOP politicians. It also shows that a pastor's influence only goes so far.

Many on the Christian right credit their aggressive mobilization, similar to this fall's campaign, with securing President Bush's reelection. And turnout among evangelical voters did jump 9% from 2000 to 2004.

But two religious groups that heavily back Democrats also came out in droves: Turnout was up 15% among Jews and 13% among mainline Protestants who attend liberal churches, according to surveys conducted by John C. Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life. Overall turnout was up 4 points.

"It's really difficult to parse out" the effectiveness of the religious right's mobilization in 2004 "because it was such an intense campaign," Green said. "It does seem to bear fruit, but it varies a great deal from congregation to congregation."

Church-based campaigning may have been most influential in voters' choice of candidate. Bush won 78% of the evangelical vote in 2004, up from 68% in his first presidential bid. And evangelicals were far more likely than any other group of voters to say that religion was the most important factor in their political thinking.

Voter education from the church "can be enormously effective," said Colin Hanna, who directs the Pennsylvania Pastors Network. The group of 850 seeks to mobilize voters against "abortion and other evils," according to its website.

Some of this fall's efforts are aimed at energizing politically active but disillusioned Republicans who might otherwise stay home. But Hanna is particularly eager to reach the 30 million regular churchgoers, and an overlapping group of 19 million evangelicals, who did not vote in 2004. Their indifference to politics is "either a tragedy or a scandal," he said, but he's certain it can be overcome.

Liberals, too, see potential in mingling faith and politics. Black churches have a long history of political activism from the pulpit, dating to the civil rights movement — but their efforts did not boost voter turnout in 2004. This time around, other Christians, including liberal Catholics, are jumping in to try to energize the religious left.

They plan to distribute more than 1 million voter guides urging Christians to evaluate candidates based on issues such as poverty and global warming. A new consulting firm, Common Good Strategies, aims to help Democratic candidates make stronger pitches to communities of faith.

For the most part, however, the left is far behind the right: "They've got organization and discipline that we don't really have yet," said Jack Pannell of Sojourners. "It may take us a generation."

With both the left and the right pursuing faith-based strategies, the IRS issued a warning in February that churches may be in danger of becoming "arms of political campaigns and parties." Agents are looking into about 40 reported violations by churches and other tax-exempt nonprofits. A few are holdovers from 2004, including the high-profile probe into an antiwar sermon at a liberal Pasadena church. But new allegations continue to come in at a brisk clip.

Liberal clergy in Ohio have filed a protest about the pastors' efforts on behalf of Blackwell. On the right, the website http://www.ratoutachurch.org is recruiting volunteers to report partisan activity from the pulpit that favors Democrats.

Melissa Rogers, a visiting professor of religion and public policy at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, N.C., says she expects more complaints as the election approaches. In their zeal to bring politics into the pews, some religious leaders "have made a decision to walk on the razor's edge of the law," she said. "Or over the edge."

The Inside Agitator (NYT)

By Matt Bai

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

Not all states are equal on an election map, and Alaska is one of those less populous states — like Kansas or Idaho or Alabama — that national Democrats almost never bother to visit. For one thing, just getting there presents a logistical ordeal: the journey from Washington takes as long as it would to reach, say, Nigeria, and even then you sometimes need a hydroplane to get around. And more to the point, there aren't a whole lot of people to see once you get there. Registered Republicans outnumber Democrats by a margin of 2 to 1 in oil-crazed Alaska, which hasn't sent a Democrat to the House or Senate in more than 30 years. To put it another way, there were more Democrats in Central Park for the Dave Matthews concert a few years back than there are in the entire state of Alaska — all 656,000 square miles of it.

DOJ_NMG_0072335

It seemed somewhat bizarre, then, when Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, chose to make the long odyssey to Alaska at the end of May, near what was the beginning of one of the most intense and closely contested national election campaigns in memory, when every other Democrat in Washington was talking about potentially decisive states like Ohio, Pennsylvania and Connecticut. It was also strange that no one in Democratic Washington seemed to know he was going. Although I had been following Dean closely for months, I found out about the trip accidentally and invited myself along — an intrusion that Dean seemed merely to tolerate. We met up first in Las Vegas, where he was making appearances with

Harry Reid, the Senate minority leader. Dean, who enjoys his image as an unpretentious New Englander, is given to finding his own flights on discount Web sites, so it's sometimes hard for even his own staff to track his itinerary. On the morning we left for Alaska, Dean went missing for a good half-hour. It turned out that he was in the business center of the MGM Grand, where he had been trying to figure out how to print his boarding pass but somehow ended up in an impromptu game of online backgammon with a guy who claimed to be in China.

Touching down in Anchorage, we were greeted by Jonathan Teeters, a 25-year-old former offensive lineman at the University of Idaho who had been hired to help the state party begin to organize Democrats. It took less than 10 minutes, as Teeters drove us through a pounding rainstorm to the state headquarters, for Dean, seated in front, to unleash his usual brand of havoc on a state unaccustomed to it. First, he absently asked Teeters what kind of radio interviews he would be doing during his 24-hour stay and was told that he was booked on the local Air America affiliate, the only liberal radio option in town. This is what party chairmen get paid to do — rally the faithful, collect their money and urge them to vote.

"Bull," Dean snapped, using a slightly more elongated version of the term.

"Huh?" Chris Canning, Dean's personal aide, suddenly looked up from a loose-leaf binder. He seemed to think he had misheard.

"I'm not going to do that," Dean replied firmly, craning his neck to address Canning in the back seat. "I didn't come all the way up here just to talk to people who already agree with us. I want to talk to everyone else. I'm fine with doing Air America, but we have to do something else too. Isn't there some conservative show we can do?" Teeters warned that the few right-wing shows in town could get nasty for the chairman. "If you can set something else up too, great," Dean said with finality. "Otherwise, I won't do Air America."

Then Dean wanted to know how many organizers the state party now had on the ground, and Teeters told him there was just one: Teeters himself. The D.N.C. created his job — along with a position for a communications director — last year as part of Dean's signature program, known as the 50-state strategy. Under this program, the national party is paying for hundreds of new organizers and press aides for the state parties, many of which have been operating on the edge of insolvency. The idea is to hire mostly young, ambitious activists who will go out and build county and precinct organizations to rival Republican machines in every state in the country. "We're going to be in places where the Democratic Party hasn't been in 25 years," Dean likes to say. "If you don't show up in 60 percent of the country, you don't win, and that's not going to happen anymore."

In paying for two new staffers, Dean had, virtually overnight, doubled the size of Alaska's beleaguered state party, which used to consist of only an executive director and a part-time fund-raiser. But now, as Dean considered the vastness of the state's landscape, he decided that one organizer wasn't enough. "In most states, we have three or four," Dean said, thinking out loud. "Seems like you should really have more. We should be able to find that money in the budget."

That night, after meeting with Dean at the sad little storefront office that houses the state party, Alaska's party chairman, Jake Metcalfe, announced to 400 assembled Democrats at a fund-raiser that Dean had just promised to hire an additional organizer for the state. The ballroom erupted in grateful applause as Dean sat there beaming. The members of his staff, gently rolling their eyes, began calling back to Washington, warning the political staff that they would need to find the money for yet another salary in, of all places, Alaska.

In just a few hours, Dean had nicely demonstrated why so many leading Democrats in Washington wish he would spend even more time in Alaska — preferably hiking the tundra for a few months, without a cellphone. It's not that Democrats in Congress don't like the idea of building better organizations in the party's forgotten rural outposts. Everyone in Democratic politics agrees, in principle, that party organizations in states like Alaska could use help from Washington to become competitive again, as opposed to the rusted-out machines they have become. But doing so, at this particular moment and in this particular way, would seem to suck away critical resources at a time when every close House and Senate race has the potential to decide who will control the nation's post-election agenda, and when the party should, theoretically, be focused on mobilizing its base voters — the kind of people who live in big cities and listen religiously to Air America.

It's true that adding a second organizer in Alaska will cost the national party only a modest sum, maybe $35,000 this year, but that same money could pay the salaries for canvassers in Pennsylvania or Connecticut, where a few thousand votes could mean the difference between swearing in Speaker Hastert or Speaker Pelosi next January. Overall, Dean's investment in state parties could cost the D.N.C. as much as $8 million this year, every dime of which could be crucial when you consider that the Republican National Committee says it will pour as much as $60 million into local races to defend its Congressional majorities. (The D.N.C. has pledged to spend $12 million on this fall's races.) With the president's approval ratings stuck around 40 percent, and polls suggesting that the Democrats may have a real chance of rolling back 12 years of Republican rule, numerous Democratic insiders are privately and, at times, publicly deriding the 50-state strategy as an indulgence that could cost them their best and last opportunity to sweep away the Bush era, once and for all.

This conflict between the party's chairman and its elected leaders (who tried mightily to keep local activists from giving him the job in the first place) might be viewed as a petty disagreement. But in fact, it represents the deepening of a rift that has its roots in the 2004 presidential campaign — a rift that raises the fundamental issue of what role, if any, a political party should play in 21st-century American life. Dean ran for president, and then for chairman, as an outsider who would seize power from the party's interest-group-based establishment and return it to the grass roots. And while he has gamely tried to play down his differences with elected Democrats since becoming chairman, it seems increasingly obvious that Dean is pursuing his own agenda for the party — an agenda that picks up, in many ways, where his renegade presidential campaign left off. Now, at power lunches and private meetings, perplexed Washington Democrats, the kind of people who have lorded over the party apparatus for decades, find themselves pondering the same bewildering questions. What on earth can Howard Dean be thinking? Does he really care about winning in November, or is he after something else?

The mere fact that Democrats would consider a "50-state strategy" to be novel — as if a national party might reasonably aspire to something less — says volumes about the rapid deterioration of the party that was, for most of the last century, America's dominant political force. Back when Democrats were the established majority, the state parties were run by bosses who doled out jobs and delivered votes, while the national party, functioning as a subsidiary of whoever happened to occupy the Oval Office, worried about electing presidents. For decades, the party claimed a sizable majority of the nation's governors, senators and congressmen, and in every one of the states where it controlled those seats, there was a centralized organization — a party "infrastructure," in the parlance of today's activists — whose job it was to recruit candidates and make sure voters got to the polls.

All that began to change with the social movements of the 1960's and 70's, which redefined the Democratic Party, in the minds of many rural voters, as mostly a coalition of urban blacks and high-minded intellectuals. From the Deep South up through the populist Plains, voters began abandoning Democratic candidates at the polls, and the old state machines found themselves out of power and starved for patronage. Slowly, the parties in these states atrophied, laying off staff members and allowing their network of local volunteers to dwindle. "We were on the verge of extinction, pretty much," Barry Rubin, the executive director of the Nebraska Democratic Party, told me recently.

When Dean took over the D.N.C. last year, he sent assessment teams, made up of veteran field organizers and former state party officials, to every state. A typical assessment report on one rural state — I was allowed to see the report only on the condition that I not name the state involved — bluntly stated that its local activists were "aging" and that its central committee was "dysfunctional." In most states, there were hardly any county or precinct organizations to speak of. More than half the states lacked any communications staff, meaning that no one was there to counter the Republican talking points that passed from Washington to the state parties to the local media with a kind of automated precision.

For the Democrats, winning presidential elections came to mean doing so without any help from the South or West, and that, in turn, meant cobbling together a relatively small number of so-called battleground states rather than running a truly national campaign. The D.N.C. quit doing much of anything in conservative rural states, and the party's presidential candidates didn't bother stopping by on their way to more promising terrain. Every four years, the national party became obsessed with "targeting" — that is, focusing all its efforts on 15 or 20 winnable urban states and pounding them with expensive TV ads. The

D.N.C.'s defining purpose was to raise the money for those ads. The national party became, essentially, a service organization for a few hundred wealthy donors, who treated it like their private political club.

None of this was much on Howard Dean's mind when he set about running for president in 2003 with drab notions of health-care reform and a balanced budget; by the time he made his infamous "scream" speech in Des Moines a year later, however, Dean had become a folk hero for marginalized liberals. How this happened has been largely misunderstood. Dean has been credited with inciting an Internet-driven rebellion against his own party, but, in fact, he was more the accidental vehicle of a movement that was already emerging. The rise of Moveon.org, blogs and "meet-ups" was powered to some extent by the young, tech-savvy activists on both coasts who were so closely associated in the public mind with Dean's campaign. But the fast-growing Internet community was also a phenomenon of liberal enclaves in more conservative states, where disenchanted Democrats, mostly baby boomers, had long felt outnumbered and abandoned. Meet-ups for Dean drew overflow crowds in Austin, Tex., and Birmingham, Ala.; what the Web did was to connect disparate groups of Democratic voters who didn't live in targeted states and who had watched helplessly as Republicans overran their communities. These Democrats opposed the war in Iraq, but they were also against a party that seemed to care more about big donors and swing states than it did about them. Attracted to Dean's fiery defiance of the Washington establishment, these voters adopted him as their cause before he had ever heard of a blog.

"What our campaign was about, not that I set out to make it this way, was empowering people," Dean told me recently. "The 'you have the power' stuff — that just arose spontaneously when I realized what incredible potential there was for people to get active who had given up on the political process because they didn't think either party was helping them."

Over the course of the campaign, Dean turned into an apostle, in politics, of the economic concept of "disintermediation" — the idea that, in the Internet age, voters could connect with candidates, and with one another, without the party acting as the conduit. In a sense, this is what his candidacy was all about. He still believed, though, that only a strong national party could mobilize voters on Election Day. At the Democratic convention in Boston, six months after he dropped out of the presidential race, he met with frustrated delegations from 18 "untargeted" states, meaning that the national party and its candidate, John Kerry, had completely ignored them. Dean was appalled. "The best window we have to talk to Democrats, the time when they pay the most attention, is in the presidential campaign," Dean told me, "and we were just saying to the people of those 18 states, 'We're not interested in you.' You cannot be a national party if you say that to anybody. Anybody."

It didn't take long, after the election, for a new band of Democratic outsiders — some inspired by Dean's campaign, others not — to begin asserting themselves on the local level. In Maryland, Terry Lierman, a venture capitalist who had been one of Dean's campaign-finance chairmen, ran for state party chairman, despite having had no previous involvement in local Democratic politics, and won. In North Carolina, Jerry Meek, a 35-year-old lawyer, took over the state party on a promise of re-energizing county organizations, even though both the governor and the state's leading national figure, John Edwards, strongly backed an inside candidate. Colorado and Arkansas, too, rejected incumbent chairmen in favor of obscure newcomers. In Texas, Fred Baron, a trial lawyer and Democratic contributor, established a privately financed effort to rebuild the Texas state party from the ground up — without the party's consent.

Meanwhile, the bloggers who supported Dean were taking up the same cause, inciting sporadic local rebellions. Chris Bowers, an influential blogger on the leftist site MyDD.com, demanded that the national party focus less on targeting races and more on recruiting candidates to run in every Congressional district in America. Bowers's call for individual activists to overwhelm and rebuild their local parties became a rallying point for the emerging Netroots party-reform movement. Setting his own example, Bowers got himself elected the captain of his local precinct in Philadelphia's 27th Ward and then won a seat on the party's state committee.

The question for Dean was how to harness and aggregate this state-by-state uprising that he had, by example, helped to create. Immediately after dropping out of the presidential race, he formed a political action committee called Democracy for America, whose mission was to raise money for "progressive" candidates seeking local offices, from mayoral and Congressional seats down to the local water board. This was revolt on a small scale, however, and Dean continued to ponder some grander strategy. He admits now that at the time he considered forming a third party, deciding, ultimately, that such ventures never went far in American politics.

Like Ronald Reagan, whose activist insurgency during the 1976 primaries failed to topple the Republican president, Gerald Ford, Dean might have begun work instantly on the next presidential race, building on his support among the Democratic base. But unlike Reagan, Dean had always exhibited more passion for campaigning among the grass roots than he did for the prospect of actually being the nation's president; he seemed less focused on changing the country than he did on changing the party. And the best way to do that, he concluded, was to run for chairman.

Dean, the celebrity candidate in a crowded if rather underwhelming field, campaigned on what seemed like a brazenly political promise to lavish spoils on the forgotten state parties, whose local activists held most of the votes for the chairmanship. The outcome was never much in doubt, although some skeptical Democrats refused to support him. Metcalfe, the Alaska chairman, told me that he supported Simon Rosenberg, a party strategist. "Simon was saying, 'I don't know if I can fund all the states,' and I thought that was honest," Metcalfe said. "Dean said he would give money to all the states, and I thought, That's not going to happen — not out here. I thought I was being realistic. He proved me wrong."

There were awkward moments during Dean's first months in Washington, early in 2005, when he found himself working among the party leaders he had repeatedly maligned. In his first official visit to the newly renovated D.N.C. building, Dean was greeted in the lobby by his predecessor, Terry McAuliffe, a close friend of the Clintons and probably the most gifted fund-raiser in the party's history, whom Dean's supporters had long pilloried as the personification of a party run by hacks and obsessed with corporate money. McAuliffe, a man of maddeningly good cheer, pointed to the new wall-size glass building dedication in the lobby, which featured McAuliffe's name at the very top, followed by a list of contributors. "Now, Howard," he said, "don't you go chiseling that down."

Not long after, Dean sat down with the party's Congressional leaders, Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi, who had tried, ineptly and with almost comical desperation, to find a candidate who could stop him from becoming chairman. Reid and Pelosi promised to work with Dean, but they asked him to resist speaking out on key policy positions and acting as if he were the party's public face. In other words, Dean would be doing everyone in Washington a favor if he would just stay out of sight and raise money.

The latter goal proved challenging. The truth was that neither Dean nor the aides he brought with him from the presidential campaign knew much about the inner workings of the national party, and some of what they assumed they understood, based on contempt for anything they perceived to be the status quo, turned out to be more complicated than it first appeared. Determined to break the grip of millionaires on the party apparatus, Dean's team came into the D.N.C. with a plan to raise huge sums of money online, as Dean had done during the presidential campaign. Dean didn't bother reaching out to many of the party's top contributors, who were as suspicious of him as he was of them. But getting small-dollar donors excited about an established party proved a far more arduous task than getting them excited about an insurgent campaign. The situation grew perilous until, several months into his term, Dean relented and brought in one of McAuliffe's old acolytes, Jody Trapasso, to get the fund-raising operation in order. Trapasso introduced Dean to the big spenders, pushing him to devote a few hours of every day to making calls until the checks started rolling in.

Dean was discovering that he needed to find some Washington insiders to trust, after all — and he found them in what seemed an unlikely quarter. In his primary campaign in 2003, Dean struck up a friendship with Tina Flournoy, a well-respected operative who worked with Al Gore and

Joe Lieberman during the 2000 presidential race and who now held a senior position at the American Federation of Teachers, one of the party's most influential unions. Flournoy was also a charter member of an informal dinner clique whose members referred to themselves, good-naturedly, as the Colored Girls. The core group included several African-American women who had reached the highest echelons of Democratic politics. Donna Brazile, the veteran organizer who managed Gore's presidential campaign, was a regular; so were Minyon Moore, a consultant who worked in the Clinton White House; Yolanda Caraway, a public-relations specialist; and Leah Daughtry, who was McAuliffe's chief of staff (and who was retained in that job by Dean). Guest speakers at their dinners frequently included probable presidential candidates and top members of Congress. During the race for chairman, Flournoy brought Dean in as well, and he quickly clicked with the group.

Dean tapped Flournoy to run his transition team, and although she later returned to her job at the teachers' union, it is now common knowledge among Democrats in Washington that few big decisions are made at the D.N.C. without Flournoy's approval. The Colored Girls, as a whole, are unusually influential with Dean. It's an odd pairing, given that Dean governed one of the whitest states in the country, but what Dean and these women share is resentment, sometimes subtle and sometimes not, of the elite Washington Democrats who have always run the national party. Activists like Flournoy and Brazile have attained star status in the party, but they have never thought of themselves as insiders. This is partly because they are black women in a party dominated by white men — men who often seem to prize them more as symbols of diversity than for their expertise. But it is also because the women came up in Democratic politics as local field operatives — that is, as young organizers who knocked on doors, principally for Jesse Jackson — in an era when all of the power in the party was concentrated in the hands of the Washington consultants who made TV ads and polled the electorate. Dean came to Washington vowing to take power from the insiders and give it, instead, to ground-level activists. "That's our loyalty to Dean," Brazile says. "He gets it."

With help from Flournoy and the others, Dean cultivated an outsiders' culture inside the D.N.C. building. (It is more than symbolic that Dean himself never moved to Washington; he stays at the Capitol Hill Suites a few days a week before heading back to Burlington, Vt.) Dean's political staff hails largely from the state organizations, rather than from Washington; his political director, Pam Womack, formerly ran the Virginia party and the National Governors Association. Top Washington reporters and senior aides on Capitol Hill frequently complain that they now have trouble getting their calls to the D.N.C. returned, while state activists rave about the new responsiveness at headquarters.

Flournoy also introduced Dean to the pollster Cornell Belcher, who became a constant fixture inside Dean's D.N.C. Belcher, a deep thinker and jazz aficionado who wears suit coats with unlaced Converse sneakers, had been an outsider, too, in the sense that he didn't fit into the capital's pinstriped culture and wasn't well known before Dean started taking him to meetings on the Hill. In public appearances, Dean almost always refers proudly to the fact that he has retained a "37-year-old African-American pollster" to shake up the staid Washington crowd. In fact, the main theme of Belcher's work concerns the white middle-class men and women who have deserted the Democrats in recent years. These voters care more about their faith and the character of their communities than they do about individual issues, Belcher says, and Democrats do better with rural and small-town voters when they frame their positions as values rather than as policy prescriptions. This is not an entirely new insight, but to Dean it is critically important. In his mind, it means that any voter in any state can be a Democrat, if only you bother to talk to him, and if only you make the right kind of argument.

The ultimate manifestation of this philosophy, of course, is the 50-state strategy, under which, for the first time, the national party has begun directly financing the staff at all but a few state headquarters. It's probably fair to say that if there hadn't been a quagmire in Iraq or a Hurricane Katrina — if the White House's political fortunes hadn't imploded over the last year — the 50-state strategy would not have aroused much opposition among Washington Democrats. It was only when they realized that they actually had a chance to take back the House, and maybe the Senate too, that Democratic leaders began to ask, with increasing urgency, what it was that Dean was doing with all the party's money.

This fall, the question of who will control Congress is likely to come down to about 40 Congressional districts and some dozen states with close Senate races, including such perennial battlegrounds as Pennsylvania, Ohio and Missouri. Candidates raise most of their campaign funds themselves, but they rely on additional money from Washington to pay for voter-turnout programs and last-minute TV ads. Each party has three separate entities to raise and disburse those dollars: a committee for Senate races, a second committee for House campaigns and the national party headquarters.

For Democrats, the fund-raising environment has improved over the last two years, as Bush has blundered from one legislative or foreign-policy disaster to another and as Democratic donors have seen the prospect of controlling at least one house of Congress — a notion that seemed unthinkable in 2004 — become a possibility. The Democrats who lead their party's Senate and House campaign committees, Senator Chuck Schumer of New York and Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, respectively, have done their parts to make the party competitive. The Democratic Senate committee, which narrowly outperformed its Republican counterpart in 2004, has opened up an even wider margin in this election cycle. The Democratic House committee, which raised only half as much as the G.O.P.'s committee did two years ago, has closed that gap somewhat and, at last count, had virtually the same amount in the bank as its rival. Over at the D.N.C., however, it's a very different story. In 2004, the D.N.C., under McAuliffe, actually raised slightly more money than the Republican National Committee. Since Dean has taken over, however, the R.N.C. has taken an almost 2-to-1 lead in fund-raising, and going into the fall campaign it had more than

$39 million stashed away, compared with just over $11 million for the Democrats. For Schumer and Emanuel, this discrepancy between the two parties is like a train coming down the track, and they're the ones sitting in its path. The R.N.C. will dump tens of millions of dollars into individual House and Senate races in the closing weeks, through TV ads and get-out-the-vote operations, and Democrats won't be able to counter it.

In a city rife with unchecked egos, few politicians exhibit the kind of unbridled self-assuredness for which both Emanuel and Schumer are known; to call the two of them pushy would be like calling Tom Cruise excitable. Emanuel, a triathlete who was

Bill Clinton's deputy chief of staff and enforcer, speaks in violent bursts of shrapnel, profanities flying in all directions. Schumer, like his native Brooklyn, can be, by turns, charming or downright dangerous, depending on which route delivers him faster to his destination.

Before this midterm election-year began, but not long after Dean became party head, Emanuel and Schumer decided that if Dean wasn't going to raise anywhere near as much money as his rivals at Republican headquarters, then he ought to at least give them whatever resources he could muster. They went to work on Dean, pleading with him to transfer as much as $10 million to the two committees to help them respond to the Republican TV barrage. Emanuel told anyone who would listen that back in 1994, when Republicans sensed a similarly historic mood swing in the electorate, the R.N.C. kicked in something like $20 million in cash to its Congressional committees. (This argument was impressive, but not exactly true; the R.N.C. spent roughly that much on federal and local races combined in 1994, and little, if any, of that money went directly to the committees themselves.) Dean categorically refused to ante up. Having opposed the very idea of targeting a small number of states and races, he wasn't about to divert money from his long-term strategy — what he calls the "unsexy" work of rebuilding the party's infrastructure — to pay for a bunch of TV ads in Ohio. He wanted to win the 2006 elections as much as anyone, Dean told them, and he intended to help where he could. But Democratic candidates and their campaign committees were doing just fine on fund-raising, and the party couldn't continue giving in to the temptation to spend everything it had on every election cycle — no matter how big a checkbook the Republicans were waving around.

For Schumer, Emanuel and their allies, this rejection was irritating enough. When they heard the stories of how Dean was actually spending the party's cash, however, it was almost more than they could take. Dean was paying for four organizers in Mississippi, where there wasn't a single close House race, but he had sent only three new hires to Pennsylvania, which had a governor's race, a Senate campaign and four competitive House races. Emanuel said he was all for expanding the party's reach into rural states — roughly half the House seats he was targeting were in states like Texas, Indiana and Kentucky, after all — but he wanted the D.N.C. to focus on individual districts that Democrats could actually win, as opposed to just spreading money around aimlessly. The D.N.C. was spending its money not only in Alaska and Hawaii, but in the U.S. Virgin Islands as well. Democratic insiders began to rail against this wacky and expensive 50-state plan. "He says it's a long-term strategy," Paul Begala, the Democratic strategist, said during an appearance on CNN in May. "What he has spent it on, apparently, is just hiring a bunch of staff people to wander around Utah and Mississippi and pick their nose."

The disagreement with Emanuel and Schumer frayed Dean's already fragile détente with Washington's Democratic elite. Since coming to Washington, Dean had worked hard to forge a level of trust with Congressional leaders, subjugating some of his more combative impulses. In particular, he had formed what he thought of as a genuine friendship with Harry Reid. Nonetheless, the party's elected leaders and their legions of consultants remained uneasy about Dean. They suspected, correctly, that he strongly sympathized with outside forces — militant bloggers, disillusioned donors, Moveon.org — that were fomenting rebellion at the grass roots. It didn't help that Dean's younger brother, Jim, a onetime salesman who had taken over the PAC Dean started, Democracy for America, was out there proselytizing for insurgent candidates like Paul Hackett, whom Schumer eventually muscled out of a Senate primary in Ohio, and Ned Lamont, who upended Joe Lieberman in Connecticut. While campaign laws prohibited the Dean brothers from coordinating their activities, Washington Democrats assumed that Jim Dean's job was to carry out the chairman's subversive wishes.

In separate conversations, Reid and Pelosi each asked Dean — Reid in his quiet way, Pelosi more stridently — to send some money to the two campaign committees. Dean rebuffed them too. But he did promise that the D.N.C. would help with get-out-the vote campaigns. Emanuel and Schumer then began pressing Dean for a specific field plan — that is, a blueprint for how the D.N.C. would spend money on mobilizing voters, and where. The argument finally exploded during a meeting in May among Dean, Emanuel and Schumer in Dean's third-floor office at the D.N.C. Emanuel told Dean that the 50-state strategy was a waste of money; Dean shot back that winning elections wasn't only about TV ads. Emanuel wanted to know what Dean was doing to help in California's 50th district, where voters were about to hold a special election. When Dean said he had organizers on the ground, Emanuel erupted. <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="41705;159602">"Who?" he demanded. "Tell me their names!" Emanuel, who had a vote at the Capitol, stormed out of the meeting, cursing as he walked down the hall. </object.title>

By now, the situation had as much to do with clashing egos as it did with the elections. "The issue here is not our field plan," Dean told me. "The issue is an issue of control. I'm the new guy on the block, and they thought they were going to get me writing the check." For his part, Emanuel, who had been a pivotal adviser in several national elections (he was the model for the character Josh Lyman in "The West Wing"), seemed annoyed that Dean wouldn't defer to Democrats with more experience. That Dean raised money by talking about the closeness of the 2006 elections — and then spent much of that money in states that had nothing to do with the midterms — made Emanuel, whose office sits a floor below Dean's in the D.N.C. building, want to reach through the tile ceiling and throttle him. "I'm for a long-term strategy," Emanuel told me, "but I don't see how you have a long-term strategy if you take a historic election and walk away from it."

What was remarkable about this fight, as it dragged on throughout the summer, was just how public it became, and the extent to which it seemed to be pulling influential Democrats into its vortex. Bren Simon, a wealthy Democratic patron from Indiana who has entertained virtually every leading Democrat at her second home in Washington, told me that she warned Emanuel and Schumer that she wouldn't write them any more checks if they didn't stop fighting Dean over his 50-state strategy. Then there was the morning early in the summer when Brazile ran into Emanuel on the steps of the D.N.C. building and started loudly lecturing him about his attacks on the chairman, in full view of party employees. Emanuel protested that he just wanted to win back the House. Two of the Democratic Party's leading strategists — one who had helped run the White House, the other who had managed a presidential campaign — stood there barking at each other on the street.

Underneath this clash of field plans and alpha personalities lay a deeper philosophical divide over how you go about rebuilding a party — which was really a dispute about cause and effect. Did you expand the party by winning elections, or did you win elections by expanding the party? Most party insiders had long put their faith in elections first, arguing that the best way to broaden the base of the party was to win more races. Schumer said as much in a written statement that his spokesman forwarded to me in response to my questions about his differences with Dean. "Our long-term goal is the same — a strong Democratic Party," Schumer stated. "But we" — meaning he and Emanuel — "believe that nothing does more to further that goal in 2006, 2008 and beyond than taking back the House and Senate so that we can implement a Democratic platform."

Recent history, though, would seem to undercut this theory. In the 1990's, the Democrats won two presidential elections behind a popular leader, and yet the party didn't grow. In fact, Democrats lost ground at every level of government except the White House and cemented their position as the party of coastal states. Steadily investing in political activity on the local level, as Republicans have done for years, seems to Dean and his allies a more realistic way for Democrats to expand the electoral map than simply trying, every four years, to piece together the same elusive majorities. Of course, every Democrat in Washington says he's for expanding the party's efforts beyond the familiar 18 or 20 battleground states, but only Dean, among his party's leaders, has been willing to argue that there is a choice involved, that you cannot actually invest for the long term unless you're willing to forgo some short-term priorities.

It takes courage, Dean told me, to try something new in the face of failure, which is why Washington Democrats were resisting his plan. "I think politicians are incredibly risk-averse, especially legislating politicians," he said. "This is like deciding to go to a psychiatrist — the risk of staying the same has to be greater than the risk of changing. And right now, in the history of the party, that's exactly where we are. The risk of doing nothing, the same old thing, is enormous. The risk of trying something new is much smaller. The risk of the 50-state strategy is much smaller than if we continue to do what we've been doing."

But you can accept Dean's premise and still wonder whether his 50-state strategy is really the best way to go about building the party. Even some Democrats who support Dean's larger vision have doubts about whether he has built enough accountability into his model for financing state parties. Republicans, as I saw firsthand in Ohio during the 2004 campaign, demand certain metrics of their local organizers. Field workers are expected to sign up so many new voters, or knock on so many doors, by a given date, and people who don't meet their quotas and deadlines can find themselves replaced — even if they're volunteers. Republican staffs in the states are required to take part in an unrelenting succession of conference calls with Washington.

By contrast, Jonathan Teeters, the 25-year-old activist I met in Anchorage, told me that he wished he spoke more often with his superiors at the D.N.C. "It's kind of an as-needed thing," he said. "As far as I can tell, they trust me to get it done. As long as I'm staying in contact, and as long as we're having success, that's how they know we're getting it done." When I asked Teeters how he knew if he was having success, he mentioned having attracted several hundred people to "Democratic reunion" barbecues across the state. "The first thing we have to do is create this energy, so people know we're here and we're active," he said.

Dean has no illusions that the 50-state strategy will succeed in every state. "They're going to make terrible mistakes — I know that," Dean said. "You never make changes without people making mistakes." He said he had visited 46 states as chairman, and each time he goes into a state, he gets some sense of the progress on the ground.

Unlike past chairmen, who mostly traveled to see donors and do some interviews, Dean spends a fair amount of time visiting party offices and mingling with grass-roots activists. His trips to more rural, conservative states, however, the kind of places where a sizable segment of voters go to church and follow Nascar, also raise some complicated issues for his fellow Democrats. Dean is treated like a Beatle by rank-and-file activists who have rarely seen a party leader in their midst, but for the rest of the country, Dean is that lefty who howled on national TV. Some Democratic governors and candidates have avoided Dean when he has been in town, for fear that their opponents would portray them as extremists. Which underscores the peculiar situation of Dean and his 50-state plan: he is the one guy in Washington determined to deliver the Democratic message to every part of the country, but as it turns out, he is also a guy from whom much of America doesn't want to hear it.

It's not that Dean doesn't try his damnedest to make himself palatable to culturally conservative voters. Acting on the advice of Cornell Belcher, his young pollster, he has taken to framing his positions in terms of faith and values, sometimes so transparently that it can make you wince. In Las Vegas, I heard Dean, who is not known to be a religious man, say to a Latino audience, "I don't expect the church to come out for gay marriage, but I do expect that we could say on an issue like this, 'What would Jesus do?' Equal rights under the law is not something that can be abridged by the Democratic Party, because it's really the law under Jesus Christ." The audience stared at him a little blankly, as you might stare at your mechanic if he rolled out from underneath your car and suddenly started speaking Latin.

Fairly or not, Dean has come to embody a species of Democrat that a lot of Americans of both parties find off-putting: the 60's antiwar liberal, reborn with a laptop and a Prius. On the day we landed in Anchorage, Tony Knowles, the former Democratic governor of the state, had just announced that he would run to reclaim the post. This was exciting news for Dean, since he and Knowles had served as governors together, and the two men would be attending the fund-raiser that night. But while we were at the party headquarters, the state party's executive director cautioned Dean, gingerly, that he should probably avoid getting too close to Knowles in public or saying nice things about him from the lectern. "I think he'd prefer to distance himself from the national party as much as he can," the executive director, Mike Coumbe, said.

Later that night, at the fund-raiser, I approached Knowles and asked him if it was true that he felt he needed to put some space between himself and his old friend. "I think they're about to introduce me," Knowles said, glancing helplessly toward the front of the room. "I do want to answer your question." But he was already backing away.

When dean and I last spoke, in August, I wondered aloud if the entire 50-state program wasn't, in a very basic way, inconsistent with the larger philosophy that guided his 2004 campaign. If Dean believed in disintermediation, then why was he spending so much money to strengthen the intermediaries? Weren't the state parties essentially just middlemen between the voters and the Democratic National Committee? What Dean seemed to be creating was a multilevel field organization modeled after the political machines of the 20th century rather than a new party that fostered direct communication between local activists and their leaders in Washington.

"That would be true if we thought we had to be centralized," Dean replied, raising an index finger. In fact, he went on, the Democratic Party needed to be decentralized, so that grass-roots Democrats built relationships with their state parties but had little to do with Washington at all. "State parties are not the intermediaries," he said. "If I get them trained right, they're the principals."

In other words, I suggested, he was talking about "devolving" the national Democratic Party, in the same way that Reagan and other conservative ideologues had always talked about devolving the federal government and returning power to the states. "That's what I want to do," Dean said firmly.

This struck me as a radical idea, and one that went to the heart of what Howard Dean is really thinking. Now that Dean has wrested control of the national party, his real agenda, it seems, is to radically reduce its relevance, in the same way that Grover Norquist and his crowd of conservative activists talk about "starving the beast" of the federal government they now control. Once you understand that, it's easy to understand why Dean isn't troubled by having less cash in the bank than people think he should, and why he isn't concerned about quantifying the success of the state parties he's financing. In Dean's mind, every dollar that goes to Alaska or Mississippi, or even to the Virgin Islands, even if it isn't perfectly utilized, is a dollar that isn't going into the pockets of the Washington syndicate of admen and pollsters who seem to profit more from each election cycle. And that is an end in itself. By shipping the party's money out of Washington as fast as he can collect it, Dean is trying to finish what he started three years ago — namely, the slow dismantling of the Democratic establishment.

This philosophical shift is bound to have consequences for the party's next presidential nominee. Dean argues that the 50-state strategy is actually going to broaden the playing field in 2008. By the time the next nominee is crowned, he says, a field network will already be in place, covering most of the counties and precincts in the United States; flip a switch, and the whole grid will light up with activity, from Baton Rouge to Boise. More than that, rebuilding Democratic ground operations in more states will force Republicans and their nominee to spend millions more dollars in states that the G.O.P. usually takes for granted, dollars that would otherwise be spent in the Midwest or in the pivotal Sun Belt.

This makes some sense, but it's also true that presidential candidates have long relied on the D.N.C. to do two simple things: underwrite TV ads and coordinate extensive field operations in a handful of perennially contested states — so much so, in fact, that every four years the nominee essentially takes over the D.N.C., installing his own strategists and fund-raisers to provide his campaign with air and ground support. If Dean isn't going to relinquish control or shift his resources into battleground states, the next nominee could find himself (or herself) outspent by the R.N.C. — and as piqued at Dean as Emanuel and Schumer are now.

Some more conspiracy-minded Democrats discern in Dean's decentralizing strategy the careful machinations of a shrewd and ambitious politician. After all, if the party's nominee loses in 2008, doesn't that set up Dean, potentially, as the grass-roots choice for 2012? Might this be his real plan — to strengthen the local activists who form his natural base of support while at the same time weakening the Washington apparatus that once tried to derail him?

It's an elegant theory, but it doesn't take into account Dean's basic ambivalence about electoral politics. In Vermont, Dean, a physician and part-time lieutenant governor, turned down the chance to run for governor, taking office only when his predecessor died. He may have run for president, as a former confidant of his once explained it to me, largely because he was looking for something to do. Dean has never evidenced much in the way of Machiavellian ambition. It's easier to imagine him, several years from now, serving as a cabinet secretary, or maybe running a university, than it is to see him rising up to lead a Reagan-like revolt at a raucous nominating convention in Las Vegas or Phoenix.

the more immediate question is whether Dean can make it through this year's elections without becoming a permanent pariah among his party's elected leadership. In September, Dean finally reached a compromise of sorts with Rahm Emanuel. In the end, Dean didn't pull any money from his 50-state strategy, nor did Emanuel successfully pressure him into giving cash directly to the campaign committees. Dean agreed, in principle, to pour about $2.6 million, on top of what he was spending on the 50-state strategy, into field operations in 40 targeted districts. "We have a basic understanding," Emanuel told me, sounding more peeved than conciliatory. "It's not everything I want, but I don't have any time to waste anymore, and I'm not waiting for Godot. I've got to get going." The deal seemed to ensure, at least, that Dean and the House campaign committee would be able to work in harmony through the elections. (Peace talks with Schumer were still going on.) It did not, however, do anything to resolve the underlying, more intractable disagreement: the importance of winning elections versus a longer-term investment in state parties. That argument will continue well after November's referendum on Republican rule.

Nor, clearly, did the compromise do much to endear Dean to his critics in Washington. "I'm not going to be on his holiday mailing list, and he's not going to be on my holiday mailing list," Emanuel snapped at one point during our conversation about

Dean. “But this isn’t about him or me.” If Democrats fall short of retaking the House of Representatives in November, the party’s elected leaders will almost certainly blame Dean for the near miss. They will say that he squandered their best chance in more than a decade to control the country. They will say it proves that Dean’s risky strategy has badly hurt the party.

And yet, you could make a compelling argument that anything short of total victory in November would prove precisely the opposite. With polls consistently showing voters to be deeply nervous about a protracted war, high gas prices and stunted wages, this is that rare election that should turn less on tactics than on fundamental choices about the direction of the country; in other words, this election season is about the fear and fury of the electorate, not the addition of a few more door-knockers in New Haven or some negative 30-second spot broadcast in Columbus. As the Democratic strategist James Carville told Al Hunt, the Bloomberg News columnist, in August, “If we can’t win in this environment, we have to question the whole premise of the party.”

Most analysts in both parties now believe that Democrats have better-than-even odds of winning at least the House. But if they don’t, rather than dissect the mechanical failures that cost them a few thousand votes here or there, Democrats might be forced to admit, at long last, that there is a structural flaw in their theory of party-building. Even a near miss, at a time of such overwhelming opportunity, would suggest that a national party may not, in fact, be able to win over the long term by fixating on a select group of industrial states while condemning entire regions of the country to what amounts to one-party rule. Which would mean that Howard Dean is right to replant his party’s flag in the towns and counties along America’s less-traveled highways, even if his plan isn’t perfect, and even if he isn’t the best messenger to carry it out. As another flawed visionary, the filmmaker Woody Allen, once put it, 80 percent of success is just showing up.

Dean: '08 May Hinge On Race, Immigration (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, October 1, 2006

Race and immigration could determine the 2008 presidential race, Democratic Party chief Howard Dean told a group of Hispanic leaders Saturday.

Dean said he's trying to encourage the turnout of minority voters who support Democrats, particularly in the Albuquerque, N.M., area, by encouraging their use of mail-in ballots, a tactic he said Republicans have used effectively.

"If that works, we're going to do that in 2008 all over the place, but in the meantime this is a great opportunity for us in 2006," Dean told 225 people attending a luncheon at the party's annual Hispanic leadership summit.

In New Mexico's largely Democratic 1st Congressional District, home to what Dean called a Democratic National Committee pilot project, five-term Republican Rep. Heather Wilson is fighting to get re-elected. Her opponent, Democratic Attorney General Patricia Madrid, grew up in a Hispanic household near the Mexican border.

Democrats hope to turn back the Republican Party's advances among Hispanic voters in recent years. President Bush's efforts to court Hispanic voters have helped double the GOP's share since 2000.

"We can't afford to have 45 percent of Latino population voting for Republican presidents. That diagram has to change," said Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif.

Dean and Solis said issues such as public education, health care, affordable housing, the minimum wage and immigration protection should continue to be party priorities.

DAVENPORT, Iowa (AP) — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, a potential presidential candidate for 2008, called on Democrats to embrace the national security debate in the campaign's closing weeks.

"I am happy to have a national security debate with the Republican Party," Obama said Saturday during his second visit in two weeks to Iowa, which traditionally opens the presidential nominating season. "What we need is a tough and smart national security agenda."

Obama said Democrats must stand up to Republicans' strategy of portraying them as weak on national security. He said Republicans "have a lock on the tough and dumb strategy" that Democrats must expose.

"We can't afford to be bullied because there's too much at stake," Obama said. "The only strategy the other side has is fear. That's what you're seeing and you're going to see more of it."

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., on Saturday launched a new TV ad that compares his nearly 18 years in the Senate with challenger Ned Lamont's relative inexperience.

The 30-second ad features a light bulb and a voice that asks: "Still waiting to hear a new idea out of Ned Lamont? Here's an idea for you."

The bulb lights up and the voice continues, "Experience matters."

In a Quinnipiac University poll released Thursday, voters by a margin of 47 percent to 38 percent said Lamont does not have the "right kind of experience" to serve as a U.S. senator.

Lieberman, who was defeated by Lamont in the Democratic primary last month and is now running as an independent, has a 10-point advantage among likely voters in the poll. He leads Lamont 49 percent to 39 percent in a three-way race. Republican Alan Schlesinger trails with 5 percent.

Lamont campaign spokeswoman Liz Dupont-Diehl said Lieberman's experience has led to the Bush-Cheney energy bill, increased terrorist activity and the loss of manufacturing jobs.

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney supported plans to reduce illegal immigration from Mexico but said Saturday the U.S. should do more to keep foreign students who come here and earn advanced degrees.

"There's only one condition on getting your Ph.D. here in the U.S. and that is: You leave as soon as you get it," he told New Hampshire Republicans gathered for their annual convention. "Let me tell you, you get a Ph.D. here in one of our great institutions, I want you to stay. ... It makes no sense that we put up a big concrete wall against those who have education and skills but our doors have been wide open to people that have neither."

Romney, a possible 2008 presidential candidate, spoke about a growing gap in technology and education between countries like China and the United States. He described a conversation he'd had with a leader of a Massachusetts high-tech company, who said he expected that in 10 years, 90 percent of his employees will be in Asia.

"I was shocked," said Romney. "China alone graduates seven times the number of engineers that we are."

Outside Groups Spending Millions On Ads (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, October 1, 2006

The images are searing, violent. Smoke and flames pouring from the World Trade Center towers. Bullets ripping through military protective vests.

The scenes are from this year's campaign ad wars, waged outside the control of candidates or political parties.

Heading into the final weeks before the Nov. 7 elections, independent advocacy groups, many financed by a few wealthy donors, are spending millions on ads in some of the most contested states and congressional districts.

Between Jan. 1 and Sept. 26, Republican-leaning groups spent $13.8 million on advertising while advertising on behalf of Democrats totaled $6.3 million, according to the Campaign Media Analysis Group. Throw in the advertising the political parties are paying for, and the Republicans have spent $5 on ads for every $3 spent by Democrats.

That is a significant reversal from 2004, when Democratic groups outnumbered and outspent Republican organizations. Now, some Democratic officials are wondering when their deep-pocketed liberal allies will step in to help.

"If it's there, I haven't seen it," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who heads the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "I can't tell you what happened from '04 to '06 and why some decided either not to participate in this election or not be at the same level."

As election day nears, television viewers have been introduced to Republican-oriented groups with names such a Progress for America, Softer Voices and the Economic Freedom Fund. Their benefactors include Univision founder Andrew Perenchio; conservative philanthropist John M. Templeton Jr. of Bryn Mawr, Pa.; Foster Friess, former manager of the Brandywine mutual funds; and Bob J. Perry, the Texas builder who helped finance the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth that attacked Sen. John Kerry's Vietnam record during the 2004 presidential race.

Progress for America is credited with helping President Bush's re-election with a powerful ad evoking the Sept. 11 attacks. The GOP-leaning group now is running ads in Missouri and Ohio that support the war in Iraq.

The Economic Freedom Fund, bankrolled by Perry, is running ads in congressional districts in Iowa, Indiana, Georgia and West Virginia.

Softer Voices, backed by Friess and Templeton, has spent $850,000 in an ad campaign in Pennsylvania on behalf of Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, who is running behind Democrat Bob Casey.

So far, most of the Democratic advertising help has come from MoveOn.org, a liberal group has been raising smaller contributions as a federally regulated political action committee.

MoveOn spent most of its advertising money in March, targeting congressional districts that were not yet considered vulnerable for Republicans but have since become competitive. Right now, MoveOn is only advertising in two New York congressional districts and one in New Hampshire.

Democrats have gotten help from VoteVets, a PAC formed by military veterans who are critical of the Iraq war. The group is focusing on Santorum and Republican Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Conrad Burns of Montana.

The VoteVets ads accuse the senators of not supporting legislation to get better equipment for U.S. troops. The ads have been small buys, but have benefited from media coverage because they dramatically portray a sharpshooter firing through a protective vest.

A group of Democratic strategists has tried to raise about $20 million for an October advertising blitz. The effort, called the September Fund, is being led by Harold Ickes, a former aide to President Clinton and an adviser to Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y.

In a letter circulated to potential donors this month, the organizers said: "While we have achieved unprecedented unity, it is only meaningful if we can mobilize the power of progressive donors to ensure sufficient financial resources are available."

Among those solicited was billionaire financier George Soros, a donor to liberal causes who contributed more than $20 million to defeat Bush in 2004. Soros has put more than $2 million into this election, much of it toward get out the vote efforts. In an interview this month on CNN, Soros said he did not plan to spend as much as 2004.

"That was an exceptional situation," he said.

Democratic Party officials said outside groups such as the September Fund are organizing too late. "If it was September '05, I'd feel better," Emanuel said.

This year, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has run the biggest ad campaign: $7.3 million on behalf of Republican candidates and $1.2 million on behalf of business friendly Democrats in primary contests. But the chamber had to stop those ads on Sept. 7, to abide by a legal prohibition on the use of union or corporate funds for electioneering ads 60 days before the vote.

Just in September, Progress for America has aired three rounds of ads linking the war in Iraq to the broader effort to combat terrorism. The ads area appearing on national cable networks and were broadcast statewide in Missouri and Ohio.

The first ad showed images of jet planes slicing into the World Trade Center Towers. The narrator warned, "These People Want to Kill Us." A new ad features Iraq war veterans describing the war's successes. None of the ads features politicians nor voices support for or against any elected official.

"A lot of people turn off political ads when they see a candidate," said Stuart Roy, a GOP consultant working with Progress for America. "These ads have a longer lasting effect than those that mention a candidate."

Still, some ads can backfire, and operatives from both parties have mixed views on their effectiveness.

Michael Steele, the Republican candidate for Senate in Maryland, was forced to repudiate a radio ad by an independent group supporting his candidacy that claimed Martin Luther King Jr. was a Republican and that Democrats initiated the Ku Klux Klan. Steele called the ad "insulting to Marylanders."

"Independent expenditures are overrated mostly because you're operating outside the strategic framework of the campaign," said Steve Elmendorf, a former top aide to one-time House Democratic leader Richard Gephardt and deputy campaign manager in Kerry's presidential campaign. "Sometimes they just create clutter."

MoveOn's executive director, Eli Pariser, said this election will be won on the ground, not the airwaves.

"For all the talk about ads," he said, "this is not a persuasion election as much as it is a turnout election."

Of Party Dues And Deadbeats On Capitol Hill (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — To move up the ladder in Congress, you must do more than win votes. You are, quite literally, expected to pay your dues.

If you are a rank-and-file member of the House, the amount is up to $100,000. If your ambitions are to preside over a powerful committee, the duty is $300,000. For a top party leader, the tally can climb beyond $600,000.

Make those checks payable to the Republican or Democratic Congressional campaign committees.

Whether or not they are in competitive races, lawmakers are asked to mount vigorous fund-raising drives to fill their own campaign chests. Then they dole to the party, which spreads the money to the most competitive campaigns in the country.

Four years after Congress tried to reduce the influence of money in politics by rewriting the rules of how campaigns are financed, Republicans and Democrats alike have found myriad replacements for the river of financial contributions known as soft money.

The practice of paying what the parties refer to as dues is not illegal, and it is not an entirely fresh notion by either party. This year, Democrats are hoping to glean about $33 million in dues from their House members, an amount that would be about one-third of their fund-raising goal. That makes the dues an important piece in the Democrats' strategy to overtake the Republican majority.

As members of Congress scurried to finish their business in Washington before heading home for the final stretch of the midterm election campaigns, leaders of both political parties were placing an unusually tight squeeze on colleagues who have not settled their bills.

With five weeks remaining in the race, nearly half of the House Democrats are in arrears. Even a month-by-month installment plan — let alone the prospect that they could regain control of the chamber if they can out-hustle the Republicans — has not provided an incentive for Democrats to pay what they owe.

"Some people make a lot of money for the party, others make a lot of issues," said Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio, who contributed for the first time this week, but still owes $115,000. "I work on the issues side. That's where I excel."

The delinquency statements that Democrats sent via overnight delivery to representatives' homes throughout the year have been supplanted by telephone calls or personal visits from party leaders.

Representative Luis V. Gutierrez, Democrat of Illinois, said he had no intention of paying his dues of $250,000, assessed because of his seniority on the Financial Services Committee. But after a two-minute telephone conversation with the minority leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, he changed course and sent in a check for $15,000.

"It's kind of hard to ignore," Mr. Gutierrez said in an interview, conceding that before Ms. Pelosi rang his cellphone, he had not given a nickel. "I still owe $225,000. Thank God it doesn't affect my credit score when I go get a mortgage."

It could, however, affect what committee assignments are passed out when Congress convenes in January. Several members said they had been told by party leaders that their positions could be on the line if they fail to contribute.

Last weekend, Ms. Pelosi made more than 50 telephone calls to members of her caucus, chiding them to pay their dues. Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois and chairman of the Congressional Campaign Committee, has barred Democrats from using the telephones at party headquarters if they had not paid at least some of what they owed.

"This is not my job," said Mr. Emanuel, recalling the message he repeats again and again to fellow Democrats. "This is our job."

Strong-arm techniques, though, can backfire. So last week, in the final Democratic caucus before the recess, both Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Emanuel softened their language. Still, they distributed a spreadsheet, laying out for everyone to see how much — or how little — members had given to the party.

The grid showed that Representative Maxine Waters, Democrat of California, had contributed $47,500. As a chief deputy whip of the party, she owes a total of $250,000.

Ms. Waters said she did not take kindly to humiliation or intimidation.

"Nobody puts the screws on me. I don't allow that," Ms. Waters said in a brief interview during a long evening of debate on the House floor. "I'm not trying to prove anything to anybody. Some years I've raised a lot, some years I've not raised so much, so I'll do whatever I do."

At the same time, contributions from more than a dozen Democrats have far exceeded their dues. Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York contributed twice as much as his $300,000 assessment and Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania has nearly doubled his $250,000 requirement. Both men have their eye on leadership positions.

"When I see what some of these guys have to do to scratch for money, it's really too bad," Mr. Murtha said. "They can't raise the money, so we help them out."

At least once a quarter, Democrats receive a fund-raising report card. To increase the motivation — or, perhaps, to embarrass them in front of their peers — the statement also points out how much money is available in individual campaign bank accounts.

The most recent document, for example, pointed out that Representative Robert E. Andrews, Democrat of New Jersey, had a balance of $2,054,562 but had paid only $40,000 of a $125,000 bill.

"I've held on to my money because New Jersey politics can be volatile," said Mr. Andrews, who has told some Democrats that he had been keeping a close watch on his state's Senate race if Senator Robert Menendez stumbles. "But there's no doubt I'll be contributing the full amount."

For Republicans, each member of the House is expected to make a contribution to the Battleground Program. The amounts range from $70,000 to $600,000, depending on the member's position. Since July, when the program began, party leaders said, about 90 percent of the members have contributed to the program, which they hope will raise $22.5 million.

There is no public disapproval for those who do not participate. Arm-twisting is conducted privately, which is why Republican officials said at least five members were summoned this week for a meeting with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois; the majority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio; and the majority whip, Roy Blunt of Missouri.

"Oftentimes Wall Street gauges a business's future success by the number of employees investing in their company," said Representative Eric Cantor, Republican of Virginia, who heads the House program. "I view Battleground the same way."

In the Senate, neither the Republicans nor the Democrats employ a rigorous system of dues and contributions.

Many senators raise more money for their respective party committees than their colleagues in the House, but committee assignments in the Senate depend on a tradition of seniority.

Still, in the House, where financial contributions and other demonstrations of party loyalty can trump seniority, not all longtime Democratic members believe this year's strong push to collect dues will ultimately raise, or lower, a member's prospects of winning an influential committee seat.

"No Democrat really believes that if you're going to be the chairman and you don't give the money that you're going to lose your seat," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts. "If you're a Republican, you do."

Showing some admiration for Republicans' efficiency, Mr. Frank said: "They threaten. We shame."

Mr. Frank has surpassed his dues of $300,000. His current tally? $310,700. And if Democrats win in November, he is poised to become chairman of the Financial Services Committee.

Democrats Less Sure About Recapturing House (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

Some Democratic election strategists are less confident than they were a month ago about recapturing the House in November as a result of tighter party-preference polls that show Republicans rallying behind their embattled party.

"I'm not as confident of the House switching as I once was," a Democratic campaign consultant said last week.

DOJ_NMG_0072349

But other Democratic congressional campaign advisers point to about two dozen congressional races where Republican incumbents are facing aggressive challenges that they say could return Democrats to power if there is a voter-turnout surge in November demanding change.

And the resignation Friday of Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, gave Democrats another opportunity to pick up an open seat.

Mr. Foley, who stepped down after press reports that he sent sexually explicit e-mails to an underage former male page, had been considered a shoo-in to win a seventh term in the heavily Republican 16th District. His Democratic challenger, Tim Mahoney, a businessman, has been aggressively campaigning for more than a year, and Republican officials acknowledged it would be difficult for a new candidate to become well-known in the five weeks before Election Day.

Democrats need to win 15 additional seats to take control of the House, and in a tight election, Mr. Foley's seat could put them over the top.

But recent surveys by Gallup and other pollsters have shown Republicans closing the Democrats' yearlong advantage as President Bush and his party sharpen their campaign messages on terrorism, Iraq and the economy and as voters begin focusing more closely on the elections.

"I think in a lot of places where there really isn't a competitive race at hand, Republicans are finding their way back into the electorate and are voting for their own," said Alan Secrest, a veteran campaign consultant and pollster who is advising Democratic House candidates across the country.
